

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

Occupation of Columbia River.

Mr. FLOYD, from the committee appointed on the 29th of December last, to inquire into the expediency of occupying the mouth of the Oregon or Columbia River; made a report thereon, which was read, and laid on the table. The report is as follows:

The committee to which was referred the resolution of the 29th day of December last, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of occupying the mouth of the Oregon or Columbia River, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave further to report: That they have considered the subject referred to them, and are persuaded, that, both in a military and commercial point of view, the occupation of that Territory is of great importance to the Republic; but, as much has been submitted to the House on these points, by former committees, they have now deemed it necessary only to present a view of the difficulties which would probably present themselves in accomplishing that object, and the manner in which they can be overcome.

To obtain information, a letter to this end was addressed to an officer of the Army, whose integrity in the public service is well known to the House, and whose military knowledge is entitled to the highest respect; that officer, Brigadier General Thomas S. Jesup, answered so satisfactorily to the committee, that they have presented the answer, in its entire form, to the House, and adopt it as a part of this report.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 26, 1824.

SIR: In reply to your letter, dated the 30th ultimo, requesting me to communicate "any facts, views, or opinions, which may have presented themselves to me, relative to the probable difficulty of making an establishment at the mouth of Columbia River, and the military advantages of that establishment," I have the honor to remark, that, ever since my attention was first directed to the subject, I have considered the possession and military command of the Columbia necessary not only to the protection of the trade, but to the security of our Western frontier. That flank of our country, extending from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, is everywhere in contact with numerous, powerful, and warlike Indian nations; who, altogether, might be able to bring into the field, from twenty to thirty thousand warriors. Most of those nations communicate, either with the British to the north and west, or the Spaniards to the south. In the event of war, that force, with a few hundred foreign troops, or under the influence of foreign companies, might be made more formidable to us than any force which Europe combined could oppose to us. On the other hand, if such measures be adopted as to secure a proper influence over them, and, in the event of war, to command their co-operation, they, with the aid of a few small garrisons, would not only afford ample protection for that entire line, but would become the scourge of our enemies.

The dangers to be apprehended, can only be averted by proper military establishments; and whether the post at the mouth of Columbia be intended to secure our territory, protect our traders, or to cut off all communication between the Indians and foreigners, I should consider a line of posts extending from the Council Bluffs entirely across the continent necessary. Those posts should be situated, as well with a view to command the avenues through which the Indians pass from the north to the south, as to keep open communication with the establishment at the mouth of the Columbia.

A post should be established at the Mandan villages, because, there the Missouri approaches within a short distance of the British territory, and it would have the effect of holding in check the Hudson's Bay and Northwest Companies, and controlling the Rickarees, Mandans, Minnatarees, Assiniboins, and other Indians, who either reside or range on the territory east, north, and west of that point.

A post at, or near, the head of navigation on the Missouri, would control the Blackfoot Indians, protect our traders, enable us to remove those of the British companies from our territory, and serve as a depot, at which detachments moved towards the Columbia might either be supplied, or leave such stores as they should find it difficult to carry with them through the mountains. It might also be made a depot of trade, and of the Indian Department.

To keep open the communication through the mountains, there should be at least one small post at some convenient point between the Missouri and the Columbia, and on the latter river and its tributaries there should be at least three posts. They would afford present protection to our traders, and, on the expiration of the privilege granted to British subjects to trade on the waters of the Columbia, would enable us to remove them from our territory, and to secure the whole to our own citizens. They would also enable us to preserve peace among the Indians, and, in the event of foreign war, to command their neutrality or their assistance, as we might think most advisable. The posts designated, might be established and maintained, at an additional annual expense not exceeding forty thousand dollars.

By extending to those posts the system of cultivation, now in operation at the Council Bluffs, the expense of supplying them would, in a few years, be greatly diminished. Mills might be erected at all the posts at a trifling expense, and, the whole country abounding in grass, all the domestic animals necessary, either for labor or subsistence, might be supported. This would render the establishments more secure, and, consequently, more formidable to the Indian nations in their vicinity.

As to the proposed posts on the Columbia, it is believed they might be supplied immediately at a low rate. Wheat may be obtained at New California, at about twenty-five cents per bushel, and beef cattle at three or four dollars each. Salt, in any quantity required, may be had at an island near the Peninsula of California. Should transportation not be readily obtained for those articles, vessels might be constructed by the troops.

To obtain the desired advantages, it is important, not only that we occupy the posts designated, but that we commence our operations without delay. The British companies are wealthy and powerful; their establishments extend from Hudson's Bay and Lake Superior to the Pacific; many of them within our territory. It is not to be supposed they would surrender those advantages without a struggle, and, though they should not engage in hostilities themselves, they might render all the Indians, in that extensive region, hostile.

The detachment intended to occupy the mouth of Columbia might leave the Council Bluffs in June, and one hundred and fifty men proceed with the boats and stores; and, as the country is open, and abounds with grass, the remaining fifty might proceed by land, with the horses intended for the transportation across the mountains, and might drive three or four hundred beeves to the Mandan villages or to the falls of Missouri; at one of those places the parties should unite and spend the winter. The latter would be preferable, because there they might be able to establish a friendly intercourse with the Blackfoot Indians, or, at all events, by impressing them with an idea of the power of the nation, restrain their depredations upon the neighboring tribes, and deter them from acts of outrage upon our traders. They might, also, during the winter, reconnoitre the several passes through the mountains, prepare provisions necessary to support them on the march, and down the Columbia; and, if authorized to do so, remove from our territories all British traders on the waters of the Missouri. They would necessarily remain at, or in the vicinity of, their wintering ground, until June, but might be occupied during the months of April and May, in opening a road to the mountains, and constructing bridges over the numerous streams on the route. This work performed, they might, in about twenty days, reach the navigable waters of Clark's River, a branch of the Columbia, and, in ten days more, prepare transportation to descend to their destination, where, after every necessary allowance for accidents and delays, they would certainly arrive by the month of August.

The vessels employed to transport the stores by sea, might leave the United States in the month of November, and would arrive at the mouth of Columbia in April, at least four months before the detachment from the Council Bluffs could reach that point; and, unless the ships should be detained during that time, which could not be expected, the stores would be exposed to damage and depredation, and perhaps, by the time the troops should arrive, would be entirely destroyed. It would, therefore, seem to be a measure of prudence, that at least one company of artillery be transported with the stores. That description of force would be found necessary at the post, and the ships would afford them ample accommodation.

That the route from the Council Bluffs to the mouth of Columbia is practicable, has been proved by the enterprise of more than one of our citizens. It, no doubt, presents difficulties; but difficulties are not impossibilities. We have only to refer to the pages of our history to learn that many operations, infinitely more arduous, have been accomplished by Americans. The march of Arnold to Quebec, or of General Clark to Vincennes, during the Revolutionary war, exceeded greatly in fatigue, privation, difficulty, and danger, the proposed operation; and I believe I may say without fear of contradiction, that the detachment might be supplied, during the whole route, with less difficulty than in the war of 1756 was experienced in supplying the forces operating under General Washington, and General Braddock, against the French and Indians, on the Ohio.

A post at the mouth of Columbia is important, not only in relation to the interior trade, and the military defence of the western section of the Union, but, also, in relation to the naval power of the nation. Naval power consists, not in ships, but in seamen; and, to be efficient, the force must always be available. The northwest coast of America is an admirable nursery for seamen—many of our best sailors are formed there; without a naval station, however, on the Pacific, the force employed in the whale fishery, as well as in sealing, and the northwest trade, would, in the event of war with a great maritime power, be, in some measure, lost to the nation. But, that establishment made, it would afford a secure retreat to all our ships and seamen in that section of the globe; and the force, thus concentrated, might be used with effect against the trade, if not the fleets or possessions of the enemy, in place of being driven to the Atlantic, or perhaps captured on their way.

The establishment might be considered as a great bastion, commanding the whole line of coast to the North and South; and it would have the same influence on that line which the bastions of a work have on its curtains; for the principles of defence are the same, whether applied to a small fortress, or to a line of frontier, or even an entire section of the globe. In the one case, the missiles used are bullets and cannon shot; in the other, ships and fleets.

I have the honor to be, &c., TH. S. JESUP.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the select committee to which was referred the President's Message of the 30th of March, 1824, relating to the execution of so much of the compact of 1802 between the United States and the State of Georgia, as relates to the extinguishment of the Indian title to lands within that State; also, a memorial of the Legislature of the said State; made a report thereon; which was read, as follows:

The select committee, to whom was referred the President's Message, of the 30th of March, with the documents accompanying it, relating to the compact of 1802, between the United States and the State of Georgia, submit to the House, on that Message, and on the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, also referred to them, the following report:

The State of Georgia claimed, on the establishment of the independence of the United States, all the lands now forming the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, with the exception of those portions of the two last States which formed a part of Florida and Louisiana.

This claim was founded upon the charter of incorporation of the proprietary government; on the Royal commissions issued to the Governors of the State, after the proprietors had surrendered their charter to the Crown. The claim was disputed by South Carolina and by the United States. The conflicting claims of South Carolina and Georgia were adjusted by a convention between them, in 1787. The United States recognized, by the treaty with Spain of the year 1795, the claim of Georgia, having refused, in 1788, a cession from the State, on account of the remoteness of the lands, and of the terms proposed by Georgia.

In April, 1798, Congress passed a law in relation to the western part of the territory of Georgia, with a reservation of the rights of Georgia to the jurisdiction and soil.

In May, 1800, another act was passed, containing a similar reservation.

In December, 1800, Georgia remonstrated against these acts, as a violation of her right of sovereignty and soil. The compact of 1802 put an end to the disputes which were likely to arise out of this collision between the General and State Governments. By this compact, the United States obtained a surrender of the right of Georgia to the sovereignty and soil of two States, containing, by estimate, eighty-six millions of acres of land, for the paltry consideration of the payment of $1,280,000 out of the proceeds of that land, and of a promise to extinguish the Indian title to the land within the territorial limits not ceded to the United States, as soon as it could be done peaceably, and on reasonable terms. The execution of this compact produced no change in the right of Georgia to the sovereignty and soil of the land within her newly-defined boundaries. Its only effect was to throw upon the United States the expense which might attend the extinguishment of the Indian title, an expense which, but for this compact, must have been borne by the State. Nor did this compact, in the slightest circumstance, add to the title of the Indians; it recognized only the claim which they, as Indians, were allowed to have, according to the usages of the States, and the liberal policy adopted towards them by the General Government.

In relation to the Cherokees, the principal topic of the President's Message, it would appear that new doctrines are permitted to be entertained of them, in the opinion of the committee neither consistent with the opinions heretofore entertained, with the practices of the Government, nor with the interests of the Union. The Cherokees claim to be an independent tribe. The President avows the belief that the articles of the cession of 1802 is a full proof that the Indians had a right to the territory, in the disposal of which they were to be regarded as free agents.

The acts of the General Government, in 1814, in relation to the Creeks; the language of the President of the United States, in 1817; the language of the Secretary of War, in 1818; of the agent of the Government in that year, in treating with the Cherokees; of the agent treating with them in 1828, does not correspond with the opinions now expressed.

In 1814, General Jackson, acting under the authority of the Government, took from the Creek Indians, for an equivalent named by himself, all the land the United States chose to require, to effect a great object of national policy in regard to Indian tribes. It cannot be alleged that this was done by virtue of conquest. The letter of the late Indian agent, Colonel Hawkins, of the 11th of August, 1815, laid before the House of Representatives on the 5th of April, 1824, shows that nearly eight millions of acres were taken from the friendly Indians, (our allies in the war,) over and above all the hunting grounds of the upper friendly Creeks, for what was called an equivalent, but which the Indians did not deem such.

In 1817, in his Message at the opening of Congress, the President says, "the hunter state can exist only in the vast uncultivated desert. It yields to the more dense and compact form, and greater force of civilized population; and, of right, it ought to yield, for the earth was given to mankind to support the greatest number of which it was capable, and no tribe or people have a right to withhold, from the wants of others, more than is necessary for their own support and comfort."

In a letter of the 29th of July, 1818, the Secretary of War says to Mr. McMinn, speaking of the attempts to prevent the Cherokees from going to Arkansas, "The United States will not permit the treaty to be defeated by such means. Those who choose to remain are permitted to do so in quiet—those who choose to emigrate, must be equally free." And further: "It is vain for the Cherokees to hold the high tone which they do, as to their independence as a nation, for daily proof is exhibited that, were it not for the protecting arm of the United States, they would become the victims of fraud and violence." Mr. McMinn tells the Cherokees, in conformity with this declaration, in his talk to the chiefs, of the 28d of November, 1818, "It must surely be, my brothers, that you view me as an impostor, acting upon my own authority, with a view to deceive the nation, or that you flatter yourselves with the empty expectation that the United States cannot execute a measure of general defence for the safety of her citizens, which shall, in the slightest degree, affect your interest or your wishes." The agents of 1823 assert an unqualified right in the United States to take from the Indians any of their lands for public use. It is asserted, however, by the Secretary of War, that there were treaties existing with the Cherokees, in 1802, which guaranteed their lands. These guarantees were only of the Indian title, as understood by all at the date of the execution of these treaties—a title of mere occupancy, for the purposes of hunting.

The idea of title to the soil was, until lately, unknown to the Indians. Their lands were overrun by them, not inhabited; their rights not transferred, but extinguished, dependent upon the will of the power to whom the sovereignty over them belongs. This sovereign power was Georgia, prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. That constitution gave to the United States the authority to manage the affairs of the Indians, for the peace of the Union, and the eventual benefit of Georgia. The Indians had mere occupation; the United States were the agents of Georgia for the extinguishment of this allowed possession. The compact of 1802 required this to be effected out of the general fund. No act of the United States, nor of the Indians, nor of both, could, without her consent, impair the rights of Georgia to the jurisdiction and soil of the territory in question, whenever the Indians should be removed from it, by accident, by contract, or by force. This doctrine is confirmed by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which has declared sales made by States, of Indian territory, valid, prior to the extinguishment of Indian title: That there is a species of seisin in fee, which enables a State to grant to individuals. In fact, the compact of 1802 is the acknowledgment of the United States of this doctrine, as their only title to the soil of Alabama and Mississippi is founded upon it. The Secretary of War, in his attention to the treaties guaranteeing the Indian title, has entirely omitted to notice the first and most important document in relation to this subject, the Treaty of Hopewell, of 1786—a document sustaining the opinion of the committee, and giving to it, what is now deemed important, the sanction of Indian acquiescence. The fourth article of the Treaty of Hopewell, is, “the boundary allotted to the Cherokees for their hunting grounds, is, and shall be, the following:” The Indians acknowledge, by that treaty, the United States as their sovereign; and, by the 9th article, Congress assumes, for the interest and comfort of the Indians, the power to regulate their trade, and manage all their affairs as they may deem proper. This treaty existed at the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and Georgia, as a member of the Union, was vested with the sovereignty and soil of the Cherokee lands, subject only to the Indian right of hunting within the allotted limits, which right, the General Government was bound to extinguish as early as the general convenience would permit.

The duty of the General Government was to do all acts which would accelerate this event; to refrain from all acts which would retard it. Over the territories of the United States, the General Government could rightfully exercise unlimited power, in relation to the Indian tribes. Within a particular State, the sole power was that of agency, for the preservation of peace, the regulation of trade, and the extinguishment of title. To this general obligation, imposed by the constitution on all the States, a special promise was added in favor of Georgia, in 1802; partially executed; but, to the complete execution of which, difficulties are alleged to exist, which require the interposition of the power of Congress.

How far this promise has been complied with, is attempted to be shown by two documents, marked A and B, sent to Congress by the President. By the document A, it appears that the Indian title to 15,744,000 acres has been extinguished; and that there remains 10,240,000 acres yet in their possession, as hunting grounds. The first quantity is alleged to be all that could be peaceably obtained on reasonable terms.

The document No. 1, accompanying this report, will show that, since 1802, the United States have been able to obtain, for their own use, more than 80,000,000 of acres in Alabama and Mississippi, in addition to 7,638,400 obtained in 1801; to 5,006,890 obtained for Tennessee, by treaty, from the Chickasaw Indians, subsequently confirmed by a treaty with the Cherokees; 700,000 for North Carolina; and a quantity, an estimate of which is not in the hands of the committee, for South Carolina. No satisfactory explanation is afforded to show how this difference in the quantity of lands procured by the United States, for their own account, and in compliance with their promise to Georgia, has occurred.

The document B is intended to show the expense incurred in the execution of the compact of 1802. It is defective and delusive. It contains no credit for the money received at the treasury of Georgia, viz: the Yazoo fund, $184,515 94. It is omitted to be stated that the $1,250,000 was paid out of the proceeds of the property acquired. It charges the Yazoo compromise as a benefit to Georgia, who had no interest in the settlement but a common interest with the other States. The land procured for the Cherokees, on the Arkansas, is charged at the minimum value of lands surveyed and offered for sale by the United States, and not at its trifling actual cost, about twenty-five thousand dollars.

The committee are at a loss to know what bearing this defective document has on the question of the Cherokee lands. As, however, they presume it has a relation not well understood, they conceive it proper to show, by the statement No. 2, what pecuniary advantages have accrued, and will accrue, to the United States, under the compact with Georgia. By this statement, it appears that $4,512,850 28, exclusive of Mississippi stock, have been received into the public Treasury; that $6,444,821 51 are due from sales made; that the land ceded by the Indians, and not yet sold, is 27,588 800 acres, which, at the minimum price, is $34,486,000. That there remains yet, as hunting grounds for the Indians, 22,977,576 acres.

The balance of profit is sufficiently with the United States to justify contracts for the extinguishment of Indian title for the benefit of Georgia, without great scrutiny as to the amount of expense incurred. The committee agree with the Secretary of War, “that no opportunity of extinguishing the Indian title, on reasonable terms, has been neglected by the General Government,” for its own use; but they do not perceive that the same zeal has been successfully exerted for the State of Georgia. The treaty of 1814, with the Creeks, was dictated by General Jackson to the Creeks, by order of the Department of War. As has been already seen, a large territory was taken from the Creeks.

The policy of the United States, as explained by the Secretary, required a separation of the tribes of Indians from each other, and from the ocean. To this policy a compliance with the promise to Georgia was sacrificed. It is alleged that the obligation to Georgia extends only to the purchase of lands, &c. The term purchase is an interpolation; it is not found in the articles of cession of 1802. It is alleged, also, that this land was obtained by conquest, and therefore the nation was at liberty, laying the contract with Georgia out of view, to pursue its plan of policy. Without entering into any considerations to show that the United States, having obtained, by force not used for that purpose, but defensively, the opportunity to extinguish the Indian title within the limits of Georgia, was bound, in good faith, to use it, it is deemed sufficient to refer the House to the facts, disclosed by the extract from Colonel Hawkins's letter, already quoted, that this acquisition by conquest was an acquisition of lands from friends and allies, for an equivalent named by the United States.

The propriety of accommodating the State of Georgia was suggested to the commissioner of the United States by the Indian agent; but the answer was, that the instructions of the Government would not permit a compliance with this suggestion. The committee are of opinion that an acquisition of land to Georgia, to any extent, could have been obtained from the Creeks in 1814. The attention of Congress has been called to the arrangements made with the Cherokees in 1817 and 1819. The arrangement of 1817 was for the purpose of carrying into effect the wishes of the Cherokees, as declared to Mr. Jefferson in 1808, by a deputation from the upper and lower towns. According to the preamble of the arrangement of 1817, the upper towns desired to remain fixed above the Hiwassee River, to contract their society within narrow limits, and begin the establishment of fixed laws and a regular government. The lower towns desired to continue the hunter life, and for that purpose wished to remove across the Mississippi. The wishes of the upper and lower towns were granted, and arrangements made for the removal of the latter across the Mississippi. No line was drawn between the upper and lower towns, although a request was made of the Indians that it should be done by the United States. The arrangement of 1817 provides for the fulfilment of the wishes expressed in 1808, and the promises of the Government of 1809. The wishes of the lower towns was a removal beyond the Mississippi, of the upper, a contraction of their society within narrower limits. By the 8d and 4th articles, it was agreed that a census should be taken of the population beyond the Mississippi, and of those who chose to emigrate thither; and a census of those who chose to remain in their present location. The territory occupied by them on this side of the Mississippi was to be divided according to the relative numbers of those who had migrated, and would migrate, to the remainder; and that portion which fell to the migrators was to be received by the United States in place of the lands furnished to the Cherokees beyond the Mississippi. From this plan, the extinguishment of the title of the Cherokee Indians was anticipated, and would have taken place had it been executed in its spirit by the General Government. It appears, however, that the census was never taken, and that, in 1819, a deputation of Cherokees was permitted to come to Washington to adjust, finally, the difficulties arising out of the treaty of 1817. The lower Cherokee towns, in the limits of Georgia, did not remove beyond the Mississippi. Most of the removals took place from the upper towns, out of the limits of Georgia. In place of the proportion of lands to be abandoned, according to the treaty of 1817, a fixed quantity was accepted, a very small and worthless part of which is in Georgia.

It is alleged by the Secretary of War that the desire of Government was, to have a cession in such form as would separate the Creeks and Cherokees; but that it was found impossible to induce the Cherokees to yield to that proposition, or to any other more favorable to Georgia, than that which was adopted. He does not, however, state that any other was made, with a view to comply with the compact of 1802. The proposition made for the separation of the Creeks and Cherokees, was not for the benefit of Georgia, had it been acceded to, although the interests of the State would have been more advanced than by the actual arrangement; yet, even in that case, the United States would have sacrificed the obligations of the compact to the policy of separating the Indian tribes, and to the consequent acquisition of lands for their own use in the State of Alabama. The committee cannot understand why a cession of the whole quantity of land in Georgia could not have been obtained. The obligations of the Indians was simple—a line, a boundary—and the United States had only to insist upon fixing that boundary, according to the preamble of the arrangement of 1817. The Secretary of War, however, states that the Indians will not yield, and it seems that the United States did yield. It is obvious to the committee that the interest of Georgia was considered a mere secondary object, from the terms of the arrangement of 1819. The preamble to that arrangement is a satisfactory evidence of the entire forgetfulness of the obligations of the compact of 1802.

The treaty is made in consequence of the earnest desire of a great part of the Cherokee nation to remain on this side of the Mississippi, to commence the measures necessary to the civilization and preservation of the nation. The committee are surprised that the occasion was not taken to satisfy the Indians that their continuance in Georgia was impossible, unless Georgia consented to it, and still more so, that the Indians should be encouraged, by this preamble of a treaty, made at the Seat of Government, under the eyes of the President, to entertain that expectation. The treaty of 1817, and that of 1819, show a strange forgetfulness of the limited extent of the power of the United States over the land in question. The Secretary of War, acting under the direction of the Executive Magistrate, and pursuing the example set in 1817, seems to have imagined that the United States and the Indians could do, lawfully, whatever suited their mutual convenience, without regard to the State of Georgia; an error which had been previously committed in treaties with the Creeks. No difference was made between Indian lands within the limits of the State claiming the eventual jurisdiction and soil, and the Indian lands where the soil is the property of the United States. Provisions are made, in both treaties, for vesting individuals with fee simple titles to land, and to convert them, by a short process, into citizens. The right of the United States to do either is absolutely denied by the committee. The General Government can take the property of individuals for public use, but the constitution withholds the power even to prejudice the claims of any State. Congress can establish a uniform rule of naturalization; the Executive Magistrate cannot make, by an Indian treaty, special exceptions to the established rule. The effect of such acts on the part of the General Government was to be anticipated. The Indians were taught the value of separate property, and the advantages to be obtained by a continuance in their present position. The General Government authorized, also, the establishment of missionaries among the Cherokees, to instruct their children, and to give them a taste for the cultivation of the soil. The committee are not informed that the influence acquired by these missionaries has been exerted to induce the Indians to seek a residence beyond the Mississippi, nor are they informed that the Government has ever thought it necessary to impose upon them such a task. The committee are not to be understood as expressing any disapprobation of the policy of the United States for the civilization of the Indian tribes; they confine themselves to the policy, as it has affected the performance of the promises of the United States, under the compact of 1802. As it relates to that compact, they express their decided conviction that the attempts which have been made to civilize, and permanently fix, the Cherokees in Georgia, is in direct violation of the promise to extinguish their title, as soon as it could be done peaceably, and on reasonable terms; nor do the committee perceive the necessity of holding out the idea of permanent settlement in Georgia, as a prelude to the establishment of a regular government for the Indians. As it regards expense, it would certainly be, for the United States, the cheapest mode of effecting this object, as the cost would be paid by Georgia, and the United States would be saved from the onerous obligation of removing the Indians for the benefit of that State; a saving of expense which, however, the United States will not desire, as it involves a breach of their faith.

From the circumstances thus detailed, the House will not be surprised at the present pretensions of the Cherokees, to be regarded as independent, or their declarations, that they will neither sell nor quit the lands occupied by them. Some surprise cannot but be felt at the acquiescence of the United States in the substitution of diplomatic correspondence for Indian talks, and at the manner in which the subject of the Cherokees is presented to Congress. The Legislature of Georgia, at their last session, sent to the Chief Magistrate a memorial on the subject of the compact of 1802. The President of the United States has not laid that memorial before Congress, but has preferred to present to the Legislative body a correspondence of the Secretary of War with certain Cherokee chiefs, which begins, on their part, by a declaration that they would sell no more land; contains a request that no more appropriations should be made for that purpose; and a suggestion that the United States should, in some other way, satisfy Georgia, as, by a cession in Florida. To the formal answer of the Secretary of War, a rejoinder is given, and, on this rejoinder, Congress are informed that its power must be exerted, as it is obvious that the Executive can do nothing further without the intervention of Congress. The President has given his opinion, that the use of force would be unjust, and that without force nothing can be done. What should be done by Congress, is a subject of the most serious and important concern. The parties to the compact of 1802 anticipated the extinguishment of the Indian title to all the lands in Georgia. The United States agreed to extinguish it, as soon as it could be done peaceably, and on reasonable terms. The compact imposed upon the General Government the obligation to use all the means necessary to accomplish the end in view. It was especially their duty to refrain from doing any thing calculated even to retard, much less to render impracticable, the attainment of that end. If the committee have not deceived themselves, it must be apparent, that the United States have omitted to embrace two occasions, when a fuller performance of the conditions of the compact was in their power. It is equally apparent that the United States have not only omitted to express constantly, and with firmness, to the Cherokees, the necessity of their ultimate removal from Georgia, but have held out to them the idea of a permanent residence, as citizens, in that State; have taught them the value of their position, and intimated, that it depended upon themselves, to remain or to remove; have attempted to vest, in individuals, a permanent property in the soil. From these causes, every day increasing in their effect upon the inclination of the Cherokees, have arisen the determination of the Cherokees, as made known to the President. It is the policy of the United States which has created the difficulties; if peaceable acquisition is impossible, that impossibility is the work of the General Government.

In this state of things, encountering contradictory obligations, the course for the Government is plain and obvious. Justice should be done to Georgia. The Indian claim should be extinguished, even should force be required for that purpose; or the consent of the State must be obtained to some arrangement, which will free the United States from the embarrassments arising from its regard to the unhappy condition of the Indians, from a respect to the expectations they have erroneously permitted this tribe to entertain, and from their formal and solemn obligation to a member of the Union.

The committee do not, however, believe that any serious difficulty now exists, to the peaceable extinguishment of the Indian title, on reasonable terms. An order from the General Government for their removal, would be cheerfully acquiesced in, if accompanied by the necessary preparation for the prosperity of the tribe, and a just equivalent for the temporary inconveniences they might suffer. The committee agree with the President, that it would promote essentially the security and happiness of the tribes of Indians, if they could be prevailed on to retire beyond the limits of the States; but they cannot see the injustice of any measure, short of actual hostility, which would essentially promote the security and happiness of the Cherokees. There is another consideration which should be brought into view; the only plausible objections to the proposed order, is its injustice, and inhumanity, to the Indians. That it is just to promote their essential security and happiness, even by means not agreeable to their wishes, cannot be denied; that it is humane to preserve them from dangers, to which they will be exposed, by an obstinate adherence to their own opinions, is equally true. Their present position is incompatible with the claims of the State of Georgia; the knowledge of the fact, that the United States will not, in consequence of the perverseness of the Cherokees, comply with the obligations of the compact of 1802, will necessarily produce irritations and resentments, the consequences of which may be easily foreseen. The United States may be under the fatal necessity of seeing the Cherokees annihilated, or of defending them against their own citizens. The committee offer to the House the following resolutions, under a full conviction that the adoption of them will not be followed by any consequences injurious to the Cherokee tribe, or to the character of the General Government for justice and humanity:

Resolved, That the United States are bound, by their obligations to Georgia, to take, immediately, the necessary measures for the removal of the Cherokee Indians beyond the limits of that State.

Resolved, That such an arrangement with the State of Georgia should be made, as may lead to the final adjustment of the claims of that State, under the compact of 1802, with the least possible inconvenience to the Cherokee and Creek Indians, within the boundary of the State.

Resolved, That the sum of — dollars should be appropriated for the purposes expressed in the above resolutions.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to refer the report to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

To this reference, Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, objected, as giving to this subject an undue preference over other business earlier introduced into the House.

In reply to this objection, Mr. FORSYTH said, among other things, that, if gentlemen had examined the documents connected with this report, they would have seen that a state of irritation exists, which requires to be allayed, or it would require something stronger than resolutions of this House to allay it.

The question was then taken on Mr. FORSYTH's motion for a reference, and decided in the affirmative—82 votes to 75.

The Tariff Bill.

The engrossed bill to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports and tonnage, was then read a third time; and the question being stated, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, addressed the chair. I am, said he, practising no deception upon myself, much less upon the House, when I say that, if I had consulted my own feelings and inclinations, I should not have troubled the House, exhausted as it is, and as I am, with any further remarks upon this subject. I come to the discharge of this task, not merely with reluctance, but with disgust; jaded, worn down, abraded, I may say, as I am by long attendance upon this body, and continued stretch of the attention upon this subject. I come to it, however, at the suggestion, and in pursuance of the wishes of those whose wishes are for me in all matters touching my public duty, paramount law; I speak with those reservations, of course, which every moral agent must be supposed to make to himself.

It was not more to his surprise than to his disappointment, Mr. R. said, that, on his return to the House, after a necessary absence of a few days, on indispensable business, he found it engaged in discussing the general principle of the bill, when its details were under consideration. If he had expected such a turn in the debate, he would, at any private sacrifice, however great, have remained a spectator and auditor of that discussion. With the exception of the speech, already published, of his worthy colleague on his right, (Mr. P. P. BAXBOUR,) Mr. R. said he was nearly deprived of the benefit of the discussion which had taken place. Many weeks had been occupied with this bill (he hoped the House would pardon him for saying so) before he took the slightest part in the deliberations on the details, and he now sincerely regretted that he had not had firmness enough to adhere to the resolution which he had laid down to himself in the early stage of the debate, not to take any part in the discussion of the details of the measure. But, as he trusted, what he now had to say upon this subject, although more and better things had been said by others, might not be the same that they had said, or might not be said in the same manner, he here borrowed the language of a man who had heretofore been conspicuous in the councils of the country; of one who was unrivalled for readiness and dexterity in debate; who was long without an equal on the floor of this body; who had contributed as much to the revolution of 1801 as any man in this nation, and had derived as little benefit from it; as, to use the words of that celebrated man, what he had to say was not that which had been said by others, and would not be said in their manner, the House would, he trusted, have patience with him during the short time that his strength would allow him to occupy their attention. And he begged them to understand, that the notes which he held in his hands, were not notes on which he meant to speak, but of what others had spoken, and from which he would make the smallest selection in his power.

Here permit me to say, observed Mr. R., that I am obliged, and with great reluctance, to differ from my worthy colleague, who has taken so conspicuous a part in this debate, about one fact, which I will call to his recollection, for I am sure it was in his memory, though sleeping. He has undertaken to state the causes by which the difference in the relative condition of various parts of the Union has been produced; but my worthy colleague has omitted to state the primum mobile of the commerce and manufactures to which a portion of the country I need not name owes its present prosperity and wealth. That primum mobile was Southern capital. I speak now not of transactions, quorum pars minima fuit, but of things of which, nevertheless, I have a contemporaneous recollection. I say, without the fear of contradiction, then, that, in consequence of the enormous depreciation of the evidences of the public debt of this country—the debt proper of the United States (to which must be added an item of not less than twenty millions of dollars, for the State debts assumed by the United States) being bought up and almost engrossed by the people of what were then called the Northern States—a measure which nobody dreamt any thing about, or which nobody had the slightest suspicion—I mean the assumption of the State debts by the Federal Government; these debts being bought up for a mere song, a capital of eighty millions of dollars, or, in other words, a credit to that amount, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, (with the exception of nineteen millions, the interest of that debt, which bore an interest of three per cent.,)—a capital of eighty millions of dollars was poured, in a single day, into the coffers of the North; and to that cause we may mainly ascribe the difference so disastrous to the South, between that country and the other portion of this Union, to which I have alluded. When we, said Mr. R., roused by the sufferings of our brethren of Boston, entered into the contest with the mother country, and when we came out of it—when this constitution was adopted, we were comparatively rich, they were positively poor. What is now our relative situation? They are flourishing and rich; we are tributary to them, not only through the medium of the public debt of which I have spoken, but also through the medium of the pension list, nearly the whole amount of which is disbursed in the Eastern States; and to this creation of a day is to be ascribed the difference of our relative situation, (I hope my worthy colleague will not consider any thing that I say as conflicting with his general principles, to which I heartily subscribe.) Yes, sir, and the price paid for the creation of all that portion of this capital, which consisted of the assumed debts of the States, was the immense boon of fixing the Seat of Government where it now is. And I advert to this bargain, because I wish to show to every member of this House, and, if it were possible, to every individual of this nation, the most tremendous and calamitous results of political bargaining.

Sir, when are we to have enough of this tariff question? In 1816 it was supposed to be settled. Only three years thereafter, another proposition for increasing it was sent from this House to the Senate, baited with a tax of four cents per pound on brown sugar. It was, fortunately, rejected in that body. In what manner this bill is baited it does not become me to say; but I have too distinct a recollection of the vote in Committee of the Whole, on the duty upon molasses, and afterwards of the vote in the House on the same question; of the votes of more than one of the States on that question, not to mark it well. I do not say that the change of the vote on that question was effected by any man's voting against his own motion, but I do not hesitate to say that it was effected by one man's electioneering against his own motion. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that old Massachusetts Bay, and the Province of Maine and Sagadahock, by whom we stood in the days of the Revolution, now stand by the South, and will not aid in fixing on us this system of taxation, compared with which the taxation of Mr. Grenville and Lord North was as nothing. I speak with knowledge of what I say, when I declare, that this bill is an attempt to reduce the country South of Mason and Dixon's line, and East of the Alleghany Mountains, to a state of worse than colonial bondage; a state to which the domination of Great Britain was, in my judgment, far preferable; and I trust I shall always have the fearless integrity to utter any political sentiment which the head sanctions and the heart ratifies; for the British Parliament never would have dared to lay such duties on our imports, or their exports to us, either "at home" or here, as is now proposed to be laid upon the imports from abroad. At that time we had the command of the market of the vast dominions then subject, and we should have had those which have since been subjected to the British empire; we enjoyed a free trade, eminently superior to any thing we can enjoy if this bill shall go into operation. It is a sacrifice of the interests of a part of this nation to the ideal benefit of the rest. It marks us out as the victims of a worse than Egyptian bondage. It is a barter of so much of our rights, of so much of the fruits of our labor, for political power to be transferred to other hands. It ought to be met, and I trust it will be met, in the Southern country, as was the Stamp act, and by all those measures which I will not detain the House by recapitulating, which succeeded the Stamp act, and produced the final breach with the mother country, which it took about ten years to bring about; as I trust in my conscience, it will not take as long to bring about similar results from this measure, should it become a law.

All policy is very suspicious, says an eminent statesman, that sacrifices the interest of any part of the community to the ideal good of the whole; and those governments only are tolerable where, by the necessary construction of the political machine, the interests of all the parts are obliged to be protected by it. Here is a district of country extending from the Patapsco to the Gulf of Mexico, from the Alleghany to the Atlantic, a district which, taking in all that part of Maryland lying south of the Patapsco and east of Elk River, raises five-sixths of all the exports of this country that are of home growth—I have in my hand the official statements, which prove it, but which I will not weary the House by reading,—in all this country. Yea, sir, and I bless God for it; for, with all the fantastic and preposterous theories about the rights of man, (the theories, not the rights themselves, I speak of,) there is nothing but power that can restrain power—I bless God that, in this insulted, oppressed, and outraged region, we are, as to our counsels in regard to this measure, but as one man; that there exists on the subject but one feeling and one interest. We are proscribed, and put to the ban; and if we do not feel, and feeling do not act, we are bastards to those fathers who achieved the Revolution; then shall we deserve to make our bricks without straw. There is no case on record in which a proposition like this, suddenly changing the whole frame of a country's polity, tearing asunder every ligature of the body politic, was ever carried by a lean majority of two or three votes, unless it be the usurpation of the Septennial act, which passed the British Parliament by, I think, a majority of one vote, the same that laid the tax on cotton bagging. I do not stop here, sir, to argue about the constitutionality of this bill; I consider the constitution a dead letter; I consider it to consist, at this time, of the power of the General Government and the power of the States—that is the constitution. You may intrench yourself in parchment to the teeth, says Lord Chatham, the sword will find its way to the vitals of the constitution. I have no faith in parchment, sir; I have no faith in the abracadabra of the constitution; I have no faith in it. I have faith in the power of that Commonwealth, of which I am an unworthy son; in the power of those Carolinas, and of that Georgia, in her ancient and utmost extent, to the Mississippi, which went with us through the valley of the shadow of death, in the war of our independence. I have said that I shall not stop to discuss the constitutionality of this question, for that reason, and for a better; that there never was a constitution under the sun, in which, by an unwise exercise of the powers of the government, the people may not be driven to the extremity of resistance by force. “For it is not, perhaps, so much by the assumption of unlawful powers, as by the unwise or unwarrantable use of those which are most legal, that governments oppose their true end and object; for there is such a thing as tyranny as well as usurpation.” If, under a power to regulate trade, you prevent exportation; if, with the most approved spring lancets, you draw the last drop of blood from our veins; if, secundum artem, you draw the last shilling from our pockets, what are the checks of the constitution to us? A fig for the constitution! When the scorpion’s sting is probing us to the quick, shall we stop to chop logic? Shall we get some learned and cunning clerk to say whether the power to do this is to be found in the constitution, and then, if he, from whatever motive, shall maintain the affirmative, like the animal whose fleece forms so material a portion of this bill, quietly lie down and be shorn?

Sir, events now passing elsewhere, which plant a thorn in my pillow and a dagger in my heart, admonish me of the difficulty of governing with sobriety any people who are over head and ears in debt. That state of things begets a temper which sets at naught every thing like reason and common sense. This country is unquestionably laboring under great distress, but we cannot legislate it out of that distress. We may, by your legislation, reduce all the country south and east of Mason and Dixon’s line, the whites as well as the blacks, to the condition of Helots—you can do no more. We have had placed before us, in the course of this discussion, foreign examples and authorities; and among other things, we have been told, as an argument in favor of this measure, of the prosperity of Great Britain. Have gentlemen taken into consideration the peculiar advantages of Great Britain? Have they taken into consideration that, not excepting Mexico, and that fine country which lies between the Orinoco and the Caribbean Sea, England is decidedly superior in point of physical advantages to every country under the sun? This is unquestionably true. I will enumerate some of those advantages. First, there is her climate. In England, such is the temperature of the air, that a man can there do more days’ work in the year, and more hours’ work in the day, than in any other climate in the world; of course I include Scotland and Ireland in this description. It is in such a climate only, that the human animal can bear without extirpation the corrupted air, the noisome exhalations, the incessant labor of these accursed manufactories. Yes, sir, accursed; for I say it is an accursed thing, which I will neither taste, nor touch, nor handle. If we were to act here on the English system, we should have the yellow fever at Philadelphia, New York, &c., not in August merely, but from June to January, and from January to June. The climate of this country alone, were there no other natural obstacle to it, says aloud, you shall not manufacture! Even our tobacco factories, admitted to be the most wholesome of any sort of factories, are known to be, where extensive, the very nidus (if I may use the expression) of yellow fever and other fevers of similar type. In another of the advantages of Great Britain, so important to her prosperity, we are almost on a par with her, if we knew how properly to use it. Fortunatos nimium sua si bona norint—for, as regards defence, we are, to all intents and purposes, almost as much an island as England herself. But one of her insular advantages we can never acquire. Every part of that country is accessible from the sea. There, as you recede from the sea, you do not get further from the sea. I know that a great deal will be said of our majestic rivers, about the father of floods and his tributary streams; but with the Ohio frozen up all the Winter, and dry all the summer, with a long, tortuous, difficult, and dangerous navigation thence to the ocean, the gentlemen of the West may rest assured that they will never derive one particle of advantage, from even a total prohibition of foreign manufactures. You may succeed in reducing us to your own level of misery; but, if we were to agree to become your slaves, you never can derive one farthing of advantage from this bill. What parts of this country can derive any advantage from it? Those parts only, where there is a water power in immediate contact with navigation, such as the vicinities of Boston, Providence, Baltimore, Richmond, &c. Petersburg is the last of these as you travel south.* You take a bag of cotton up the river to Pittsburg, or to Zanesville, to have it manufactured and sent down to New Orleans for a market, and before your bag of cotton has got to the place of manufacture, the manufacturer of Providence has received his returns for the goods made from his bag of cotton purchased at the same time that you purchased yours. No, sir; gentlemen may as well insist that because the Chesapeake Bay, mare nostrum, our Mediterranean Sea, gives us every advantage of navigation, we shall exclude from it every thing but steamboats and those boats called kak' axochen, per emphasin, par excellence, Kentucky boats—a sort of huge, square, clumsy wooden box. And why not insist upon it? Haven't you "the power to regulate commerce?" Would not that, too, be a "regulation of commerce?" It would, indeed, and a pretty regulation it is; and so is this bill. And, sir, I marvel that the representation from the great commercial State of New York should be in favor of this bill. If operative—and if inoperative why talk of it?—if operative, it must, like the embargo of 1807, '8, '9, transfer no small portion of the wealth of the London of America, as New York has been called, to Quebec and Montreal. She will receive the most of her imports from abroad, down the river. I do not know any bill that could be better calculated for Vermont than this bill; because, through Vermont, from Quebec, Montreal, and other positions on the St. Lawrence, we are, if it passes, unquestionably to receive our supplies of foreign goods. It will, no doubt, also, suit the Niagara frontier.

But, sir, I must not suffer myself to be led too far astray from the topic of the peculiar advantages of England as a manufacturing country. Her vast beds of coal are inexhaustible; there are daily discoveries of quantities of it, greater than ages past have yet consumed; to which beds of coal her manufacturing establishments have been transferred, as any man may see who will compare the present population of her towns with what it was formerly. It is to these beds of coal that Birmingham, Manchester, Wolverhampton, Sheffield, Leeds, and other manufacturing towns, owe their growth. If you could destroy her coal in one day, you would cut at once the sinews of her power. Then there are her metals, and particularly tin, of which she has the exclusive monopoly. Tin, I know, is to be found in Japan, and perhaps elsewhere, but, in practice, England has now the monopoly of that article. I might go further, said Mr. R., and I might say that England possesses an advantage, quo ad hoc, in her institutions; for there men are compelled to pay their debts. But, here, men are not only not compelled to pay their debts, but they are protected in the refusal to pay them, in the scandalous evasion of their legal obligations; and, after being convicted of embezzling the public money, and the money of others, of which they were the appointed guardians and trustees, they have the impudence to obtrude their unblushing fronts into society, and elbow honest men out of their way! There, though all men are on a footing of equality on the highway, and in the courts of law, at mill and at market, yet the castes in Hindostan are not more distinctly separated one from the other, than the different classes of society are in England. It is true, that it is practicable for a wealthy merchant or a manufacturer, or his descendants, after having, through two or three generations, washed out what is considered the stain of their original occupation, to emerge, by slow degrees, into the higher ranks of society; but this rarely happens. Can you find men of vast fortune, in this country, content to move in the lower circles—content as the ox under the daily drudgery of the yoke? It is true that, in England, some of these wealthy people take it into their heads to buy seats in Parliament; but, when they get there, unless they possess great talents, they are mere nonentities; their existence is only to be found in the Red Book, which contains a list of the members of Parliament. Now, sir, I wish to know, if, in the Western country, where any man may get beastly drunk for three pence sterling—in England, you cannot get a small wine-glass of spirits under twenty-five cents; one such drink of grog as I have seen swallowed in this country would there cost a dollar;—in the Western country, where every man can get as much meat and bread as he can consume, and yet spend the best part of his days, and nights too, perhaps, on the tavern benches, or loitering at the cross-roads asking the news,—can you expect the people of such a country, with countless millions of wild land and wild animals besides, can be cooped up in manufacturing establishments, and made to work sixteen hours a day, under the superintendence of a driver—yes, a driver, compared with whom a Southern overseer is a gentleman and man of refinement; for, if they do not work, (these work people in the manufactories,) they cannot eat; and, among all the punishments that can be devised, (put death, even, among the number,) I defy you to get as much work out of a man by any of them, as when he knows that he must work before he can eat.

But, sir, if we follow the example of England, in one respect, as we are invited to do, we must also follow it in another. If we adopt her policy, we must adopt her institutions also. Her policy is the result of her institutions, and our institutions must be, as the result of our policy, assimilated to hers. We cannot adopt such an exterior system as that of England, without adopting also her interior policy. We have heard of her wealth, her greatness, her glory; but her eulogist is silent about the poverty, wretchedness, misery, of the lowest orders. Show me the country, say gentlemen, which has risen to glory without this system of bounties and protection on manufactures! Sir, show me any country, beyond our own, which has risen to glory or to greatness without an established church, or without a powerful aristocracy, if not a hereditary nobility. I know no country in Europe, except Turkey, without hereditary nobles. Must we, too, have these Corinthian ornaments of society, because those countries of greatness and glory have given in to them? But, after we shall have destroyed all our foreign trade; after we shall have, by the prevention of imports, cut off exports—thus keeping the promise of the constitution to the ear, and breaking it to the hope—paltering with the people in a double sense,—after we shall have done this, we are told, “we shall only have to resort to an excise; we have only to change the mode of collection of taxes from the people; both modes of taxation are voluntary.” Very voluntary! The exciseman comes into my house; searches my premises; respects not even the privacy of female apartments; measures, gauges, and weighs every thing; levies a tax upon every thing; and then tells me the tax is a voluntary one on my part, and that I am or ought to be content. “Yes, voluntary,” as Portia said to Shylock, when she played the judge so rarely—“Art thou content, Jew? Art thou content?”

These taxes, however, it seems, are voluntary, “as being altogether upon consumption.” By a recent speech on this subject, the greater part of which, said Mr. R., I was so fortunate as to hear, I learn that there have been only two hundred capital prosecutions in England, within a given time, for violations of the revenue laws. Are we ready, if one of us, too poor to own a saddle-horse, should borrow a saddle and clap it on his plough-horse, to ride to church, or court, or mill, or market, to be taxed for a surplus saddle-horse, and surcharged for having failed to list him as such? Are gentlemen aware of the inquisitorial, dispensing, arbitrary, and almost Papal power of the Commissioners of Excise? I shall not stop to go into a detail of them; but I never did expect to hear it said, on this floor, and by a gentleman from Kentucky, too, that the excise system was a mere scarecrow,—a bugbear—that the sound of the words constituted all the difference between a system of excise and a system of customs; that both meant the same thing. “Write them together; yours is as fair a name. Sound them; it doth become the mouth as well.” Here, sir, I must beg leave to differ; I do not think it does. “Weigh them; it is as heavy.” That I grant. “Conjure with them”—excise “will start a spirit as soon as customs.”

This I verily believe, sir, and I wish, with all my heart, if this bill is to pass—if new and unnecessary burdens are to be wantonly imposed upon the people—that we were to return home with the blessed news of a tax or excise, not less by way of “minimum,” than fifty cents per gallon upon whiskey. And here, if I did not consider an exciseman to bear, according to the language of the old law books, caput lupinum, and that it was almost as meritorious to shoot such a hell-hound of tyranny, as to shoot a wolf or a mad dog—and, if I did not know that any thing like an excise in this country is in effect utterly impracticable, I myself, feeling, seeing, blushing for my country, would gladly vote to lay an excise on this abominable liquor, the lavish consumption of which renders this the most drunken nation under the sun; and yet, we have refused to take the duties from wines, from cheap French wines particularly, that might lure the dog from his vomit, and lay the foundation of a reformation of the public manners. Sir, an excise system can never be maintained in this country. I had as lief be a tythe-proctor in Ireland, and met on a dark night in a narrow road by a dozen white-boys, or peep-of-day boys, or hearts of oak, or hearts of steel, as an exciseman in the Alleghany mountains, met, in a lonely road, or by-place, by a backwoodsman, with a rifle in his hand. With regard to Ireland, the British chancellor of the exchequer has been obliged to reduce the excise in Ireland on distilled spirits, to comparatively nothing to what it was formerly, in consequence of the impossibility of collecting it in that country. Ireland is, not to speak with statistical accuracy, about the size of Pennsylvania, containing something like twenty-five thousand square miles of territory, with a population of six millions of inhabitants, nearly as great a number as the whole of the white population of the United States; with a standing army of 20,000 men; with another standing army, composed of all those classes in civil life, who, through the instrumentality of that army, keep the wretched people in subjection—under all these circumstances, even in Ireland, the excise cannot be collected. I venture to say, that no army that the earth has ever seen—not such a one as that of Bonaparte, which marched to the invasion of Russia—would be capable of collecting an excise in this country—not such a one as that described, if you will allow me to give some delightful poetry in exchange for very wretched prose, as Milton has described:

“Such forces met not, nor so wide a camp,
When Agrican, with all his northern powers,
Besieged Albracca, as romances tell,
The city of Calliphron, from whence to win
The fairest of her sex, Angelica,
His daughter, sought by many prowess knights,
Both Paynim and the Peers of Charlemagne.”

Not such a force, nor even the troops with which he compares them, which were no less than “the legion fiends of hell,” could collect an excise here. If any officer of our Government were to take the field a still-hunting, as they call it in Ireland, among our Southern or Western forests and mountains, I should like to see the throwing off the hounds. I have still enough of the sportsman about me, that I should like to see the breaking cover; and, above all, I should like to be in at the death.

And what, said Mr. R., are we now about to do? For what was the constitution formed? To drive the people of any part of this Union from the plough to the distaff? Sir, the Constitution of the United States never would have been formed, and if formed, would have been scouted, una voce, by the people, if viewed as a means for effecting purposes like this. The constitution was formed for external purposes, to raise armies and navies, and to lay uniform duties on imports, to raise a revenue to defray the expenditure for such objects. What are you going to do now? To turn the constitution wrong side out; to abandon foreign commerce and exterior relations—I am sorry to use this Frenchified word—the foreign affairs, which it was established to regulate, and convert it into a municipal agent, to carry a system of espionage and excise into every log-house in the United States. We went to war with Great Britain for free trade and sailors' rights; we made a treaty of peace in which I never could, with the aid of my glasses, see a word about either the one or the other of these objects of contention; we are now determined never to be engaged in another for such purposes; for we are, ourselves, putting an end to them. And, by the way of comfort in this state of things, we have been told, by the doctor as well as by the apothecary, that much cannot be immediately expected from this new scheme; that years will pass away before its beneficial effects will be fully realized. And to whom is this told? To the consumptive patient, it is said—here is the remedy; persevere in it for a few years, and it will infallibly cure your disorder; and this infallible remedy is prescribed for pulmonary consumption, which is an opprobrium of physicians, and has reached a stage that, in a few months, not to say days, must inevitably terminate the existence of the patient. This is to be done, too, on the plea that the people who call for this measure are already ruined. I will do any thing, sir, in reason, to relieve these persons; but I can never agree, because they are ruined, and we are half ruined only, that we shall be entirely ruined, for the contingent possibility of their relief. We have no belief in this new theory—new, for it came in with the French revolution, and that is of modern date—of the transfusion of blood from a healthy animal to a sick one: and, if there is to be such a transfusion for the benefit of these ruined persons now, we refer the gentlemen to bulls and goats for supplies of blood, for we should be the veriest asses to permit them to draw our own.

We are told, however, that we have nothing to do but to postpone the payment of the public debt for a few years, and wait for an accumulation of wealth, for a new run of luck—

"Rusticus expectat dum defluet omnis et ille Labitur et labitur in omne volubilis ævum."

This postponement of the public debt is no novelty. All debts are, nowadays, as old Lilly hath it, in the future in rus, "about to be" paid. We have gone on postponing paying the national debt, and our own debts, until individual credit is at an end; until property, low as it is reduced in price by our fantastic legislation, can no longer be bought but for ready money. Here is one, and there the other. I am describing a state of society which I know to exist in a part of the country, and which I hear, with concern, does exist in a greater degree, in a much larger portion of the country than I pretend to be personally acquainted with.

In all beneficial changes in the natural world—and the sentiment is illustrated by one of the most beautiful effusions of imagination and genius that I ever read—in all those changes, which are the works of an all-wise, all-seeing, and superintending Providence, as in the insensible gradation by which the infant bud expands into manhood, and from manhood to senility; or, if you will, to caducity itself—you find nature never working but by gradual and imperceptible changes; you cannot see the object move, but take your eye from it for a while, and like the index of that clock, you can see that it has moved. The old proverb says, God works good, and always by degrees. The devil, on the other hand, is bent on mischief, and always in a hurry. He cannot stay: his object is mischief, which can best be effected suddenly, and he must be gone to work elsewhere. But we have the comfort, under the pressure of this measure, that at least no force is exercised upon us; we are not obliged to buy goods of foreign manufacture. It is true, sir, that gentlemen have not said you shall not send your tobacco or cotton abroad; but they have said the same thing, in other words; by preventing the importation of the returns which we used to receive, and without which, the sale or exchange of our produce is impracticable, they say to us, you shall sell only to us, and we will give you what we please; you shall buy only of us, but at what price we please to ask. But no force is used! You are at full liberty not to buy or to sell. Sir, when an English judge once told a certain curate at Brentford, that the court of chancery was open equally to the rich and the poor, Horne Tooke replied, "so, my lord, is the London tavern." You show a blanket or a warm rug to a wretch that is shivering with cold, and tell him, you shall get one nowhere else, but you are at liberty not to buy mine.

No Jew, who ever tampered with the necessities of a profligate young heir, lending him money at a usury of cent. per cent., ever acted more paternally than the advocates of this bill, to those upon whom it is to operate. I advise you, young man, for your good, says the usurer. I do these things very reluctantly, says Moses—these courses will lead you to ruin. But, no force—no, sir, no force short of Russian despotism, shall induce me to purchase, or, knowing it, to use any article from the region of country which attempts to cram this bill down our throats. On this, we of the South are resolved, as were our fathers about the tea, which they refused to drink; for this is the same old question of the stamp act in a new shape, viz: whether they, who have no common feeling with us, shall impose on us, not merely a burdensome but a ruinous tax, and that, by way of experiment and sport. And I say again, if we are to submit to such usurpations, give me George Grenville, give me Lord North for a master. It is in this point of view that I most deprecate the bill. If, said Mr. R., from the language I have used, any gentleman shall believe that I am not as much attached to this Union as any one on this floor, he will labor under great mistake. But there is no magic in this word union. I value it as the means of preserving the liberty and happiness of the people. Marriage itself is a good thing, but the marriages of Mezentius were not so esteemed. The marriage of Sinbad, the sailor, with the corpse of his deceased wife, was a union; and just such a union will this be, if, by a bare majority in both Houses, this bill shall become a law. And, I ask, sir, whether it will redound to the honor of this House, if this bill should pass, that the people should owe their escape to the act of any others rather than to us? Shall we, when even the British Parliament are taking off taxes by wholesale—when all the assessed taxes are diminished fifty per cent.—when the tax on salt is reduced seven-eighths, with a pledge that the remainder shall come off, and the whole would have been repealed, but that it was kept on as a salvo for the wounded pride of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,* who, when asked—why keep on this odious tax, which brings but a paltry hundred and fifty thousand per annum? answered, by subterfuge and evasion, as I have heard done in this House, and drew back upon his resources, his majority—how will it answer for the people to look up for their escape from oppression, not to their immediate Representatives, but to the Representatives of the States, or, possibly, to the Executive? And, permit me here to say, and I say it freely, because it is true, that I join as heartily as any man, in reprehending the “cold, ambiguous support of the Executive Government to this bill.” I do not use my own words; I deprecate as much as any member of this House can do, that the Executive of this country should lend to this bill, or to any other bill, a cold and ambiguous support, or support of any sort, until it come before him in the shape of a law, unless it be a measure which he, in his constitutional capacity, may have invited Congress to pass. I may be permitted to say, and I will say, that, in case this bill should be unhappily presented to him for his signature—and as an allusion has been made to him in debate, I presume I may repeat it—I hope he will recollect how much the country that gave him birth has done for him, and the little, not to say worse than nothing, that, during his administration, he has done for her. I hope, sir, he will scout the bill as contrary to the genius of our Government, to the whole spirit and letter of our confederation—I say of our confederation—Blessed be God, it is a confederation, and that it contains within itself the redeeming power which has more than once been exercised—and that it contains within itself the seeds of preservation, if not of this Union, at least of the individual Commonwealths of which it is composed.

The Tariff Bill.

But, sir, not satisfied with an appeal to the example of Great Britain, whom we have been content hitherto very sedulously to censure and to imitate—as I once heard a person say that it was absolutely necessary for persons of a peculiar character to be extremely vehement of censure of the very vice of which they are themselves guilty—the example of Russia has been introduced, the very last, I should suppose, that would be brought into this House on this or any other question. A gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. POINSETT,) whose intelligence and information I very much respect, but the feebleness of whose voice does not permit him to be heard as distinctly as could be wished, remarked the other day, and, having it on my notes, I will, with his leave, repeat it—Russia is cursed with a paper money, which, in point of depreciation and its consequent embarrassment to her, can boast of no advantage, I believe, even over that of Kentucky—so cursed, that it is impossible, until her circulation is restored to a healthful state, she can ever take her station as a commercial or manufacturing nation, to any extent. Nay, more, Russia, with the exception of a few of her provinces, consists, like the interior of America, of a vast inland continent, desolated and deformed by prairies, or steppes, as they are there called, inhabited by a sparse population; and, as an appeal has been made to experience, said Mr. R., I ask any gentleman to show me an instance of any country under the sun, that has, under these circumstances, taken a stand as a manufacturing or great commercial nation. These great rivers and inland seas cut a mighty figure on the map, but, when you come to consider of capacities for foreign commerce, how unlike the insular situation of Great Britain, or the peninsular situation of almost the whole continent of Europe—surrounded or penetrated as it is by inland seas and gulfs! May I be pardoned for adverting to the fact—I know that comparisons are extremely odious—that, when we look to Salem and Boston, to parts of the country where skill, and capital, and industry, notoriously exist, we find opposition to this bill; and that, when we look to countries which could sooner build one hundred pyramids, such as that of Cheops, than manufacture one cambric needle, or a paper of White Chapel pins, or a watch-spring, we hear a clamor about this system for the protection of manufactures. The merchants and manufacturers of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, the Province of Maine, and Sagadahock, reel this bill, whilst men in hunting-shirts, with deer-skin leggings and moccasins on their feet, want protection for manufactures—men with rifles on their shoulders, and long knives in their belts, seeking in the forest to lay in their next Winter's supply of bear meat. But it is not there alone the cry is heard. It is at Baltimore—decayed, deserted Baltimore, whose exports have more than one-half decreased, whilst those of Boston have four times increased—it is decayed and deserted Baltimore that comes here and asks us for the protection of those interests which have grown up during the late war—privateering among the number, I presume. Philadelphia, too, in a state of atrophy, asks for the measure—Philadelphia, who never can, pass what bill you please, have a foreign trade to any great amount, or become a great manufacturing town, for which she wants all the elements of climate, coal, and capital—this city, now over built, swollen to the utmost extent of the integument, and utterly destitute of force or weight in the Union, wants this bill for the protection of the domestic industry of her free blacks, I presume. New York, too, is now willing to build up Montreal and Quebec at her expense—to convert the Hudson into a theatre for rival disputants about steamboats in the courts below stairs, and for them, and such as them, with a coasting license, to ply upon. The true remedy, and the only one, for the iron manufacturer of Pennsylvania, who has nothing but iron to sell, and that, they tell us, is worth nothing, would be to lay on the table of this House a declaration of war in blank, and then go into a Committee of the Whole, to see what nation in the world it would be most convenient to go to war with—for, fill the blank with the name of what power you please, it must be a sovereign State, and, though it have not a seaman or a vessel in the world, its commissions are as good and valid in an admiralty court, as those of the Lord High Admiral of Great Britain. In this way you will put our furnaces in blast, and your paper mills into full operation; and many, very many, who, during the last war, transported flour on horseback for the supply of your army, at the cost of a hundred dollars per barrel, and who have since transported provisions in steamboats up and down the Missouri River—very many such individuals would thus be taken out of the very jaws of bankruptcy and lifted up to opulence, at the expense of that people, at whose expense, also, you are now about to enable these iron manufacturers to fill their pockets. New England does not want this bill. Connecticut, indeed, molasses having been thrown overboard to lighten the ship, votes for this bill. A word in the ear of the land of steady habits—I voted against the tax on the principle, which has always directed my public life, not to compromise my opinions—not to do evil that good may come of it—let me tell the land of steady habits, that, after this bill shall be fairly off the shore; after we shall have cleared decks and made ready for action again; after she shall have imposed on me the onerous burden of this bill, she shall have the benefit of my vote to put on again this duty on molasses—not at this day—this is not the last tariff measure; for, in less than five years, I would, if I were a betting man, wager any odds that we have another tariff proposition, worse by far than that, amendments to which gentlemen had strangled yesterday by the bow-string of the previous question. Fair dealing leads to safe counsels and safe issues. There is a certain left-handed wisdom that often overreaches its own objects, which grasps at the shadow and lets go the substance. We shall not only have this duty on molasses, I can tell the gentlemen from Connecticut, but we shall have, moreover, an additional bounty on intoxication by whiskey, in the shape of an additional duty on foreign distilled spirits.

* It is a subject of much regret to me, that, at this time, I had not had the benefit of the very able speech of his successor in office, (Mr. Robinson,) which reached the United States a few days after. It ought to be reprinted in every leading paper in the Union. With the good sense, liberality, manliness, and good faith, which characterize the whole speech, he states that Government is pledged to the abolition of the small remnant of the salt tax; and if insisted on by the Opposition, the pledge shall be redeemed. He suggests, however, the policy of substituting some other reduction in lieu of the small tax now payable on salt, which he conceives to be as little burdensome, at its present reduced rate, as any other, and more easy of collection.

The ancient Commonwealth of Virginia, one of whose unworthy sons, and more unworthy representatives, I am, said Mr. R., must now begin to open her eyes to the fatal policy which she has pursued for the last forty years. I have not a doubt, that they who were the agents for transferring her vast, and boundless, and fertile country to the United States, with an express stipulation, in effect, that not an acre of it should ever inure to the benefit of any man from Virginia, were as respectable, and kind-hearted, and hospitable, and polished, and guileless Virginia gentlemen, as ever were cheated out of their estates by their overseers; men who, so long as they could command the means, by sale of their last acre, or last negro, would have a good dinner, and give a hearty welcome to whosoever chose to drop in, to eat, friend or stranger, bidden or unbidden. What will be the effect of this bill on the Southern States? The effect of this policy is, what I shudder to look at; the more, because the next census is held up in terrorem over us. We are told, you had better consent to this—we are not threatened exactly with General Gage and the Boston Port Bill—but we are told by gentlemen, we shall, after the next census, so saddle, and bridle, and martingale you, that you will be easily regulated by any bit, or whip, however severe, or spurs, however rank, of domestic manufacture, that we choose to use. But this argument, sir, has no weight in it with me. I do not choose to be robbed now, because, after I am once robbed, it will become easier to rob me again. Ostea principis, is my maxim—because every act of extension of the system operates in a twofold way, decreasing the strength and means of the robber, and increasing those of the robber. This is as true as any proposition in mathematics. Gentlemen need not tell us, we had better give in at once. No, sir, we shall not give in; no, we shall hold out—we shall not give in. We do not mean to be threatened out of our rights by the menace of another census. We are aware of our folly, and it is our business to provide against the consequences of it, but not in this way. When I recollect, that the tariff of 1816 was followed by that of 1819-'20, and that by this measure of 1828-'24, I cannot believe that we are, at any time hereafter, long to be exempt from the demands of those sturdy beggars, who will take no denial. Every concession does but render every fresh demand and new concession more easy. It is like those dastard nations who vainly think to buy peace. When I look back to what the country of which I am a representative was, and when I see what it is—when I recollect the expression of Lord Cornwallis, applied to Virginia, “that great and unfettered colony,” which he was about to enter, not without some misgivings of his mind as to the result of the invasion—when I compare what she was when this House of Representatives first assembled in the city of New York, and what she now is, I know, by the disastrous contrast, that her councils have not been governed by statesmen. They might be admirable professors of a university, powerful dialecticians ex cathedra, but no sound counsels of wise statesmen could ever lead to such practical ill-results as are exhibited by a comparison of the past and present condition of the ancient colony and dominion of Virginia.

In the course of this discussion, said Mr. R., I have heard, I will not say with surprise, because nil admirari is my motto—no doctrine that can be broached on this floor can ever, hereafter, excite surprise in my mind—I have heard the names of Say, Ganilh, Adam Smith, and Ricardo, pronounced, not only in terms, but in a tone, of sneering contempt, as visionary theorists, destitute of practical wisdom, and the whole clan of Scotch and Quarterly reviewers lugged in to boot. This, sir, is a sweeping clause of proscription. With the names of Say, Smith, and Ganilh, I profess to be acquainted, for I, too, am versed in title pages, but I did not expect to hear, in this House, a name, with which I am a little further acquainted, treated with so little ceremony, and by whom? I leave Adam Smith to the simplicity and majesty, and strength of his own native genius, which has canonized his name—a name which will be pronounced with veneration, when not one name in this House will be remembered. But, one word as to Ricardo, the last-mentioned of those writers—a new authority, though the grave has already closed upon him, and set its seal upon his reputation. I shall speak of him in the language of a man of as great a genius as this, or perhaps any, age has ever produced—a man remarkable for the depth of his reflections and the acumen of his penetration. “I had been led,” says this man, “to look into loads of books—my understanding had for too many years been intimate with severe thinkers, with logic, and the great masters of knowledge, not to be aware of the utter feebleness of the herd of modern economists. I sometimes read chapters from more recent works, or parts of Parliamentary debates. I saw that these [ominous words!] were generally the very dregs and rinsings of the human intellect.” [I am very glad, sir, he did not read our debates. What would he have said of ours?] “At length a friend sent me Mr. Ricardo’s book, and recurring to my own prophetic anticipation of the advent of some legislator on this science, I said, Thou art the man. Wonder and curiosity had long been dead in me; yet I wondered once more. Had this profound work been really written in England during the 19th century? Could it be that an Englishman, and he not in academic bowers, but oppressed by mercantile and senatorial cares, had accomplished what all the universities and a century of thought had failed to advance by one hair’s breadth? All other writers had been crushed and overlaid by the enormous weight of facts and documents; Mr. Ricardo had deduced, a priori, from the understanding itself, laws which first gave a ray of light into the unwieldy chaos of materials, and had constructed what had been but a collection of tentative discussions into a science of regular proportions, now first standing on an eternal basis.”

I pronounce no opinion of my own, said Mr. R., on Ricardo; I recur rather to the opinion of a man, inferior in point of original and native genius, and that highly cultivated, too, to none of the moderns, and few of the ancients. Upon this subject, what shall we say to the following fact? Butler, who is known to gentlemen of the profession of the law, as the annotator, with Hargrave, on Lord Coke, speaking with Fox as to political economy—that most extraordinary man, unrivalled for his powers of debate, excelled by no man that ever lived, or probably ever will live, as a public debater, and of the deepest of political erudition, fairly confessed that he had never read Adam Smith. Butler said to Mr. Fox “that he had never read Adam Smith’s work on the Wealth of Nations.” “To tell you the truth,” replied Mr. Fox, “nor I neither. There is something in all these subjects that passes my comprehension—something so wide that I could never embrace them myself, or find any one who did.” And yet we see how we, with our little dividers, undertake to lay off the scale, and with our packthread to take the soundings, and speak with a confidence peculiar to quacks (in which the regular bred professor never indulges) on this abstruse and perplexing subject. Confidence is one thing, knowledge another; of the want of which overweening confidence is notoriously the indication. What of that? Let Ganilh, Say, Ricardo, Smith—all Greek and Roman fame be against us—we appeal to Dionysius in support of our doctrines; and to him not on the throne of Syracuse but at Corinth—not in absolute possession of that most wonderful and enigmatical city, as difficult to comprehend as the abstrusest problem of political economy, which furnished not only the means but the men for supporting the greatest wars—a kingdom within itself, under whose ascendant the genius of Athens, in her most high and palmy state, quailed, and stood rebuked. No; we follow the pedagogue to the schools—dictating in the classic shades of Longwood—(lucus a non lucendo)—to his disciples.

We have been told that the economists are right in theory and wrong in practice; which is as much as to say, that two bodies occupy at the same time the same space; for it is equally impracticable to be right in theory and wrong in practice. It is easy to be wrong in practice; but if our practice corresponds with our theory, it is a solecism to say that we can be right in the one and wrong in the other. As for Alexander and Cæsar, said Mr. R., I have as little respect for their memory as is consistent with that involuntary homage which all must pay to men of their prowess and abilities; and if Alexander had suffered himself to be led by the nose out of Babylon and banished to Sinope, or if Cæsar had suffered himself to be deprived of his imperial sway, not by the dagger of the assassin, but by his own slavish fears, I should have as little respect for their memory as for that of him whose example has on this occasion been held up to us for admiration. Speaking of that man who has kept me awake night after night, and has been to me an incubus by day, for fear of the vastness of his designs, I cannot conceive of a spectacle so pitiful, so despicable, as that man, under those circumstances; and if the work dictated by him at St. Helena be read with the slightest attention, no forsworn witness at the Old Bailey was ever detected in so many contradictions as he has been guilty of. No, sir, the Jupiter from whose reluctant hand the thunderbolt is wrung, is not the one at whose shrine I worship—not that I think that the true Amphitryon is always him with whom we dine—he is not the political economist who is to take place of Smith and Ricardo. Will any man make me believe that he understood the theory or the practice of political economy better than these men, or than Charles Fox? Impossible. When I recollect what that man might have done for liberty, and what he did; when I recollect that to him we owe this Holy Alliance—this fearful power of Russia—of Russia, where I should advise persons to go who desired to be instructed in petty treason by the murder of a husband, or in parricide by the murder of a father, but from whom I should never think of taking a lesson in political economy—to whom I would say, rather, pay your debts, not in depreciated paper; do not commit daily acts of bankruptcy; restore your currency; practise on the principles of liberality and justice, and then I will listen to you. No, sir, Russia may, if she pleases, not only lay heavy duties on imports; she may prohibit them if she pleases; she has nothing to export but what some other inland countries have, political power—physical, to be sure, as well as intellectual power—but she does not even dare to attack the Turk; she cannot stir; she is something like some of our interior people of the South, who have plenty of land, plenty of serfs, smoke-houses filled with meat, and very fine horses to ride, but who, when they go abroad, have not one shilling to bless themselves with; and so long as she is at peace, and does not trouble the rest of the world, so long she may be suffered to remain; but, if she should continue to act hereafter as she has done heretofore, it will be the interest of the civilized world to procure her dismemberment, per fas aut nefas.

But it is said a measure of this sort is necessary to create employment for the people. Why, sir, where are the handles of the plough? Are they unfit for young gentlemen to touch? Or will they rather choose to enter your military academies, where the sons of the rich are educated at the expense of the poor, and where so many political Janizaries are every year turned out, always ready for war, and to support the powers that be—equal to the Strelitzes of Moscow or St Petersburg? I do not speak now of individuals, of course, but of the tendency of the system—the hounds follow the huntsman because he feeds them, and bears the whip. I speak of the system. I concur most heartily, sir, in the censure which has been passed upon the greediness of office, which stands a stigma on the present generation. Men from whom we might expect, and from whom I did expect better things, crowd the ante-chamber of the palace, for every vacant office; nay, even before men are dead, their shoes are wanted for some bare-footed office-seeker. How mistaken was the old Roman, the old Consul, who, whilst he held the plough by one hand, and death held the other, exclaimed, "Diis immortalibus sero!"

Our fathers, how did they acquire their property? By straightforward industry, rectitude, and frugality. How did they become dispossessed of their property? By indulging in speculative hopes and designs, seeking the shadow whilst they lost the substance; and now, instead of being, as they were, men of respectability, men of substance, men capable and willing to live independently and honestly, and hospitably too—for who so parsimonious as the prodigal who has nothing to give? What have we become? A nation of sharks, preying on one another through the instrumentality of this paper system, which, if Lycurgus had known of it, he would unquestionably have adopted, in preference to his iron money, if his object had been to make the Spartans the most accomplished knaves, as well as to keep them poor.

We are told that this is a curious constitution of ours: it is made for foreigners and not for ourselves—for the protection of foreign, and not of American industry. Sir, this is a curious constitution of ours, said Mr. R.; and if I were disposed to deny it, I could not succeed. It is an anomaly in itself. It is that supposed impossi-

The Tariff Bill.

bility of all writers, from Aristotle to the present day, an imperium in imperio. Nothing like it ever did exist, or possibly ever will under similar circumstances. It is a constitution consisting of confederated bodies, for certain exterior purposes, and, also, for some interior purposes, but leaving to the State authorities, among a great many powers, the very one which we now propose to exercise: for, if we were now passing a revenue bill—a bill, the object of which were to raise revenue—however much I should deny the policy, and however I could demonstrate the futility of the plan, I still should deem it to be a constitutional bill—a bill passed to carry, bona fide, into effect, a provision of the constitution, but a bill passed with short-sighted views. But this is no such bill. It is a bill, under pretense of regulating commerce, to take money from the pockets of a very large, and, I thank God, contiguous territory, and to put it into other pockets. One word, sir, on that point; I can assure the gentleman whose appetites are so keenly whetted for our money—I trust, at least, that if this bill passes, there will be a meeting of the members opposed to it, and a general and consentaneous resistance to its operation throughout the whole Southern country—and we shall make it by lawful means; quant à nous, the law will be a dead letter. It shall be to me, at least, as innocuous as the pill of the empyric, which I am determined not to swallow. The manufacturer of the East may carry his woollens, or his cottons, or his coffins, to what market he pleases—I do not buy of him. Self defence is the first law of nature. You drive us into it. You create heats and animosities amongst this great family, who ought to live like brothers; and, after you have got this temper of mind roused among the Southern people, do you expect to come among us to trade, and expect us to buy your wares? Sir, not only shall we not buy them, but we shall take such measures (I will not enter into the detail of them now) as shall render it impossible for you to sell them.

Whatever may be said here of the “misguided counsels,” as they have been termed, “of the theorists of Virginia,” they have, so far as regards this question, the confidence of united Virginia. We are asked—does the South lose any thing by this bill—why do you cry out? I put it, sir, to any man, from any part of the country, from the Gulf of Mexico, from the Balize, to the Eastern shore of Maryland—which, I thank heaven, is not yet under the government of Baltimore, and will not be, unless certain theories should come into play in that State, which we have lately heard of, and a majority of men, told by the head, should govern—whether the whole country, between the points I named, is not unanimous in opposition to this bill? Would it not be unexampled, that we should thus complain, protest, resist, and that all the while nothing should be the matter? Are our understandings (however low mine may be rated, much sounder than mine are engaged in this resistance) to be rated so low as that we are to be made to believe that we are children affrighted by a bugbear? We are asked, however, why do you cry out?—it is all for your good. Sir, this reminds me of the mistresses of George II., who, when they were insulted by the populace on arriving in London, (as all such creatures deserve to be, by every mob,) put their heads out of the window, and said to them, in their broken English, “Goot people, we be come for your goots;” to which one of the mob rejoined, “Yes, and for our chattels too, I fancy.” Just so it is with the oppressive exactions proposed and advocated by the supporters of this bill, on the plea of the good of those who are its victims.

There is not a member of this House, said Mr. R., more deeply penetrated than the one who is endeavoring to address you, with the inadequate manner in which he has discharged the task imposed upon him—in this instance, he will say, on his part, most reluctantly. But, as I have been all my life a smatterer in history, I cannot fail to be struck with the fitness of the comparison instituted by a historian of this country with the Roman republic, just as it was in a state of preparation for a master.

Of this quotation, I will, as they sometimes say in the Parliament, for the benefit of the country gentlemen, attempt a translation. “But, after the State had become corrupted by luxury and sloth”—in the Arabian Nights’ Entertainments, we are told of one who laid by his sequins in good money, and when he afterwards came to use them, he found them to be bits of paper, not worth more than old continental (or Kentucky) money—“by luxury and sloth, again the republic,”—and here I press the comparison—“by dint of its own magnitude, its own greatness, its own vastness, born up under the faults, the vices, of its generals, magistrates, and that, too, as if effete—(past bearing) since, for a long while”—I hope the comparison will not hold here—“for a long time scarcely any man had become great at Rome by his merit.” So, sir, it is with this republic. It does not sustain, by its greatness and growing magnitude, the follies and vices of its magistracy. Had this Government been stationary like any of the old Governments of Europe, of the second class, Prussia, for instance, or Holland, by the political evolutions of the last thirty years—I might say the last twelve years—it would have sunk into insignificance and debility: and it is only upon this resource, the increasing greatness of this republic, that the blunderers who plunge blindfold into schemes like this, can rely for any possibility of salvation from the effect of their own rash, undigested measures. It is true, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong; and elsewhere than in the republic of Rome and of other times, than the days of Cati-line, it may be said, "Haud sane quisque virtute magnus est."

"Tis not in mortals to command success!—

But do you more Sempronius—don't deserve it,

And take my word you won't have any less;

Be wary, watch the time, and always serve it;

Give gentle way when there's too great a press;

And for your conscience only learn to nerve it—

For, like a racer, or a boxer, training,

'Twill make, if proved, vast efforts without pain-ing."

I had more to say, Mr. Speaker, could I have said it, on this subject. But I cannot sit down without asking those who were once my brethren of the church, the elders in the young family of this good old republic of the thirteen States, if they can consent to rivet upon us this system, from which no benefit can possibly result to themselves. I put it to them as descendants of the renowned colony of Virginia—as children sprung from her loins—if, for the sake of all the benefits with which this bill is pretended to be freighted to them—granting such to be the fact, for argument's sake—they could consent to do such an act of violence to the unanimous opinion, feelings, prejudices, if you will, of the whole Southern States, as to pass it? I go further. I ask of them what is there in the condition of the nation, at this time, that calls for the immediate adoption of this measure? Are the Gauls at the gate of the Capitol? If they are, the cacklings of the Capitoline geese will hardly save it. What is there to induce us to plunge into the vortex of those evils so severely felt in Europe from this very manufacturing and paper-policy? For, it is evident that, if we go into this system of policy, we must adopt the European institutions also. We have very good materials to work with. We have only to make our elective King, President for life, in the first place, and then to make the succession hereditary in the family of the first that shall happen to have a promising son. For a King we can be at no loss—ex quo vis ligno—any block will do for him. The Senate may, perhaps, be transmuted into a House of Peers, although we should meet with more difficulty than in the other case: for, Bonaparte himself was not more hardly put to it, to recruit the ranks of his mushroom-nobility, than we should be to furnish a House of Peers. As for us, we are the faithful Commons, ready made to hand; but with all our loyalty, I congratulate the House—I congratulate the nation—that, although this body is daily degraded by the sight of members of Congress manufactured into placemen, we have not yet reached such a point of degradation as to submit to suffer Executive minions to be manufactured into members of Congress. We have shut that door; I wish we could shut the other also. I wish we could have a perpetual call of the House in this view, and suffer no one to go out from its closed doors. The time, Mr. R. said, was peculiarly inauspicious for the change in our policy which is proposed by this bill. We are on the eve of an election that promises to be the most distracted that this nation has ever yet undergone. It may turn out to be a Polish election. At such a time, ought any measure to be brought forward which is supposed to be capable of being demonstrated to be extremely injurious to one great portion of this country, and beneficial in proportion to another? Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. There are firebrands enough in the land, without this apple of discord being cast into this assembly. Suppose this measure is not what it is represented to be; that the fears of the South are altogether illusory and visionary; that it will produce all the good predicted of it—an honorable gentleman from Kentucky said, yesterday, and I was sorry to hear it, for I have great respect for that gentleman, and for other gentlemen from that State, that the question was not whether a bare majority should pass the bill, but whether the majority or minority should rule. The gentleman is wrong, and if he will consider the matter rightly, he will see it. Is there no difference between the patient and the actor? We are passive: we do not call upon them to act or to suffer, but we call upon them not so to act as that we must necessarily suffer: and I venture to say that, in any government properly constituted, this very consideration would operate conclusively, that, if this burden is to be laid on 102, it ought not to be laid by 105. We are the eel that is being flayed, while the cook-maid pats us on the head, and cries, with the clown in King Lear, "down, wantons, down!" There is but one portion of the country which can profit by this bill, and from that portion of the country comes this bare majority in favor of it. I bless God that Massachusetts and old Virginia are once again rallying under the same banner, against oppressive and unconstitutional taxation: for, if all the blood be drawn from out the body, I care not whether it be by the British Parliament or the American Congress—by an Emperor or a King abroad, or by a President at home.

Under these views, and with feelings of mortification and shame at the very weak opposition I have been able to make to this bill, I entreat gentlemen to consent that it may lie over, at least, until the next session of Congress. We have other business to attend to, and our families and affairs need our attention at home—and indeed I, sir, would not give one farthing for any man who prefers being here to being at home—who is a good public man and a bad private one. With these views and feelings, I move you, sir, that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

When Mr. RANDOLPH had concluded his speech—

Mr. HOLCOMBE rose, and stated to the Chair that he wished to make some observations on the subject under consideration. I have been, he observed, so patient and persevering a listener throughout this long discussion, that I feel myself entitled to the indulgence of the House

The Tariff Bill.

for a short time. The fate of the bill, Mr. Speaker, is no longer doubtful. Signs and indications, which can neither be resisted nor mistaken, have announced its destiny. It will pass, I doubt not, at least in this House, by a small but decisive majority. Such facts, on ordinary occasions, would seem to render all further discussion unnecessary, if not intrusive. But, when the policy of a great nation, in relation to one of its most important interests, is about to assume a new character, or, at least, receive additional impulse; when the manufacturing interest of this country, already under the protection of the Government, is demanding yet more efficient protection, in opposition to the remonstrances and hostility of a large and imposing minority, within and without this House, public opinion seems to require—public opinion, indeed, does require—from the friends of the new policy, the fullest exposition of the views and causes which have led to its adoption.

With such apologies, I come before the House at this late period of the debate. But, sir, I scarcely know how or where to commence my observations. The manufacturing question is utterly exhausted. The field of discussion which it presents has been so long preoccupied, so perseveringly explored, that neither fruit nor flower remains to reward the adventurer. If we refer to history for illustration, nothing can be more familiar than its examples. If to political economy, or the labors of the statist, their tables and statements, their axioms and principles, have been urged upon us, from every department of the House, by friend and foe, even to satiety.

Mr. H. observed, the general principles of the bill had been so fully discussed by others, that he would proceed at once to examine, as rapidly and briefly as possible, the principal objections which had been urged against it. The bill, Mr. Speaker, is combated on this floor by three interests essentially distinct; the agricultural interest of the South, the manufacturing interest of the East, and the general interest of commerce and navigation. For the sake of perspicuity, the objections arising out of the supposed hostility to the bill to each of these interests, will be noticed separately. The protection of the manufacturing interest is said to be hostile to the agriculture of the South. If gentlemen were able to establish the truth of this objection, the principles as well as the policy of the bill would remain, at least to me, entirely indefensible. For I have neither the right nor the disposition to advocate any measure calculated to build up the interest of one section of the Union at the expense of another. I have no personal interest which this bill can possibly promote. I support it, as a measure purely national in its character, intended to advance the prosperity, not of sections only, but of the Union; to equalize all our great interests; to promote, by its direct and necessary operation, the manufacturing interest; to promote, by the creation, or rather the extension, of the home market, the agricultural interest; and, finally, to promote the commercial interest, by enabling the American merchant, by the abundance and cheapness of the fabrics of the manufacturer, to adventure successfully in the great markets of the world; particularly in the opening and growing markets of South America.

The gentlemen of the South must pardon me for believing, as I certainly do believe, that they mistake altogether the ultimate operation of this bill, as far as their agriculture is concerned. It is true, we can only speculate upon this point. But it has always appeared to me that, if there be one section of the Union more deeply interested than another in the friendly operation of our manufacturing policy upon its agriculture, it must be the South, inasmuch as the creation of a steady home market for its rich agricultural staples must be to the South an object of vital and lasting consideration. The European market is at best precarious. A state of war impairs, and may extinguish it. Competition, also, seriously threatens it. The Southern planter, indeed, has already found in it growing and formidable rivals. Cotton, the great staple of the South, is at this moment extensively cultivated for exportation in three quarters of the globe, in India, Brazil, and, lately, it would seem, in Egypt. And the time cannot be considered distant when it must form no inconsiderable staple of the whole series of South American Republics. Driven, therefore, as, in a great measure, it appears to me it necessarily must be driven, from the European market, where is the Southern planter to find refuge and protection, except, indeed, in the home market, which it is one of the first objects of this bill to assist in establishing! And a refuge and protection it assuredly will prove, ample and unchangeable, (the derision and infidelity of gentlemen to the contrary notwithstanding,) if we will consent to extend to it, from time to time, that legislative aid which its necessities may require, and which its great national importance will always justify. The American market, at present, consumes probably one-fourth, at least one-fifth, of all the cotton grown in the South; stimulated to excess as that culture has been by the extraordinary demands upon it, growing out of the peace of Europe. Extend, therefore, extend to the cotton manufacture of this country efficient protection, and I mistake, utterly and hopelessly mistake, the genius and enterprise engaged in it, if, before the revolution of another national period—the period of ten years—it be not able to absorb all the surplus cotton of the South,—for a part of Southern cotton, from its quality, will always find a market in Europe; provided, no more additional lands be appropriated to its culture; and the quantity is said already to trespass greatly upon correct agricultural proportions.

But, the gentlemen of the South deny that the cotton market of Europe is in danger. They contend that they will always be able to undersell the foreign agriculturist in it. But, is not this confidence, Mr. Speaker, both dangerous and delusive? Can the labor of the slave be made as profitable as the labor of the freeman? And, if the labor of the slave be not as profitable as the labor of the freeman—and that it is not is almost universally conceded—how will the Southern planter be enabled to compete successfully, in years to come, with the millions of free agriculturists rising up and scattered over the immense and fertile regions of the Southern continent? He will be crushed by the competition; he must be driven from the market. There is, indeed, one method whereby the labor of the slave may be made more profitable than the labor of the freeman. The fact has been established; but, happily, not by the experience of this country, for the process is a dreadful one. It is by furnishing the wretched slave with the smallest portion of raiment sufficient to protect him from the inclemency of the elements, and graduating his coarse food to the minimum barely necessary to sustain, for the purposes of his labor, his miserable existence, stimulated into all its capabilities by the unceasing lash of the taskmaster. A state of society, of servitude, and suffering, not more incompatible with the public opinion of the age than unequivocally abhorrent to the sensibilities of the South.

But this bill, Mr. Speaker, is further said to be hostile to the general agricultural interest of this country. I must pass over very rapidly an objection so decisively extravagant. For where in the history of the world has the encouragement of manufactures ever proved hostile to the interests of agriculture? Look to the present age—go to the Lothians of Scotland; the rich agricultural districts of England; the kingdom of the Netherlands; the banks of the Rhine and the Elbe; the Rhone and the Seine; go indeed to every manufacturing hamlet, circle or city in Europe, and witness everywhere the refutation of this extravagant objection. Ask history—summon from the dead the Saracens of Spain, the Lombards of the twelfth century—the Genoese; the Venetian—ask the illustrious house of Medicis whether the fostering care which they awarded to manufactures, proved hostile to the agriculture of the beautiful region over which they presided? Even our own short experience amply refutes the objection.

Wherever manufacturing establishments have been successfully located amongst us, the country has, in all instances, flourished around them—exhibiting the strongest evidence of their friendly influence upon the interests of the farmer. And were we disposed to receive, with due courtesy, the representations of our constituents, our tables at this moment would be covered with memorials from our agricultural constituents—at least from those of the middle States and the East and the West, praying for the protection of the manufacturer—experience having dissipated their early hostilities, and convinced them, by the most irresistible testimony, that in the protection of the manufacturer is embraced their own surest and best protection.

But the bill, Mr. Speaker, is said to be hostile to the interests of commerce. This, if sustained, would prove an argument entirely unanswerable. Inasmuch as it would not only render a resort to excises or direct taxation necessary to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government, but involve seriously and lastingly the interests of the Navy. Mr. H. controverted this argument at some length. He maintained that it was opposed by the testimony of innumerable facts, and the universal experience of the commercial world—that commerce is directly promoted by whatever tends to promote national wealth and industry. That the bill, in its present shape, was as judicious a revision of the tariff as could be devised; and, consequently, that the interests of commerce and the revenue, instead of being impaired, would be promptly and decisively promoted by it. That domestic manufactures create a multitude of new wants, and furnish the means of gratifying them; and hence, consumption is increased; and hence, the loss which the revenue sustains by the lessened importation of articles manufactured at home, is more than repaired by the increased consumption of others; and that, if to these considerations be added the steady and extraordinary advance of our population, and the necessary increase of luxury, the interests of the revenue may be fairly regarded as secure from all future contingency and danger. As a striking illustration of the above positions, Mr. H. referred to the example of England, whose revenue has constantly increased, exactly in proportion as the restrictive system, for the encouragement of the manufacturing interest, has been enforced. Mr. H. contended further that a more rigid tariff than the present—a tariff for the ample and exclusive protection of the great objects of our industry, would, whatever might be its immediate operation, ultimately advance (and at no distant period too) the interests of commerce. Such a tariff, it is acknowledged, would extinguish some of the fountains of commerce—but open a fourfold number in their stead.

It is impossible for me to say, Mr. Speaker, how far the feeble encouragement which we have thus far awarded to our manufactures, has advanced the interests of the Treasury. But if numerous facts be not entirely fallacious, we have already reaped a golden harvest from the limited sacrifices which we have heretofore so reluctantly made. How is the present remarkably flourishing state of the Treasury to be accounted for, unless we refer it, partly at least, to the friendly operation of our manufacturing establishments upon our foreign commerce? The great markets of Europe are closed upon our agricultural productions. And we have lost, consequent to a state of general peace, the carrying trade of half the world. Besides, sir, from the cultivation of sugar within our own territories, and the lessened importation of West India spirits, the revenue, as formerly constituted, has been lessened millions. But, notwithstanding these fearful fallings-off (and fearful they would have been, and wide-spread and desolating in their influence on ordinary nations) we are steadily advancing in the career of commercial prosperity. Successive Treasury reports mock the predictions both of friend and foe. The canvas of our marine—I use, or wish to use no figure—still swells upon the remotest seas, and our flag yet streams upon every shore.

The Tariff Bill.

And where, I demand, are the realities of those gloomy forebodings—of those appalling pictures of national bankruptcy—of taxes, loans, and excises, conjured up, and so gloomily portrayed, to alarm the fearful and despairing politicians of 1816 and 1820? Faded away forever, and lost in the light of that general prosperity, of that energy and enterprise, of that industry and universal improvement, which is shedding a distinguishing lustre around the present moment, and illuminating, with the intensest brilliancy, the path of our future destinies.

I have spoken incidentally of the disastrous policy which we have pursued. One moment, sir, in explanation of this policy, of its origin, progress, and results. A state of universal warfare in Europe, by putting into requisition our entire commercial and agricultural energies, flooded us with wealth. Success, by intoxicating, lulled us into a delusion in relation to our real and permanent interest, unhappily as profound as it became universal and alarming. And when the shock of reaction, consequent to the sudden and universal peace which succeeded, awakened us from our golden dreams, we were absolutely astounded to discover that bread could grow in other soils, and enterprise flourish under other flags. Our great markets closed suddenly upon us, and the convulsion which succeeded forms a memorable epoch in our history, and would have proved inexpressibly jeopardous to the safety of the body politic, had not the redeeming spirit of our institutions interposed to save it from dissolution. And even at this moment, it is not difficult to perceive, that a silent but powerful cause of indisposition, if not hostility, to the manufacturing interest, arises from an undefined wish, from a lingering hope, that the circumstances of the world would again open to us the carrying trade, and the profitable markets of Europe. Thus, betraying a disposition to stake, as desperately as ungenerously, our great and lasting interests upon the contingency of foreign war, and the consequent miseries of the human race!

But this bill, sir, has excited the hostility of the manufacturing interest itself, particularly of the flourishing manufacturing interest in the East. A single remark, in reply to this objection. This hostility, ungenerous and unbecoming as it may seem, is perfectly natural. The manufacturer has perceived, and certainly the perception required no preternatural illumination,) that the ultimate operation of this bill, by bringing additional skill, capital, and competition into the business, will tend to lessen, rather than multiply, his profits. And hence his hostility. A fact worth a thousand speculations, urged, as they may be, with all the zeal and perseverance of the gentlemen of the South. Do not gentlemen perceive the dilemma to which this argument reduces them? The South combats the bill, because it will advance the price of goods, and thus operate as a permanent and oppressive tax upon its agriculture. The manufacturing interest of the East, on the contrary, combats it, because it will destroy monopoly, and reduce the price of the manufactured article below its present value, to the minimum of a living profit.

But, Mr. Speaker, is it a correct policy, to stimulate, at this moment, by additional protection, the manufacturing interest of this country? This is the more immediate question before this House? My views, in relation to it, are soon expressed and easily understood. To the manufacture of cotton and woollen goods, of iron and glass, flax, and hemp, and lead, and all other manufactures, the material of which we either possess, or can create in abundance, and which are indispensable for our security and independence in peace and war, I would grant ample, and, as rapidly as circumstances would permit, exclusive protection. Between these, and the innumerable other articles which constitute a great mass of our foreign commerce, I would draw a line of perpetual distinction. The first, as I have observed, I would protect amply and immediately. For the last, I would remain dependent upon foreign nations, or reserve as subjects for future legislation. This, sir, very briefly expressed, is the manufacturing policy which I am disposed to advocate, and of which this bill, as originally reported by the committee, was a fair exposition; a policy equally removed from the system of bounties and monopolies on the one part, as from the visionary and degrading system of foreign dependence and unrestricted commerce on the other. "A policy which purports not to protect the manufacture of gold and silver; not the velvets of Lyons, or the silks of Spitalfields; not the lawns of Brussels or the laces of Cambray; not the clinquallerie or the bijouterie of Paris or Birmingham, but such as we feel the want of in time of war, and such as may fairly be regarded as of prime necessity, or immediately connected with agricultural wants and pursuits."—Professor Cooper.

And this policy, whatever may be said or imagined to the contrary, is the growing, and is, indeed, already the favorite policy of the American people. It is an appeal to their interests, their patriotism, and experience, which, from its very nature, must be irresistible. And gentlemen may denounce the bill in the bitterest possible manner; they may originate for it, and affix to it, the most opprobrious epithets; and they surely have betrayed no lack of ca-capacity in this respect; they may hold it up to public reproach, to public execration, as high and as perspicuously as they are able—stigmatizing it as a tax, levied most unrighteously upon the agricultural community; as “an odious monopoly,” calculated to benefit the few at the expense of the many; as a “voracious idol,” which is to swallow up all the other interests of the country; as “a vast experiment,” got up for the amusement of speculative politicians; or, finally, as “a hateful and accursed measure,” which is to bring down upon the Republic dissolution, penury, and pauperism. But, sir, in despite of this host of imaginary evils—of this storm of epithets, which gentlemen have literally showered upon the bill,—its policy, the American policy of the Speaker—will prevail—will remain fixed and irreversible—its foundation being deeply sunk in public opinion—in the confidence, favor, and affections of the people.

It is with nations, Mr. Speaker, as with individuals; and the economy of nations, it has been said during the debate, should be represented in miniature by the economy of well-regulated families. I subscribe with pleasure to the doctrine. And the whole policy of the bill before us may be beautifully illustrated by the family of an American farmer. The farmer, in all the essentials of life, of food, and clothing, is perfectly independent. Accidental circumstances—a state of war, for example—brings to him, as it brings to every one, embarrassments and privations; but it does not, it cannot, abridge materially the necessities, or even the conveniences and comforts of his household. He is independent. But, independent as he is, he is willing to continue dependent upon other countries for the finer articles of clothing, and the luxuries of his table. And such is the nature of the independence which this bill contemplates to give to this country. I have not time to extend the illustration further. Yes, sir; it is indeed with nations as with individuals. And, if there be in national economy a spectacle more gratifying than the independence of an American farmer, it will only be found in that more extended and magnificent spectacle—the independence of this great Republic—with all its interests, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing, aided, sustained, advanced, and carried to perfection.

But England, gentlemen say, is tired of the restrictive system, and willing and anxious to abandon it. This fact, Mr. Speaker, if established, would prove a strong argument against us, inasmuch as we depend much upon the example of England for the illustration and defence of our doctrines. But what facts do gentlemen adduce, to prove that England is really tired of the restrictive system, and willing to abandon it? Is it from the occasional declamation which we hear, and to which we have been referred, in the English Parliament; or is it from the letters of English commercial agents; or from essays in English newspapers and reviews, written designedly to mislead and bewilder other nations—particularly this country? Is it from sources like these that gentlemen have deduced the proposition that England is tired of her commercial system, (the restrictive system,) and willing to abandon it? England tired of her commercial system! Sir, it is a system so interwoven with every tissue and fibre of her existence, that the relaxation of a moment would seriously endanger its vitality. England tired of her commercial system! England is self-styled “the fast-anchored island”—“the mistress of the seas.” Let her but abandon her commercial system, and the bark—the proud, proud bark—of her destinies, will be driven, almost instantaneously, from its innumerable moorings, and soon dismantled and a wreck, with the billows of the ocean dashing over it! England tired of her commercial system! England is the Queen of Islands—the great mart of the commercial world. Let her but abandon her commercial system, and this day and generation shall not pass, before she shall become desolate and a waste, and present to history, like the Babylon of the Apocalypse, a mighty and memorable ruin, from age to age, forever. England tired of her commercial system! But why should England be tired of her commercial system? Has it failed to accomplish any of the great objects for which it was established? On the contrary, has it not rendered her distinguished and wealthy and powerful beyond all example, and beyond all calculation? We are told in Eastern fables of gold unbounded—of riches inconceivable. We read in classic history of Plutus and Midas, and the golden sands of Pactolus. But these fables—these brilliant dreams of poetry and romance—have been realized—ay, more than realized—by the commercial system of England. Her land is the land of palaces; her streams are richer than the sands of the Lydian river; and her commercial and manufacturing cities present wealth more abundant than the gold of the modern Ophir, or the multiplied productions of the hither and further India. But, with all her wealth, England is, notwithstanding, gentlemen observe, the land of debt irredeemable, of paupers, and taxation. True, sir, true; the result, however, of every cause rather than her protective system—of her ruinous and interminable wars; of the bitter blessings of legitimacy; of kings and courts and pensioners; and that all-pervading and unceasing spirit of parade and expenditure, which, by the perversion of public opinion, is regarded as indispensable for throwing a becoming splendor round the altar and the throne; and sustaining, what Burke has absurdly denominated the grace and majesty of a great people!

But, sir, the very fact that England has been enabled to accumulate her immense debt, and sustain herself under its tremendous pressure, appears to me to carry with it strong evidences of the extraordinary influences of her system upon the resources and wealth of nations.

APRIL, 1824.]

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

There are several facts which so strongly illustrate the results of her restrictive system, that I must be permitted to present them to the House. The revenue of England has amounted, in a single year, the Speaker has informed us, to four hundred millions of dollars! An unprecedented fact in financial history. Again, sir, The annual interest of the English national debt amounts, at present, to between one hundred and fifty and one hundred and sixty millions of dollars! a sum greatly exceeding the whole interest and principal of the national debt of this country; and which, moreover, is sufficient to provide for, and maintain comfortably at one great public table, the entire population of the United Kingdom forever! But, sir, there is another fact which exhibits the resources and wealth of England to an extent still more unprecedented and extraordinary. In 1798, when the genius of the modern Cæsar was carrying the victorious arms of the French Republic over Europe; at a moment when the excessive loaning system of Pitt had excited dismay and consternation throughout the moneyed circles, and the kingdom itself seemed tottering upon the brink, if not of revolution, at least of some great convulsion—at this moment, I say, of universal despondency, the idea was conceived that the attitude of the nation might still be preserved, and the vast expenditures of the war successfully met by additional impositions upon the revenue and income of the people of England, or, in the language of the Exchequer, by creating the supplies within the year. The idea was adopted; England was thrown upon her own resources; and, in less than twenty-three years, in addition to the loans and the ordinary war taxes of the kingdom, already carried to the supposed maximum of possible payment or endurance, upwards of three thousand millions of dollars were realized from the internal revenues of the kingdom; a sum largely transcending the entire wealth dug, for ages past, from all the mines of all the world. A single remark more in relation to England. Contrast her situation, for a moment, with any other country that has pursued an opposite commercial system—with Spain, for example. England is, naturally, the land of mist and gloom; a comparatively barren island in the Northern ocean: Spain, the most delightful region in the temperate zone. Three hundred years ago, Spain was rich and powerful—so much for the industry of the Saracens: England, poor and resourceless. About this period, they exchanged commercial systems, or rather, they adopted new ones; and the result, after the lapse of three centuries, is before the world. England sways a sceptre, compared with which, the power of the Roman Cæsars shrinks to nothing. But Spain—sir, it would be as possible to give form and stature, and flesh and blood, to the ashes of her ancient kings, as to extort, by any possible means of legislation, from the entire population of the Spanish monarchy, the ordinary revenue of England for a single year. And yet, sir, such is the result, the splendid, the magnificent, the almost inconceivable result, of a system which is so bitterly denounced, even in its least exceptionable parts, in its application to this country!

The adversaries of the bill affect to regard it as a question, whether we shall, or shall not become, a manufacturing people. This is not the question. We are already a manufacturing people; the greatest, with the exception of France and England, in the world—at least in the Christian world. We manufacture, by computation, from one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions of dollars' worth of fabrics—similar articles of which we imported, or the greater part of which we imported, before and since the Revolution, from England, France, and Holland. The monuments of our dependence upon the old world, are yet everywhere visible. Within our immediate vision stands a house (and such houses are found in all the Atlantic States) built of imported materials, and constructed probably—for in many instances houses were so constructed—by European artificers. The progress, indeed, which we have made in every department of useful industry is unexampled. And if gentlemen would but look back and observe what we have accomplished for the last thirty years, by means of our own unassisted energies; and then look forward for the same period, and reflect upon what these energies—stimulated and sustained by protective laws, and operating on the rapid development of our internal wealth and resources, may and must accomplish, a single glance at the brilliant prospect would be sufficient—at least should be sufficient to remove all doubts—to extinguish all apprehensions, in relation to the policy under consideration.

But I despair of being able to direct the attention of gentlemen either to the past or the future. They are so deeply interested with the present moment, in combating the shadows—the Gorgons and Chimeras, which imagination has conjured up from this bill, that both precedent and prospect are alike lost upon them.

But the bill is further denounced as a novel project—as a vast and wanton experiment—as a bill containing new and extraordinary principles. Sir, it is neither project nor experiment. It contains no new nor uncommon principles.

Its principles, indeed, are as ancient as history; and have been incorporated into the policy of every nation, distinguished for success in commerce or the arts. A novel project! Sir, it is the policy we combat—the unrestrictive system of modern economists, the dissolution of all tariffs—which is the real novelty of the day. A system captivating in theory, but totally inapplicable to the present state and temper of the commercial world. The age of free commerce, like the millennium of Patmos, the reign of universal peace, is evidently reserved for times less stern than ours. The temple of Janus, we may confidently predict, will be closed for the last time, and forever, among men, before its revolutions commence. But to close my remarks—What, sir, is the real nature of the bill before us? of this “fearful, frightful bill?” of this “stamp act measure?” which is to be the precursor, if we are to credit the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) who immediately preceded me, of rebellion and revolution? of this “firebrand,” which is about to be thrown (not indeed into the Ottoman empire, but) into a region of spirits infinitely more fiery and formidable than Turk or Greek—the South? What I demand is the real nature—the pervading spirit—the grand design of the bill before us? Sir, the full front and face of its offending, is this, and simply this, to secure to American industry, by a liberal, progressive, and protective tariff, the monopoly of our own resources—of that vast manufacturing material, which nature, in her munificence, has everywhere created, around us, in immeasurable abundance.

I have nothing further to add, but to thank the House for its indulgence, and apologize for having trespassed so long upon its time.

FRIDAY, April 16.

African Slave Trade.

Mr. GOVAN, from the committee to which was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the suppression of the African slave trade, reported a bill respecting the slave trade; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this law, if any citizen of the United States, or any person resident therein, shall, in any port or place whatsoever, build, or in any respect fit, equip, man, load, or otherwise prepare, or cause to be prepared, or in any respect fitted, equipped, manned, or otherwise prepared, or be in any respect concerned in equipping, manning, or preparing any ship or vessel, for the purpose of being employed in the slave trade, or in the transportation of slaves from any foreign port or place to any foreign port or place whatsoever, for the purpose aforesaid, every such citizen or other person, so offending, shall, on conviction, be punished by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding seven years; and such ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions, and cargo, on board thereof, shall be forfeited. And any citizen, or other person resident as aforesaid, who shall voluntarily serve on board such ship or vessel, or shall sail on board thereof, knowing the same to be intended to be employed in the slave trade, or in the transportation of slaves as aforesaid, shall, on conviction, be liable to be punished by fine not exceeding three thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding five years.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to affect, or in anywise repeal, any acts hitherto passed for the prohibition or suppression of the slave trade; but the same acts, and every clause thereof, shall remain in full force, in the same manner as if this act had not been made.

The Tariff Bill.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill for the revision of the several acts laying duties upon imports—the question being on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose and said, the unsolicited indulgence of the House, to which he was indebted for the opportunity of presenting his views on this interesting subject to-day, instead of being compelled to perform that duty yesterday, under the fatigue and exhaustion of a long sitting, had laid him under obligations of which he was profoundly sensible. The only return, however, said Mr. McDUFFIE, which I can promise, for the kindness thus shown to me, is the brevity of the remarks which I propose to offer. At so late a stage of this already protracted discussion, I cannot flatter myself with the expectation that I shall interest the attention of the House by the novelty of my arguments, but must be content to indulge the hope that I may not exhaust its patience by their prolixity.

During the progress of this debate upon the various questions which have arisen upon the details of the bill, I have studiously avoided entering into the consideration of the general principles and policy of the protecting system. And I have done so in compliance with this general rule, by which I have determined to regulate my conduct, so long as I have the honor of a seat upon this floor, never to consume the time of the House by discussing any question which is not distinctly before it for consideration. I have the less cause to regret having thus abstained on the present occasion, because it is now obvious that the subject has assumed more than its usual interest, as well from the crisis at which we have arrived, as from the peculiar circumstances under which the question is now presented to us. In all the various stages of our proceedings, we have still had before us the opportunity of reviewing our work. But the question being now on the passage of the bill, whatever decision we shall make upon it, will be, as to us, final and irrevocable. And we are called upon to give this final sanction to the measure, with the fact clearly ascertained, that it cannot be adopted but by a very small majority. Waiving, for a moment, any inquiry into the policy of protecting domestic manufactures, I put it to gentlemen to say whether prudence does not dictate, even to the most firm and independent statesman, that a measure laying very heavy burdens upon the whole community—a measure which, however we may speculate upon the subject, the people must sensibly feel—a measure which has already produced, in some parts of the Union, the most intense excitement, ought to be adopted with a bare majority of the national representatives in its favor? Sir, a Government emanating from the people, and responsible to public opinion, ought not to be indifferent to this prudential consideration. I do not profess to be minutely acquainted with the Parliamentary history of Great Britain; but I hazard little in asserting that no British Minister, in the height of his ascendancy, would venture to pass even a tax bill for the public service, to the extent of this, with a majority so small as that which has ordered this bill to its third reading.

This measure, all agree, is part of a system intended to produce a great and fundamental change in the policy of the country—a change, to be effected by disturbing the relations which now exist between the different portions of the Union and the different classes of society. That such a change as this can be produced by legal regulations, operating, of necessity, as a tax upon the people, without exciting a strong feeling of popular discontent, not to say indignation, is an expectation which gentlemen delude themselves if they indulge. An acute and lively sensibility to every invasion, by Government, of the rights of property, is one of the strongest characteristics of freedom in modern times; and there is no people on earth more distinguished for it than the citizens of the United States. I therefore submit it, respectfully, to the consideration of the friends of the manufacturing interest themselves, whether there is not serious danger that a measure of this character, enacted by a lean majority, will produce a reaction among the people, which may result in the entire prostration of the system they are so anxious to foster and extend.

In soliciting the attention of the House to a very brief examination of the policy of this measure, it is far from my intention to enter into a formal dissertation upon the general principles of political economy. This is neither the place nor the occasion for such dissertations. My observations shall be confined to a practical examination of the question, in reference to the actual state of things in this country, assuming, as a basis, a few palpable and obvious principles, which have long ceased to be questionable in the estimation of the most enlightened philosophers and statesmen of Europe.

Whilst, sir, on the one hand I unequivocally deny, what is maintained by some, that manufacturing industry is, in itself, more profitable than agricultural or commercial, I distinctly disclaim the notion, maintained by others, that the pursuits of agriculture are more profitable than those of manufacture or commerce. All such notions are utterly erroneous and visionary, and are founded upon a misconception of what it is that constitutes wealth, and of the principles which regulate the distribution of capital and labor. What is wealth? The wealth of a nation consists in the abundance of those articles which administer to the necessities, the comforts, and the luxuries of life, according to the existing habits of society. It results from this, that a combination of the products of agriculture and of manufacture is essential to the wealth of a civilized community, such as exists in the United States. With the most unlimited abundance of the products of agriculture, we should be poor without the products of art; and with an equal abundance of manufactures, we should perish without the productions of the soil. It is conceded, on all hands, that we abound in articles of the latter description; and the only question to be debated is, how can we most advantageously obtain the former? Shall we fabricate them ourselves, or import them from abroad? To the common understanding of mankind, it would seem to be a self-evident proposition, that the cheapest mode of obtaining them is that which a nation ought to pursue, as it is certainly that which individuals would pursue, with a view to the promotion of their own interest. But here we are met with the argument that commerce is a barren and unproductive pursuit. A very few remarks will serve to refute this notion, which, when examined, will be found to be a mere verbal proposition. It is true that commerce does not produce either the one or the other of the elements of wealth, but it communicates value to both. Without commerce, the surplus production, both of individuals and nations, would be utterly valueless. Of what value, for example, are the surplus productions of the manufactories of Manchester and Birmingham, either to us or to those who produce them, until, by the agency of commerce, they are brought to our shores and distributed to the consumers? It would be precisely as correct to say that their entire value is derived from commerce, as to maintain that its operations are unproductive. Either proposition would be equally absurd. While, therefore, I view any proposition, which asserts the superior productiveness of one of the great divisions of human industry over the others, as being not only erroneous, but absolutely unmeaning and unintelligible, I admit that the wealth of a community depends upon the maintenance of a due proportion between them. And the question for a practical statesman to determine is, how is this proportion to be maintained, so as to produce the greatest aggregate benefit to the community?

On this question, if I may be permitted, and I scarcely know whether I ought to venture upon it, I will lay down a general principle, upon the authority of Adam Smith, who, notwithstanding the terms of sweeping condemnation which have been applied to his speculations, has done more to enlighten the world on the science of political economy, than any man of modern times. He is the founder of the science. All that has been since done is but a development or modification of the principles he established. What, then, is his great elementary principle? That labor and capital, if left to receive their direction from individual sagacity, will naturally seek, and speedily find, the most profitable employments. And this is founded upon the idea that individuals are more capable of forming a judgment as to what will promote their pecuniary interests, than the most enlightened Government can possibly be, from the very nature of things. This, however, is denounced as empty theory! Every thing, it seems, which does not result from legislation, from the officious restrictions of Government, is to be regarded as the operation of a ruinous theory. But, sir, I put it to the common sense and common observation of every gentleman in the House, whether this theory does not rest upon the most steady and immutable and powerful principles of human action—principles which never cease for a moment to actuate the great mass of every community. What stronger instinct belongs to the character of man than that which impels him to improve his condition? And what conceivable obliquity of perception can prevent him from discovering, upon a survey of the various pursuits which are open to him, that from which, with his peculiar capacities, he can derive the greatest profit? I can very well imagine the case of a rude and barbarous people, unaccustomed to the enjoyments of civilized life, in which a Government, despotic in its character, and rising much above the existing state of intelligence in the country over which it holds dominion, might produce great and beneficial changes in the pursuits of society by legal regulations. The Government, for example, which should conduct a people from the hunter to the shepherd state, or from the latter to the agricultural, would undoubtedly confer the most signal benefits upon the community. Such a change, however, could be accomplished only by a gradual improvement of the people, and by giving them a taste for comforts and luxuries to which they were unaccustomed. But, I will venture to say, that there is not a people on the face of the earth to whom a policy of this kind would be so utterly inapplicable as to the people of these United States. What, sir, is their character? Is there a nation more acute, ingenious, or enterprising, more keen and sagacious in perceiving the avenues to profit, or more prompt and energetic to pursue them? Do they need the direction of this Government to indicate the way to individual prosperity? Shall we undertake to enlighten the capitalists of Boston as to the most profitable mode of investing their disengaged capital? They would laugh to scorn the folly and impotence of such officious dictation. It will scarcely be alleged that our people have not a taste for the products of manufacture. For all the productions of human industry—for all the articles, at least, of which we propose to encourage the domestic fabrication, the people of this country have perhaps too keen an appetite. Indeed, the complaint of the friends of this measure is, that they import them in too great abundance. No legislation, therefore, is necessary to create a demand for those articles. In such a state of things, the general principle is indisputably true, that capital and labor will naturally flow into the most profitable channels of industry, without the control of Government.

But, to this general principle I admit there is an exception, which I will candidly state. And here I will take leave to remark, that, anxious as I am to defeat this measure, which I believe would be ruinous to some portions of the Union, and beneficial to none; yet I would not, if I could, accomplish this object by stating any principle which I believe to be false. An elevated morality, which regards the establishment of correct principles as more important than victory, should characterize our deliberations here. I admit, then, that when from the revolutions of trade or the progress of society a crisis has occurred in which a great and fundamental change must take place in the distribution of the capital and labor of a nation, a wise, moderate, and cautious legislation may aid in effecting the change, and is even necessary to effect it in the manner most beneficial to the community. But, sir, if we attentively examine the principles upon which this proposition is founded, we shall perceive that useful legislation on this subject is confined to very narrow limits, and that there is much greater danger of doing harm by transcending these limits, than by abstaining from legislative interference altogether.

What, then, are the principles upon which the interference of Government can be justified, in such a crisis as that to which I have alluded? In the first place, the habits of a community, operating with something like the force of laws, will induce an adherence to accustomed pursuits, after they have ceased to be profitable. But the principal ground upon which the protecting policy can in any case be justified, is the inability of infant manufacturing establishments to sustain a successful competition with their foreign rivals, even after the country has reached the point at which the domestic article can, with the experience of a few years, be fabricated cheaper than the foreign. And here, sir, the limit of the protecting system is distinctly indicated. It must be satisfactorily shown, that the protection sought is only temporary; and that, after a reasonable time is given to acquire experience and skill, and bring the domestic manufactories to perfection, they can furnish the domestic fabrics cheaper than similar fabrics could be obtained from abroad. Now, if we apply these principles to the actual protection heretofore extended to our domestic manufactures, it will be seen that the Government has already fulfilled its obligations to them in the amplest manner. Gentlemen have argued this question as if the manufacturing interest of the country had been unjustly assailed by some foreign power, and Congress had manifested the most cruel indifference to their sufferings. But is there the slightest foundation for either of these assumptions? The only power with which our manufacturers have had permanently to contend, is the superior natural advantages of the foreign artisan; and I will now call the attention of the House to the protection which our establishments have actually received from this Government. I venture to assert, that since the commencement of the restrictive system in 1807, the manufacturers of this country have enjoyed an unusual and artificial stimulus from our legislation; and I am perfectly satisfied that it is this extraordinary stimulus that has given them that voracious appetite for prohibition which nothing, it seems, but the absolute protection of all rival articles can satiate.

Manufactures not protected! Why, sir, during the restrictive system, our commerce with the manufacturers of Europe was almost entirely annihilated, and our own manufacturers had little short of an absolute monopoly of the home market. And here, sir, let me call the attention of these practical gentlemen, who so contemptuously discard every theory but their own, to the effect of this restrictive system, upon the distribution of the capital and labor of the country. During the five years of commercial restrictions which preceded the war with Great Britain, when there must have existed in the country a superabundance of surplus capital, suddenly disengaged from commerce, we find that manufactures, notwithstanding they enjoyed the advantages of a prohibitory system, made but a very slow and gradual progress. If gentlemen would duly consult this portion of our experience, I think it would at least admonish them to have a little patience. They would see that, under any possible protection, which legislation can provide, particularly in time of peace, when there is no extraordinary consumption of manufactures, these must, in the very nature of things, advance by slow degrees. It cannot be otherwise, unless we ascribe to an act of Congress the magical power of forcing on manufactures beyond the natural capacity of the country, either to produce or to pay for them. Yes, sir, it would be well for us to reflect that it is much more easy to diminish the consumption than to increase the production of manufactured articles, by prohibitory legislation. Such was undoubtedly the effect of the restrictive system. But the measure which gave the strongest impulse to our manufactures, was the war of 1812. And here it is worth remarking, that a war with England gives a stimulus to manufactures, which no other kind of protection can possibly afford. For, at the same time that it cuts off our trade with the nation that principally supplies us with manufactures, it compensates the diminished consumption of them by the people, by the extraordinary consumption of the Government. At the close of the war, the system of double duties was continued till 1816, when the existing tariff was enacted for the avowed purpose of sustaining those establishments which the war had brought into existence, against the extraordinary influx of foreign manufactures, resulting from the universal restoration of peace in Europe. And while I contend that the tariff of 1816 afforded a most liberal protection to the manufacturing interest, I most perfectly accord in the policy which dictated that measure. I distinctly recognize the principle, that, wherever large investments of capital have been made in consequence of a state of things produced by the necessary acts of the Government itself, the Government is under a moral obligation to extend to the interests, thus created, a reasonable protection.

But, sir, what is a reasonable protection in such a case? Can it be expected that the manufacturing interest is to be maintained permanently in the same degree of prosperity that it enjoyed during the war? That it is to be exempted from a participation in that general distress which has pervaded the whole community? This would not only be unreasonable, but utterly impracticable. Nothing but a perpetuation of the war could have accomplished so much for the manufacturers. What, sir, was the light in which the tariff of 1816 was viewed by the liberal statesmen who then supported it? It was intended merely to mitigate the shock which our manufacturing establishments must experience, in passing from a state of general war to a state of general peace. More than this was neither expected nor claimed by the manufacturers themselves. As the persons then engaged in the business had nobly sustained the war, gratitude mingled with justice in the policy adopted. But no intelligent man was so visionary as to expect that, when the ordinary channels of trade, so long obstructed, were suddenly opened, there could still be maintained, by artificial means, the same demand for domestic manufactures as before. It was apparent that many of the existing establishments must go down, and that neither the wisdom nor the folly of human legislation could possibly prevent it. And, sir, such has been the fact. Eight years of probation have elapsed since the passage of the existing tariff, and, if policy or humanity required it of us, it is now too late to relieve the distresses of those manufacturers who made their investments during the war. Those of them who have been enabled to sustain themselves till this time, under the extraordinary pressure of the four or five years immediately succeeding 1816, when the country was almost literally overwhelmed with the surplus manufactures of foreign establishments, can certainly maintain themselves now, when foreign commerce is rapidly returning to its ordinary channels, and contracting within its proper limits. Those who have passed through the furnace, do not require to be protected from the ordinary heat of the sun. And it is a fact that they now stand firm, and constitute the most prosperous interest of the country. As to those who were swept away during the disastrous period to which I have alluded, they are irretrievably destroyed, and beyond the reach of our remedies, unless, indeed, we had the power of producing a resurrection by an act of legislation.

It is obvious, then, that the protection of these establishments, which originated in the war, is not the object of the present bill. It does not even assume this modesty of pretension. Doctrines are now advanced, which never entered into the conception of those who advocated the tariff of 1816—doctrines which, though maintained by gentlemen who have waged a special war of sneers and sarcasms against the theories of political economy, throw into the shade the boldest theories of the French economists. We are now told that it is the duty of a paternal Government not only to protect existing interests against extraordinary reverses which it has contributed to produce, but to create new manufactures and new pursuits, by the mere energy of legislation. The people, it is said, are absolutely idle and in wretchedness, for the want of employment; and a gentleman from New York, (Mr. Wood,) who often edifies the House by his philosophical speculations, has told us, if I understood him correctly, that 80 per cent. of our population are actually in idleness for the want of pursuits to which their labor can be applied. These three millions of people, who are thus destitute of employment, as the gentleman has demonstrated by statistical tables and mathematical calculations, (the obvious and palpable facts to the contrary notwithstanding,) are to obtain employment by the notable expedient of an act of Congress!

[Mr. Wood here explained. His argument was, he said, that thirty-three per cent. of our population produce no more than fifteen per cent. ought to do. Thirteen and a half per cent. only of our population, he calculated, was absolutely employed in productive industry, and in this proportion was included the army, navy, and public officers, amounting to three and a half per cent.]

I am glad, resumed Mr. McDuffin, that the gentleman has removed an erroneous impression from my mind as to the extent of his argument. But, even modified and limited as it now stands, it will be difficult to make it pass current for a practical argument. Is it in the power of tables and calculations to make any man seriously believe, in opposition to the evidence of his own senses, and to the result of his general observation and knowledge of the country, that one million of our population are not only idle, but destitute of employment? Shall we be told, in a country like this, abounding with almost interminable wilds of fertile lands, that a tithe of the people are suffering for the want of something to do? Sir, there are innumerable avenues to employment in this country, and if any man were to make his complaint to me that he was without employment, I could tell him simply to go to work. That is the obvious remedy, a remedy in the reach of every one; and, if it were more generally pursued, there must soon be an end of this wretched and delusive dependence upon the quackery of legislation for employment. Sir, I boldly assert, that there is not a single individual in the vast extent of this Republic, that cannot readily obtain, not only employment, but such an employment as will enable him to improve his condition. This is the only country on earth where a common laborer, of industry and enterprise, can, in the course of an ordinary lifetime, besides comfortably supporting himself and his family, leave to his children an inheritance of real estate: and, with these facts staring us in the face, we are required to believe, on the authority of tabular statements, that the people can only be saved from suffering and discontent, by the adoption of this measure, to provide them with employment. The gentleman from New York, by way of confirming his general conclusion, has stated that the wages of a laborer in his vicinity, is only twelve and a half cents a day. In answer to this, I can only say to the gentleman, that, if his distressed neighbors will only make a transition from Long Island to any other point in the whole Union, even the most unfavorable, I will be responsible for their obtaining fifty cents per day. But, as the cry of distress has been reiterated until it has made a strong impression upon the country, I beg leave to recur, with a view to illustrate and enforce them, to some remarks which I offered during the discussion of the duty on cotton bagging. I believe the causes of the disease, and the tendency of the proposed remedy, to be equally misconceived, as to some portions, at least, of the Union. I stated, on the occasion to which I have referred, that the distressed of the country, such as they were, resulted from the change of circumstances occasioned by passing from a state of war to a state of peace, in connection with the excessive issues of bank paper, which threw forward and increased the pressure of the evil. During the war, there was a considerable proportion of our population—those engaged in the military service of the country—who consumed the products of the grain-growing States, but produced nothing. All those States which were near the theatre of war, found a ready market, and high money prices for their grain. To them the war was therefore a source of prosperity, and peace was, in one sense of the word, regarded as a calamity. And whence do we now hear the loudest complaints of distress? Whence come the most strenuous demands for the passage of this bill? From the very points of the Union which enjoyed the advantages of a war demand and war prices for their produce—New York, Pennsylvania, and the Western country. You cannot define the boundaries of any State more accurately, than you can trace the limits of the region of country favorable to this tariff, by the positions of our armies in the late war, and the multiplication of banks during that contest, and since its termination. Pennsylvania and the Western States supplied the Northwestern army, and I believe the Government paid as high as one hundred dollars per barrel, at the theatre of war, for flour purchased in Ohio; a State now unanimous for this tariff. New York,

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

every one knows, was in the immediate neighborhood of extensive and permanent military operations, and supplied numerous armies with provisions. Now, it happens that the very States I have enumerated, have been most afflicted with the curse of banks that did not pay specie, (a delusive expedient to perpetuate the war prices and war prosperity,) and have also been most earnest and persevering in their appeals to this Government for protection. New England, and the Southern States, on the contrary—States which sustained the privations of the war without the same mitigating circumstances, and from necessity regulated their enjoyments by the rules of a severe and self-denying economy, are now to be subjected to an onerous taxation—and for what? Not to relieve the other States from positive distress, but to restore certain interests in them, to the state of artificial prosperity which they enjoyed during the war. During the whole period of that contest, the Southern country was deprived of a market for its great staples, and there was nothing in the military operations of the Government to compensate the loss. Even if the people had devoted themselves to the growing of grain, there were no armies in the field to consume it, and that, like their cotton and tobacco, would have remained without a market. In this state of things they not only ceased to make any progress in wealth, but were compelled to contract their accustomed expenses, and use an economy before unknown to them, to provide a decent maintenance for their families. These habits made the return of peace, to them, the harbinger of prosperity. It is a dispensation of justice resulting from the very nature of things, that those who suffer the greatest privations in war, shall be least affected by the changes resulting from the restoration of peace.

But, sir, I will venture to assert, that the Middle and Western States have, at this moment, as large a share of the means of positive enjoyment as any other portion of the Union. Their distresses are relative, and in a great degree imaginary. It is not what they are, but what they were, that causes the prevailing discontent. The reduction of an inflated currency has reduced the nominal price of property; and the man who, a few years past, estimated his wealth at fifty thousand dollars, and now finds it only twenty-five, complains of his distresses as though he were in want of the necessaries of life. I admit that the Western people are embarrassed, but I deny that they are distressed, in any other sense of the word. Where is the evidence of actual suffering? In some of the Western States, I am informed, they have no poor laws at all, and such a being as a pauper is scarcely known. Regarding, therefore, the aggregate enjoyments of the whole community as the true criterion of national happiness, I should select the Western States as the part of the Union where the highest degree of prosperity prevailed. Indeed, sir, I believe there is not on the face of the earth a region of country of equal extent, where so few are suffering from poverty, and where the means of comfortable subsistence so abundantly reward the toil of the laborer. It is not distress, I repeat it, but discontent, that has excited this rage for creating wealth by legislation. To prove this, I will advert to another standard of prosperity, referred to, very unfortunately, I think, for his own purposes, by the honorable gentleman from New York, to whom I before alluded. He told us that the prosperity of a nation was indicated by the increase of its population; and then favored us with a beautiful disquisition on the comforts of matrimony, and the duty of a Government to promote it. I perfectly accord with these views of the honorable member; but I must be permitted to say that, according to the criterion to which he has referred, there is no other nation so prosperous as the United States, and no part of the Union so prosperous as that from which we hear so much about their distresses. And if the honorable member wishes to promote the cause of matrimony, I would advise him to send his twelve and a half cents per day laborers to the Western country. What, sir! a country which doubles its population in ten years, call upon the Government to relieve it from distress by creating new employments! The thing will not bear examination. The historian will scarcely be credited, in future time, who ventures to record it. Permit me to call the attention of the House to a few facts, illustrative of this part of the subject, which I am sure will not be disputed. In the States where the public lands are in market, you can purchase land of the first quality for one dollar and fifty cents—one dollar and twenty-five cents, says a gentleman near me—when land of the same quality is worth, in some parts of the Union, fifty dollars per acre. This single fact speaks more than volumes of declamation on the subject of popular suffering. Indeed, it may be safely asserted, paradoxical as it may seem, that the imaginary distresses of the Western country proceed from the very abundance in which they possess the primary aliment of national wealth. What is their complaint? Not, as one would suppose, the scarcity, but the superabundance of the necessaries of life. And here, I will observe, that nothing, in my opinion, has contributed more to the existing derangement in the elements of wealth in the Western States, than bringing the public lands into market injudiciously, and without any regard to the existing demand. The inevitable tendency of this policy, by overstocking the market, is, to reduce lands to the minimum price; and if that were fixed at fifty cents per acre, the land would command no more. The consequence is, that the people purchase large quantities of productive lands, which have all the constituents of value, but scarcity. And, because they have not every thing else in proportion, they are discontented and restless. And I will avail myself of this occasion to declare, that I will never give my vote to bring another acre of the public lands into the market, but under the strongest conviction that there is a fair and natural demand for it. Our very system converts our land into a mere drug in the market, and the people into speculators.

I will now take the liberty of addressing a few words especially to the Representatives of the West, on the subject of their own interests. A subject upon which I certainly will not presume to instruct them. But I am sure they will excuse a friendly admonition, when I state the particular topic to which it relates. I am well assured that the permanent prosperity of the West depends more upon the improvement of the means of transporting their produce to market, and of receiving the returns, than upon every other subject to which the legislation of this Government can be directed.

On measures of this description I have heretofore given them my earnest and cordial support. Most of my colleagues, and many others, who represent the Southern portion of the Union, have pursued the same course. As for myself, nothing will induce me to change my views or conduct on the subject; but I submit it to the dispassionate consideration of the Western gentlemen, whether there is not danger, that, by urging upon us a system which we believe to be oppressive, they will alienate the kind feelings of the portion of the country to which I have alluded, and lose its co-operation in relation to that system of internal improvements, which, in my opinion, is of more importance to the West than all the tariffs that can be passed in half a century.

I will also present another view of certain interests of the West, which are intimately connected with the portion of the country I have the honor to represent.

Gentlemen are aware that a very profitable trade is carried on by their constituents with the Southern country, in live stock of all descriptions, which they drive over the mountains and sell for cash. This extensive trade, which, from its peculiar character, more easily overcomes the difficulties of transportation than any that can be substituted in its place, is about to be put in jeopardy for the conjectural benefits of this measure. When I say this trade is about to be put in jeopardy, I do not speak unadvisedly. I am perfectly convinced, that if this bill passes, it will have the effect of inducing the people of the South, partly from the feeling, and partly from the necessity growing out of it, to raise within themselves the live stock which they now purchase from the West. It is at least certain that more will be lost in this trade, than is gained in that of cotton bagging.

The name of Hamilton has been introduced into this discussion, as a sanction to the heterogeneous provisions of this bill. I wish to God, sir, he were living and present, to vindicate himself from so unjust an imputation! Recurring to his recorded opinions, what does he recommend? That a heavy duty should be laid upon unmanufactured wool? The very reverse. He recommended not only that it should be imported duty free, but that a bounty should be given upon the importation. If you really desire to promote and protect domestic manufactures, it is our true policy to encourage, instead of discouraging, the importation of the raw material, so that the manufacturer may obtain it as cheap as practicable. But instead of this, you absolutely lay almost a prohibitory duty upon the raw material. Upon what can this be founded, unless upon the erroneous and unjustifiable policy of buying up different interests to insure the passage of the bill? I presume I may use this language without offence, as some gentlemen have distinctly avowed that they view this measure as a compromise of interests; or, in other words, that one provision is to be regarded as the consideration for another. But, sir, I do most earnestly protest against this principle, as one of the most dangerous that can be introduced into our legislation. Each provision should stand upon its own separate and distinct merits, and if it cannot be sustained in this way, it ought to be abandoned. But, in relation to this article of wool, it is a mistaken notion to suppose that you really promote the interest, even of the wool-grower, by laying a heavy duty upon foreign wool. The only effectual mode of benefiting the wool-grower, is to increase the domestic manufacture, and, consequently, the demand for wool; but you defeat this object precisely in the degree that you increase the duty on the raw material. Great Britain has recently made an experiment upon this very subject, which is not unworthy of our attention. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, with a view to reconcile the landed interest to a considerable increase of taxes, laid a duty of six pence per pound on foreign wool, which had, theretofore, been subject to a nominal duty only. The consequence was, that the export of woollen manufactures was rapidly reduced, the market for domestic wool, and consequently its price, were diminished, and all the interests connected with wool were seriously injured.

I will now invite the attention of the House to a few remarks as to the practical operation of this bill upon the community. Whatever may be its effect upon domestic manufactures, I speak advisedly when I say it will operate as a tax upon the people to the extent of at least four millions of dollars. And whether the proceeds of this shall go into the national Treasury or into the pockets of individuals, the thing about which there can be no doubt, is, that the tax will be paid by the people. If it shall operate merely as a revenue measure, it will not benefit the manufacturers, and is subject to the objection that it is unnecessary, and therefore oppressive, taxation. If it shall operate to exclude foreign manufactures, it is liable to the still greater objection of being not only an oppressive, but an unproductive tax. The people pay, but the Government does not receive. In point of fact, it will probably, for a short time, operate partly as a productive, and partly as an unproductive, tax; partly as an increase of the revenue, and partly as a bounty to the manufacturing interest. But we are advised to submit quietly to these burdens, and to be satisfied with the assurance that we shall, at some future time, obtain the domestic manufacture as cheap as we can import the foreign. Let us examine this idea for a moment. And I would remark, at the threshold of the examination, that it is not sufficient for gentlemen to show that the articles for which they claim protection can be made at home as cheap as they can be imported from abroad under our system of revenue duties; but they must further show they can be made as cheap as the foreign articles could be imported if there were no revenue duties levied upon them. Suppose, for example, that the gentlemen could clearly make out their case, that all the manufactures we import can be made at home precisely as cheap as we now import them, but no cheaper; and, to make the illustration more complete, suppose that they actually were made at home, and that the foreign importation had ceased. What would be the result? It is true we should obtain the articles as cheap as we do now, but we should lose the whole revenue of the country derived from imposts, and be compelled to resort to other sources of revenue. Even, therefore, in the case supposed, the country would sacrifice above fifteen millions of dollars per annum at the shrine of this anti-commercial system. And this is the strongest case which can be supposed in favor of domestic manufactures. The supposition that they can ever be made as cheap as the foreign fabrics could be imported free of duty, is too extravagant to be indulged for a moment. And yet this supposition, chimerical as it is, must be realized before any benefit can result to the country from this measure to compensate the great and palpable sacrifices which it involves.

The Tariff Bill.

Looking to the operation of this measure upon the different classes of the community, it may be fairly stated as its general result, that it will sacrifice the laboring classes for the benefit of the capitalists. And when I say capitalists, I include as well those who employ capital in some of the products of agriculture, as in manufactures. You propose to protect, by duties, not only manufactures, but wool, hemp, and even grain. Ridiculous as the duty upon this last article is, it serves admirably to illustrate the genius of the system.

Although the manufacturing interest makes the most prominent figure in this scheme of protection, the question is no longer between the manufacturing and agricultural interests, but between all those who produce more than they consume of the articles subject to duty, and those who purchase that surplus production. From this it is obvious, that but a very small part of the community can enjoy the benefit of this system, which operates as a permanent tax upon the remainder. As to the manufacturers, we know their number is exceedingly small in comparison with the aggregate of our population. But the smallness of the number of farmers who can be benefited by this bill, is not so obvious. There exists a delusion on this point, which is easily removed. It is supposed that the great mass of the farmers will participate in the bounties provided. But every practical observer must know in relation to wool, for example, that a great majority of the farmers can produce no more than they consume in their own families. It will be the more wealthy farmers, therefore, who will realize the advantages, such as they may be, of this compromise with the manufacturers, while the small farmers and the whole class of mere laborers will be compelled to bear the burdens of the system, such as they certainly are, without the slightest equivalent. No man has pretended, no man will venture to assert, that the price of labor will be increased by this measure. That, sir, the thing which most deserves encouragement, is left unbountied to its fate. I do pronounce it, that this is a combination, not only of the few against the many, but of the wealthy against the poor; we take from those who have not, and give to those who have. I speak with studied precision when I say, that those who consume what they do not make, are taxed for the benefit of those who make what they do not consume. These are the true antagonist powers of this system.

The experience of Great Britain, of whose prosperity we have had such extravagant descriptions, furnishes a most striking and conclusive illustration of that tendency of the protecting system which I am now considering. It is true, that Great Britain is a nation of vast power and resources. To the eye of a distant beholder, she undoubtedly presents a splendid spectacle. But history, while it records the achievements of her policy and her arms, says nothing of the condition of her people. If you but look beyond the dazzling surface, you will see a vast population pushing their industry to the utmost extent of their physical power, for a bare subsistence, to say nothing of the great proportion (about one-sixth, I believe, of the whole number) who are absolutely or partially dependent upon public charity. Yes, sir, the fact is so universally true in that country, that the wages of labor never rise higher than to the point at which the laborer can barely subsist and perpetuate his race—that it is laid down by the British writers on the subject as a settled principle of political economy. If, from disease or other casualty, a laborer is unable to work for a week, he runs the risk of perishing. It never enters into the calculation of the British laborer to improve his condition in life; and it is in the power of very few, even to lay up a pittance for the future. Such is the condition of the great body of the people of Great Britain, who have been characterized by the Speaker as the happiest people on earth, and held up to us for our special admiration.

But, sir, even if the prosperity and happiness of Great Britain were much greater than they are, upon what principle of sound reasoning can they be ascribed to her system of commercial restrictions? I am ready to admit, if gentlemen desire it, that her prosperity is derived mainly from her manufactures; but I unequivocally deny that these have been fostered into existence by the restrictive system. A few palpable facts of her history will render this apparent. Which of her manufactures have been the great sources of her prosperity? Those of cotton, wool, and iron, undoubtedly. Will any gentleman venture to say that these have derived their prosperity from the protective system? Where, sir, is the nation that ever for a moment held a competition with Great Britain in cotton fabrics, and against whom, therefore, protection was necessary? From the first moment of its existence, this manufacture in Great Britain, like the raw material in our Southern States, set all competition at defiance. Neither ever needed or received the protection of Government. Both have succeeded, because the countries in which they respectively flourish are peculiarly adapted to their production. The same remarks are true (though not so strikingly true) in relation to manufactures of wool and iron. On the contrary, those manufactures which have been forced into existence by artificial stimulants, are regarded by all the enlightened statesmen of the present day as so many obstacles to British prosperity. This is emphatically true in relation to the manufactures of silk. In fact, sir, you might as well tell me that the muscular energy of a giant is derived from the fetters he sunders into atoms, as that the prosperity of Great Britain is derived from her restrictive system.

I will now offer a few remarks upon another view of this subject, to which our attention was called by the Speaker. He told us that this Government ought to pursue, as nearly as practicable, such a policy in relation to the different portions of the Union, as each of those portions would respectively pursue, if existing as a separate confederacy. Let us then inquire what would be the relative situation of the principal subdivisions of the Union, if each were free to legislate for itself. And I will first examine the probable condition of that subdivision which the Speaker himself represents—the Western country. If that region were separated from the rest of the Union, and formed a distinct confederacy, how would it stand in relation to this very question? It would derive its supplies of foreign manufactures principally through the Atlantic States. I presume it would, because it has done so heretofore, and it would continue to be the interest of the people to do so. What would be the result? What power would they have in regulating the imposts upon foreign merchandise, and how could these imposts affect their interests? It is obvious that they would have no agency in regulating the tariff of duties, and would yet have to pay, indirectly, the amount of those duties, in the increased price of imported articles they would consume. In a word, the Western States would be tributary to the Atlantic States. When, therefore, the gentlemen from the West called upon us to adopt this measure for their benefit—a benefit which I am sure they will never realize—they required us to do what they could not themselves do, even if separated from the rest of the Union, unless indeed they would cut off all commercial intercourse, not only with Europe, but with the Atlantic States also. But how would the principle laid down by the Speaker operate upon a Southern portion of our Union? If that were a separate confederacy, (which God forbid that it ever should be!) what power could restrain it from pursuing its own most obvious and decided interests, by having a free and unrestricted intercourse with Europe? And when we are about to be deprived of this natural right, and to see our interests immolated at the shrine of a voracious idol, which devours every thing, and produces nothing, it ought not to be a subject of surprise that we oppose the measure as a direct invasion of our most essential rights. And, if I may be permitted to give an opinion as to the true interests of another portion of the Union, I would say, most confidently, that, if New York were a separate State, this would be a most unwise and ruinous policy for her to pursue. For, if there be a State in the Union more interested in foreign commerce than any other, it is New York; and I will add, if there be one more interested than all others, in the cotton trade of the South, that, also, is New York. Yes, sir, that commerce which the majority of her representatives now seem to condemn, is the true source of her prosperity and greatness; and there is no portion of that commerce so important as that which this measure is calculated to jeopardize, if not to destroy—the carrying trade of the South. Without this, the city of New York, the great emporium of the Union, would be deprived of half its wealth, and shorn of half its splendor. And here, sir, I will say a word or two in relation to a view of this subject, which seems to have great weight with the gentlemen who represent the interior of the State of New York. They believe that, by rearing up manufactures, they will create a market for their grain: but, do they not perceive, that commerce furnishes a market for this article, much more extensive than they can reasonably anticipate from the manufactures they can create? The city of New York alone, nourished and sustained by the very commerce which this bill is calculated to destroy, creates, by its consumption, a more extensive market for the grain of the interior than will be created by all the manufacturing establishments which this system will bring

The Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

into existence in half a century. Indeed, this idea of obtaining a market for grain, by forcing manufactures into existence—an idea which has made a very strong impression upon the farming interest in the Middle and Western States—can never be realized, but to a very moderate extent. In the existing state of the arts, manufactures are made principally by machinery, which consumes no grain—so that it would not, perhaps, be going too far to say, that the agents directly and indirectly employed, by commerce, in supplying the country with a given quantity of foreign manufactures, consume as much of the products of the soil, as would be consumed by the agents who would be employed in the fabrication of the same quantity of domestic manufactures.

While considering the operation of this measure upon the several divisions and interests of the Union, I hope I shall be excused for repeating, with a view to further illustration, an idea which I advanced at an early stage of the discussion upon the details of this measure, the correctness of which, however, has been since repeatedly denied. I stated, and I now deliberately repeat it, that the cotton of the Southern States, the great source of our prosperity, constituting one-third of the whole export of the Union, has reached that critical point in the competition with foreign cottons, when any material derangement of our commercial relations with Great Britain must inevitably expose us to the hazard of losing the market of that country, at least to a very considerable extent. If we cease to take the manufactures of Great Britain, she will assuredly cease to take our cotton to the same extent. It is a settled principle of her policy—a principle not only wise but essential to her existence—to purchase from those nations who receive her manufactures, in preference to those who do not. You have, heretofore, been her best customers, and therefore it has been her policy to purchase our cotton to the full extent of our demand for her manufactures. But, say gentlemen, Great Britain does not purchase our cotton from affection, but interest. I grant it, sir, and that is the very reason of my decided hostility to a system which will make it her interest to purchase from other countries than our own. It is her interest to purchase cotton, even at a higher price, from those countries which receive her manufactures in exchange. It is better for her to give a little more for cotton, than to obtain nothing for her manufactures. It will be remarked, that the situation of Great Britain is, in this respect, widely different from that of the United States. The powers of her soil have been already pushed very nearly to the maximum of their productiveness. The productiveness of her manufactures, on the contrary, is as unlimited as the demand of the whole world. She, therefore, has no choice of pursuits. Her surplus capital and labor must be directed to manufactures, or remain idle and unproductive. A demand for her manufactures is, then, from the very necessity of her condition, the primary consideration, to which every other must be subservient in the regulation of her commercial relations. To say, therefore, that she will continue to purchase our cotton, because she can get it a little cheaper than other cottons, after we have ceased to purchase her manufactures, is to suppose that she will be utterly blind to her own necessities; that she will, in fact, abandon, where it is most indispensable, that very policy which the friends of this bill now call upon us to adopt, in a spirit of reckless speculation, without considering that our circumstances are the very reverse of those which render such a policy necessary to Great Britain. In fact, sir, the policy of Great Britain is not, as gentlemen seem to suppose, to secure the home but the foreign market for her manufactures. The former she has without an effort. It is to attain the latter that all her policy and enterprise are brought into requisition. The manufactures of that country are the basis of her commerce; our manufactures, on the contrary, are to be the destruction of our commerce. And yet, in a spirit of blind and indiscriminating imitation, we are called upon to follow the example of Great Britain, by adopting a policy which will produce a result precisely the opposite of that which she has experienced of her policy; or, in other words, we are required to adopt, in deference to British wisdom, a system the very reverse of that which British policy would pursue, under the same circumstances? It cannot be doubted that, in pursuance of the policy of forcing her manufactures into foreign markets, she will, if deprived of a large portion of our custom, direct all her efforts to South America. That country abounds in a soil admirably adapted to the production of cotton, and will, for a century to come, import her manufactures from foreign countries. Under these circumstances, it is obvious that Great Britain will use every effort to stimulate the industry of South America, by the various commercial advantages she has it in her power to present, and to make up, by this new trade, the loss she will have sustained in being deprived of ours. But I must hasten to bring my remarks to a conclusion, lest I should exhaust that indulgent patience which, I fear, I have already taxed too severely. A few words, and I shall have done.

It would be some consolation to me, sir, if I could believe that the heavy impositions, which must operate so oppressively upon the part of the Union I have the honor to represent, would produce an equivalent benefit to other portions of the Union. If my constituents must be sacrificed, it would in some degree soothe their injured feelings, if they could have this excuse, at least, for quietly submitting to their fate, hard as it is, and unjust as they believe it to be. But even this humble consolation is denied us. We are doomed to suffer, under a clear conviction that our sufferings will administer no relief to the distresses, whether real or imaginary, of any portion of our fellow-citizens. We are to be made the victims of a system "which not enricheth them, but makes us poor indeed"—a system which wages war, not against our enemies, but our friends; not against the hostile regulations of other countries, but against the advantages of our natural position in the world, and the munificent bounties of an all-wise Providence—a system which has originated in discontent, and must inevitably end in disappointment. Against such a system I do most solemnly protest, as a palpable invasion of those rights and interests which I am charged to defend and protect. And I do beseech its advocates, as they regard the principles of justice, the interests of the Republic, or the mutual good will of its members, to pause before they give this bill the irrevocable sanction of their final vote. If, however, they should pass it, even with a majority of a single vote, I shall, as bound by my allegiance, submit to it as one of the laws of my country. I have endeavored, with zeal and fidelity, to discharge my duty as a Representative. I trust I shall never be found wanting in my duty as a citizen. I must take leave, however, to say one parting word to the authors of this measure; I thank God that, if mine is to be the suffering, theirs will be the responsibility.

When Mr. McDUFFIE had concluded—

Mr. MARKLEY, of Pennsylvania, rose, not, he said, to make a speech upon the bill, although such had originally been his intention; but he thought, after so long a discussion, the House must be ready and anxious to take the final question on the bill. He therefore moved a call of the House.

After the call was concluded, the doors were closed; four members only were found to be absent.

Mr. STEWART then moved to dispense with all further proceedings in relation to the call: his motion was carried.

Mr. TREMBLE, of Kentucky, rose to call for the previous question. He said he thought the present a proper time to finish the debate. It was known that one member was attending, contrary to the advice of his physicians, and two or three others contrary to the advice of prudence. He admitted that some courtesy was due to those who wanted to speak, but much more, he thought, was due to those whose sense of duty had brought them to the House from sick beds. He was one of those who had intended to present his views of the subject before the final question was taken, and some things had been said on yesterday which called for a reply from the friends of the bill; but he had predetermined to waive his right to do so, and hoped that gentlemen on both sides would consent to close the discussion. No tariff had ever been debated in cold blood, and the old members would support him in saying, that the debate on the present bill was marked with more temperance than on former occasions.

He hoped it would terminate in the same spirit of moderation and forbearance that had marked its progress. He assured the House that he made the call under a sense of duty, but in the full spirit of deference for those who might oppose it.

The call was sustained—101 members voting in favor of, and 98 against it.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose and demanded another count.

The CHAIR, in pursuance of a rule of the House, then appointed Messrs. RANDOLPH and TAYLOR as tellers; and the members on each side of the question were counted, by passing between the tellers, and returned as follows: In favor of the previous question 108, against it 95.

So the House determined in favor of the previous question.

M. WEBSTER then rose. He said he had been waiting in the House for several days, laboring under severe indisposition, in order to make a motion in relation to this bill, which was of vital importance to his constituents; but as he had not yet had an opportunity to do it, he moved that the bill be ordered to lie upon the table. Upon this question he requested the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered; and the House refused to lay the bill on the table—yeas 98, nays 110.

The previous question was then put, to wit: Shall the main question be now put? and passed in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 97.

The main question was then put, to wit: Shall the bill pass? and passed in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 102, as follows:

Ordered, That the title be "An act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," and that the Clerk do carry the said bill to the Senate to ask their concurrence therein.

MONDAY, April 19.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

The SPEAKER communicated to the House an address of Ninian Edwards, late a Senator of the United States, from the State of Illinois, complaining that injustice has been done him in a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the correspondence between the Treasury Department and the banks in the different States, upon the subject of the deposits of public money in said banks; exculpating himself, and also preferring certain charges against the said Secretary.

[The "Address" is of great length, and is dated at Wheeling, Virginia, April 6, 1824, and was sent back from that place, Mr. Edwards being then on his way to the City of Mexico, as minister to that new republic. The substance of his long "Address" was condensed in the conclusion to six specific accusations, prefaced and terminated with some exculpatory and deprecatory remarks, and with the bold avowal that he was the author of certain publications, known as the "A. B. plot," in which the same accusations had previously appeared. The following is this conclusion:]

I regret to have to say to your honorable body, that both the state of my health, and the want of time, absolutely compel me, most reluctantly, to close this investigation of Mr. Crawford's well-timed statement against me. In this situation, I beg leave to refer you, for further facts, of which I might, under more favorable circumstances, fairly and successfully avail myself, to a few of the publications under the signature of "A. B.," herewith transmitted.

Avowing myself the author of these publications, and, with the exception of a few unimportant typographical errors, and a mere verbal inaccuracy in regard to the time of a certain report's being made, reasserting, before your honorable body, and the nation, that the facts they allege are substantially true, I do most respectfully solicit that they may be taken as a part of, and be printed with, this communication. In order to strengthen my claim to this indulgence, combining all the rights of defence, of accusation, and of asking for investigation, which can entitle me, as a citizen of the United States, or an officer of their Government, to appear before your honorable body, I do expressly state:

1. That the honorable William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury, has mismanaged the national funds.

2. That he has received a large amount of uncurrent notes from certain banks, in part discharge of their debts to the United States, contrary to the resolution of Congress of 1816.

3. That, being called on by a resolution of the House of Representatives to state the amount of uncurrent notes which he received from these banks, he has misstated it, making it less than it really was.

4. That he has, in his report to the House, misrepresented the obligations of these banks, or some one of them, at least, and predicated thereon an indefensible excuse for his conduct in receiving those uncurrent notes.

5. That he has acted illegally, in a variety of instances, by making and continuing deposits of public money in certain local banks, without making report thereof to Congress, according to law; and

6. That he has, in several instances, withheld information and letters, called for by the House, and which it was his duty to have communicated.

His Oath.—Let it speak for itself.

For specifications of these statements, I offer the publications under the signature of A. B., above mentioned, and this communication; and, for proof, I offer that which they respectfully refer to.

All this I do defensively; for, if the facts stated be true, no rational man can doubt that they must weaken, at least, the force of Mr. Crawford's statements against me.

I will not charge him with bad intentions in any of those acts. It is more properly the duty of others to inquire into and judge of that matter. I do not ask for an investigation of his conduct. Such a request ought more naturally to be looked for from himself. But I will say, that if, being an officer of the same Government under which he holds his office, I have wilfully and maliciously misrepresented him, in the six foregoing allegations, it is a misdemeanor that would prove me unworthy of the office I hold. I invite him, or any of his friends, to make this charge against me, pledging myself to waive all notice, and, with all the disadvantages of absence, to submit to an investigation thereof by either or both Houses of Congress, and to abide by the decision thereupon. If this proposition is declined, I trust we shall have no more canting about an "A. B. plot." As to myself, I fear not the consequences of any fair investigation, for I know I shall be able, whatever may be the result, to justify myself to the nation. And never having obtained any office by the slightest sacrifice of independence, I never will owe the holding of one to reluctant forbearance, or the courtesy of my enemies.

I will only add, that, if any attempt should hereafter be made, meanly to take advantage of my absence, by those who have forbore to attack me when I could have had an opportunity of defending myself, I must beg of your honorable body, and the nation, to suspend your opinions, and to be assured that there shall be no avoidable delay in vindicating myself. I have in reserve much matter of defensive accusation, and should most certainly have invited your attention to the report concerning the Receivers of Public Moneys at Huntsville, and other matters of no less importance, had time permitted.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

WHEELING, VA., April 6, 1824.

Some desultory conversation took place, as to the proper course to be taken with this communication, between Messrs. A. STEVENSON, FLOYD, CUTHBERT, KREMER, TRACY, McLANE, of Delaware, and WARFIELD.

Mr. FLOYD moved to lay the memorial on the table.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved that the address and accompanying papers, be printed, desiring to see the whole truth, whatever it might be. Mr. WARFIELD called for the reading of the address, and the Clerk proceeded accordingly to read it.

The reading had continued about half an hour, when, the address not having been gone more than half through, Mr. WARFIELD said he was satisfied as to the character of the paper, and did not wish the time of the House to be taken up with it longer, as it would obviously require considerable time. Mr. BUCHANAN inquired what the object of the memorialist was, or whether he requested any thing specifically of the House? Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, required that the reading should proceed.

The reading having been finished—

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said, he was free to declare, now that he had heard the memorial read, that the style and temper in which it was written, manifested so much personal and party feeling, that he should then withdraw his motion to print, but for one consideration. It is well known, he said, that the distinguished individual whose character is assailed in that memorial, stands in a very peculiar relation to the public, and that every thing which concerns his character, in the smallest degree, will be regarded with the liveliest interest by the people of this country. Sir, we are bound to represent, not merely the interest of the people, but their feelings too; and they will not be satisfied if this accusation is prevented from going abroad to the world. This was all I meant, in saying I wished the whole truth to come out. I was far from meaning to imply, that any gentleman was not willing to have a full investigation of the subject. Mr. T. remarked that, although that House ought not to be made the vehicle of private calumny and detraction, nor be the theatre on which individuals, however elevated they may be, should settle their controversies, yet, when it was recollected how sensitive, how tremblingly alive the people were to every thing which affected the characters of those who stood in the same relation to the public as the officer who was now accused, he thought the whole of the charges brought against him ought to be published. If these charges deserved the character of malignity imputed to them by his worthy colleague, (Mr. FLOYD,) and he was not now disposed to contest the matter with him, or to give any opinion on the subject, that malignity would recoil upon its author. Mr. T. said he had unshaken confidence in the character and integrity of the distinguished officer who had been thus attacked, and he had no doubt that on this, as on all other occasions, the accusations against him would prove to be false and unfounded. He must, however, persist in his motion for printing.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that in the present delicate affair, the first duty of Congress was, to look to its own course, and preserve its own dignity. He had no idea that this House was to be converted into an arena on which prominent political men were to carry on their personal contests; or a mere instrument, through its power to order papers to be printed, of giving publicity to any thing they might choose to write against each other. If the gentleman from Virginia, who had made the motion to print, did not intend to follow up that motion by any other, he should certainly oppose it—as the only legitimate end of printing papers in this House was for information of members of the House, and not to spread it through the nation. But, if any motion should be made for a committee of investigation, it should have his support; and if the present motion to print, was only preparatory to such a measure, he should not object to it, though he could not consider it as very necessary.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, that when he made the motion to lay the memorial on the table, he had done so, because it was the usual course with such papers; but, since it had been read, he was disposed to have it examined, not, he said, because it purported to be a defence, but because it contained specific charges against one of our officers. Mr. F. said he was opposed to the printing of the memorial, until it could be examined by a committee, and determined, on more reflection and investigation, what ought to be done. This was due to the charges made. As to the rest of the extraordinary production, said Mr. F., it cannot be animadverted upon in terms suitable to it. The charges appear to contain nothing but a reiteration of those made by the A. B. conspirators; nor did I think the author of that plot would have ever had the unblushing effrontery to acknowledge himself such. This Iago, however, has chosen to acknowledge the fact, and reiterate the charges formerly made, and seems to think, that his late station as Senator, and his recent appointment by the President, as Minister Plenipotentiary to Mexico, will give a more imposing character to the plot, and that, under the sanction of his own name, with the authority of office, that may now be effectuated, which the anonymous writer failed to do.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

[H. OF R.]

Every member of the last Congress, said Mr. F., will recollect that two several committees were appointed to investigate this matter; and every one then seemed to consider that attack as the most infamous conspiracy that was ever formed against the reputation of any man. I am unwilling that this House should become the theatre for any political juggler, or the arena where individuals can come to adjust their disputes. I have too high a respect for the dignity of the House, and, I trust, for myself; but, as there is a specific charge, that may be attended to, I am willing to investigate it; though I will not admit that, because he has been a Senator, is now a Minister to Mexico, and enjoying the confidence of the President, that, therefore, his statements are to be received as he would wish them. The writer has not justified himself or defended himself from charges, which he says were made against him, but has cast imputations upon all who seem to have been in the way of his original design, which has been pursued with pertinacious malignity. Were this man's request allowed, and his calumnies printed by the House, would it not be right to receive and print also the defence of Mr. Dickins, or any other citizen? Why has he left the subject of his own defence, to attack the character of Mr. Dickins? That could not have been necessary. Mr. Dickins has a right to be heard as well as a Minister to Mexico, as, I trust, every other American citizen has, without regard to station, and when the two former committees of this House investigated this matter, his character was admitted by all to be good, and entirely unexceptionable. I, too, have heard this of him ever since I have been in Congress, though I should not know him, were we to meet in the street; and, all agree, that he has discharged his official duties with honesty and attention, which is, in my opinion, no small recommendation.

Why has this Minister to Mexico, who enjoys the confidence of the President, left the subject of his defence, and referred to the subject of the illicit introduction of slaves by a man who was the friend of Mr. Crawford? Is he to be accountable too for his friend's conduct? I do not know any thing of that matter, said Mr. F., but this I know, that one of the gentlemen who suffered by that attack, of which that memorial reiterates a part, has been here demanding reparation for wrongs suffered in that affair; I know him, too, to be an honorable man, and that he will have that matter adjusted. His presence here was known, I presume, to the Minister to Mexico, and he should then have taken up this part of his subject. One would think, said Mr. F., that the object of this political Caliban was more extensive than merely to do himself justice, or his scope would not have been so broad. The A. B. conspirator, however, ought not to have again attempted to consummate the object of his wishes, after he had, in such a sort, succeeded in obtaining the appointment of Minister to Mexico and the President's confidence. He had obtained the reward of so much toil, so much industry, and so many dangers, and he ought to have left behind him the honest reputation to those who had it, as it no longer proved a barrier to his march to the Mission to Mexico and the President's favor.

Look at it. Can any man believe, for an instant, from the manner in which this memorial is brought up, that it is not a deliberate design to operate upon those feelings which, at this time, so much agitate this country and this House? How all that volume could be written from Wheeling, on the Ohio River, with a reference to so many public documents, is more than I can comprehend, and more than I believe. There are two or three charges specifically made, and yet, from his absence, he wishes the public to suspend an opinion in regard to him, should matters turn out unfavorable to him, until he can get back. Why then make them? There are, said Mr. F., several persons in the Government, in whom I have great confidence—but I have more in myself; and I wish these charges to be investigated again, and justice done, though I do not doubt it will result, as did the inquiry by the former committees, which I had thought would have prevented all similar attempts; and, considering the question which now occupies the public, and his success in obtaining office, I did not think that one of those conspirators would have had the audacity, in his own name, to avow himself, and show his unblushing front to this House and the nation; though, if my memory does not fail me, I saw in the newspapers, whilst his nomination was before the Senate, a statement which I believed was authorized by himself, that he was not the author of that plot. Had he been known as the author of that infamous conspiracy, I think I hazard little in saying, that the Senate would not have confirmed his appointment. Mr. F. concluded by moving that the memorial and papers be referred to a select committee.

Mr. LIVERMORE suggested to Mr. TUCKER the propriety of withdrawing his motion to print the papers, that a decision might first be had on their reference to a select committee.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, observed, that he thought the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) somewhat mistook the character of an order to print. Mr. T. did not consider that, in doing so, the House lent its sanction, in any degree, to the document ordered to be printed. It was merely to enable the members to examine a subject at leisure, and understand it thoroughly. Here is a very long memorial, containing facts and argument, and much of it subtle argument too, of which it is impossible to judge without a deliberate examination. After it is printed and examined, it may appear that further inquiry is proper—or, it may seem to be unnecessary. I thought it premature, at this time, to give an opinion on this subject. But, as my colleague seems not unwilling to engage in the investigation, and has moved a reference of it to a select committee, my object of giving it publicity will be attained, and I withdraw my motion to print.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

[April, 1824.]

Mr. RANKIN wished that the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which the present document refers, might be referred to the same committee.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend Mr. FLOYD's motion, by adding, "and to print it."

Mr. FORSYTH said he thought much more importance was given to this subject than it deserved. It was an ordinary question to print a long statement for the use and information of the House, and not for the public. He was never unwilling to print any paper of public interest. During the many years he had been a member of this House, he had never seen any evil arise from printing papers. Whether the House ordered the statement to be printed or not, it would doubtless be circulated in the public newspapers, and he had no doubt it was prepared for that purpose. It was intended, he presumed, as a sort of legacy to the country, by the author, who was going as Minister to Mexico—as a mark of his gratitude for the honor of his appointment. This honorable gentleman, said Mr. F., was a Senator in Congress when the former investigations took place by committees of this House; the committee gave him an opportunity of disclosing all he knew of the allegations, and, after a full examination, reported that they were fully satisfied of the groundlessness of the charges. It was the duty of this Senator, as a public man, at that time, and while he was a member of the Senate of the United States, to hold up to the public every defaulter in office with which he was acquainted; but, instead of doing this, he waits until his appointment to a foreign mission is confirmed, and when he is about to leave the country, sends forth this precious paper, pretending to be a defence of himself, but in reality an attack on a high officer of the Government, to be circulated after he shall have been beyond the reach of any call on him to substantiate his charges. He does not ask us to go into an investigation of the subject; and Mr. F. believed that the writer did not expect the House would take any notice of his communication. That was not the writer's object; he only requests the House to put it on its files—to print it, when he shall not be here to make his charges good. This, I believe, said Mr. F., is the third impeachment exhibited against the Secretary of the Treasury, during the present session of Congress: one of them is by this honorable gentleman; another was by a certain John Henry—a name of evil omen in this country, said Mr. F.—[some member here said to Mr. F., that the person's name was Robert Henry—I am sorry for it, said Mr. F., as their designs were so similar, it is a pity their names were not the same. Mr. F. concluded by saying, he hoped the communication would be printed as a matter of course, and that the subject might go to a select committee for investigation.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, (who was not a member of Congress when the former investigation took place into the subject of the bank correspondence, and the alleged suppression of a paragraph in one of the letters,) said that, since he had taken his seat as a member, he had bestowed much attention on the report of the committee of investigation, and he was perfectly satisfied with the correctness of the conclusion which the committee had come to; but he was willing it should again be investigated, and therefore withdrew his motion to print the statement of Mr. Edwards.

Mr. SANFORD thought a matter of so much importance should be referred to a committee composed of a member from each State; that is, twenty-four members.

This motion was rejected almost unanimously, and a committee of seven members was ordered.

Mr. McARTHUR moved that the committee be appointed by ballot, instead of by the Speaker; which motion was also negatived.

Messrs. FLOYD, LIVINGSTON, WEBSTER, RANDOLPH, TAYLOR, McARTHUR, and OWEN, were appointed the said committee.

On motion, the committee were then empowered to send for persons and papers.

TUESDAY, April 20.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

The SPEAKER, by leave, presented the memorial of Amelia Eugenia de la Rue, heiress of M. De Beaumarchais, in relation to her claim for repayment of moneys advanced by her late father for the service of the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR expressed a hope that the memorial would receive the early attention of the House.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, chairman of the committee to whom was referred the papers in relation to claim, after some observations on its importance, gave notice that he should, on Tuesday next, call up the consideration of the committee's report on the subject.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

Mr. FORSYTH submitted the following resolution for adoption by the House:

"That the President be officially informed that this House has ordered an investigation of the memorial presented to this House on the 19th instant by Ninian Edwards, lately appointed Minister to Mexico; that the said Ninian Edwards may be instructed not to leave the United States before that investigation has taken place."

The question of consideration of this motion being called for, (a previous, but not usual question,) was taken; and there were: for considering the motion 61; against considering it 84.

So the House refused now to consider the proposition.

APRIL, 1824.]

Address of Ninian Edwards.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, then rose, and said that, connected with the subject, he would take occasion to say, that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) was absent from the House this morning, when that part of the Journal was read which announces the names of the persons appointed on the committee to consider the memorial of Mr. Edwards. As he believed that, from considerations of delicacy, the gentleman from Virginia would not wish to be a member of the committee, Mr. M. took this mode of apprising him of the fact, that he might have an opportunity of asking to be excused from serving upon it.

Mr. FLOYD rose, and requested the gentleman from Alabama, if his allusion was to him, to repeat his statement. Mr. M. accordingly, in substance, repeated his statement.

Mr. FLOYD then said that, in a case of delicacy concerning him, (Mr. F.), he had hoped that the gentleman from Alabama was the last man in this nation to undertake to make suggestions, and he did not think his doing so showed any delicacy on his (Mr. M.'s) part. I am, said Mr. F., the sufficient judge of my conduct in such a case. Perhaps the gentleman from Alabama may be acquainted with some circumstances of the A. B. plot, so called in the discussion last winter, and subsequently. If I know any thing of myself, however, I am capable of doing justice to every individual in this nation, whose conduct may be presented to me, in my official capacity, for examination. When a specific charge is made against a public officer, after the friends of that officer, and myself by name, have been called upon, through that paper which is the channel of every thing but truth, to propose an investigation, I thought it became peculiarly my duty to investigate the charge. What I think of the accuser in private life is for me to consider, and does not touch my public duty. Mr. F. here alluded to a friend of the gentleman from Alabama, (as we understood him,) who had for several successive sessions called upon this House for the impeachment of a judge, whom, it seemed, he had previously attempted to bribe, &c.; and here, he said, were charges one, two, and three, asserting certain accusations against the Secretary, and calling for an investigation. This, surely, was sufficient reason for an investigation being pressed by those thus called upon. The devil himself might prefer charges here—it would not change our opinion of that personage—but it would surely be a particular reason for an investigation by those who are implicated. So far as the gentleman from Alabama is concerned, said Mr. F., perhaps there may be other reasons for consulting motives of delicacy. When I do want suggestions of that sort, I should think very differently of myself from what I have been accustomed to do, were I to be obliged to go to him for them.

The SPEAKER said there was no question before the House, and the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama having been made and answered, the conversation must drop.

Mr. MOORE then rose, and moved that the gentleman from Virginia should be excused from serving on the committee.

The question of consideration being called on this motion, the mover withdrew it.

Mr. MOORE then asked to make a remark in reply to Mr. FLOYD; but the SPEAKER declared it to be out of order. Mr. MOORE wished to know if it would be in order to ask leave of the House to speak in reply? The SPEAKER thought not.

Mr. MOORE then renewed his motion in the following words, with a view in this way to have an opportunity of addressing the House:

Resolved, That JOHN FLOYD, a member of this House, be excused from serving on the committee appointed yesterday, on the subject of the memorial of Ninian Edwards.

The question being taken on considering this motion, it was decided in the negative, almost unanimously, and so this matter ended.

WEDNESDAY, April 21.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

Mr. McDUFFIE offered the following:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to furnish the President of the United States with a copy of the memorial of Ninian Edwards, recently presented to the House, containing certain charges against the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. McDUFFIE said that he regretted that the subject had been presented to the House at all; but, since it had, he thought the facts should be submitted to the President of the United States, that he might take such course as he may deem proper in this matter, it being a dispute between his own officers.

Mr. SAUNDERS accorded in the propriety of the resolution, and suggested an amendment, that the President be informed of the organization of a committee, by this House, to investigate the case. This course, he said, would not surprise the President. If the President should choose to recall Mr. Edwards, he would have it in his power to do so. He might be permitted to say, that the course of Mr. Edwards was not the same as that pursued towards Mr. Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, in 1794. Mr. Giles called for information, and boldly offered and supported his motion, and did not throw charges into the House, and leave them to pursue them if they could. The same course ought to have been pursued by Mr. Edwards in this case, instead of which he has departed hence on his way to a foreign station, and thrown his charges back upon those he has left behind.

Mr. WEBSTER said he hoped he might be excused for making a single remark, without going farther. It was obvious that the committee, which had been appointed, had no time to make any progress in investigating the charges of Mr. Edwards, at this session. He hoped the House had confidence enough in the committee to agree to the motion he should now make, which was, to defer acting upon this motion until to-morrow morning. With this view, Mr. W. moved that the motion lie on the table.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

[APRIL, 1824.]

This course was agreed to, without a division.

THURSDAY, April 22.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

Mr. FLOYD, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Ninian Edwards, vindicating himself and accusing Mr. Secretary Crawford, pursuant to instructions of the committee, communicated the following minutes of its proceedings, viz :

"The committee, to whom was referred a communication from Ninian Edwards, report the following minutes of their proceedings to the House of Representatives :

APRIL 21, 1824.

Present, all the members of the committee.

Voted, That the committee ought to proceed to make inquiry into the matters contained in the said memorial, and connected therewith.

Voted, That, for the purpose of such inquiry, the attendance of the said Ninian Edwards upon the committee, to be by them examined, is requisite ; and that his attendance be accordingly ordered.

Voted, That the chairman do inform the House of the foregoing resolutions of the committee ; and inasmuch as it is suggested that the said Ninian Edwards is about to leave the United States on foreign diplomatic service—

Voted, That the chairman do move the House that information of said communication, of the votes of the House thereon, and of the foregoing resolutions of the committee, be communicated to the President of the United States."

The latter proposition having been put into the form of a motion by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, and the question being upon agreeing thereto—

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said he had the honor, a day or two ago, of submitting a motion to the House on this subject, the object of which he had not an opportunity to explain, in consequence of a call for the question of consideration. The object I had in view, said Mr. F., was the same as that which the committee seem to have had in contemplation in their report of this morning. I understand this to be, to prevent any collision between the orders of the Executive branch of the Government and those of the Legislative. I understand the committee to have determined on calling Mr. Edwards before them, to ascertain what he has to say upon this subject, in addition to what he has stated in his memorial. As a matter of courtesy, that being the case, it is proper for the House to give notice of the fact to the President of the United States, that the individual in question might not seek to escape, under the plea of Executive orders, from the investigation which he has himself asked of this House to institute. The object of my motion was the same with that now before the House, and it appears to me that the form of mine was more proper than the form of that which has been submitted.

What interest has the President of the United States in knowing what are the votes of any committee of this House? All that is necessary for him to know is, that this House has taken up the subject for investigation. We do not ask from him any thing to enable us to exercise our rightful power in this matter, and our motives for acting are therefore of no importance to the due information of the Executive. The simple annunciation of the fact is sufficient. Under these impressions, Mr. F. moved to strike out all the above, after the word "Ordered," and insert, in lieu thereof, his motion, in the following words :

Resolved, That the President be officially informed that this House has ordered an investigation of the memorial presented to this House on the 19th instant, by Ninian Edwards, lately appointed Minister to Mexico ; that the said Ninian Edwards may be instructed not to leave the United States before that investigation has taken place.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, said, as the course pointed out by the committee would attain all the objects which the gentleman from Georgia had in view, he did not see why the change should be made. If the gentleman will attend to the terms of the proposition before the House, said Mr. R., he will see that there is nothing in it which, in the smallest degree, compromises the proceedings of this body ; that we are acting by our own inherent power ; that it is not proposed to call on the Executive Department, though a co-ordinate branch of the Government, for any ancillary aid. We are acting by our own virtue and power ; but, having done so, we have thought it proper to advise the Executive branch of the Government, that he might take such order on the matter, in his own exclusive sphere, as to him may seem fit and proper. And what more can we do ? I hope the amendment will not be adopted, but that we shall decide on this motion, and give to the chairman an opportunity to make a further motion, which he is authorized by the committee to make.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said it was true that, on a former occasion, when the gentleman from Georgia presented his motion, he (Mr. T.) did call for the question of consideration upon it. The reason why he had done so, was, that the subject had just been referred to a committee without any special instruction. The first question, it was apparent, which would present itself to that committee would be, Does the memorial contain sufficient matter to justify proceeding in the investigation of its contents ? That question had not been, in any manner, decided, when the gentleman from Georgia offered his motion. It was not until last night that the committee came to the determination that it was proper that they should proceed in their inquiry. This, Mr. T. said, was necessarily a previous question to be determined. For, if the committee had been of opinion that the subject was not, for any reason, fit to be inquired into, it would not have been proper to give to the President the intimation in question. After the committee had decided the preliminary question, the next step was to require the attendance of Mr. Edwards. The House will perceive that the committee propose to apply to the Executive for no power, but to notify him of the decision requiring the attendance of Mr. Edwards, as a fit regard for that comity and respect which is due from this House to a co-ordinate branch of the Government. Mr. T. believed that the notification of both these decisions of the committee was necessary, for the purpose of apprising the President of the reasons of this House for requiring the attendance of an individual who was known to be absent on diplomatic services, &c.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, did not see that any difficulty was presented by this question to the House. Here, said he, is a communication referred to a committee of this House, in the course of investigating which, the personal attendance of an individual, understood to have been recently despatched on a foreign service, is found to be necessary, and is required. All that the committee aim at, therefore, is to inform the Executive of so much as to show that business before us requires the personal attendance of one whom he has despatched, or is about to despatch on foreign diplomatic service. This is all that is proposed by the resolution now before the House.

Mr. KREMER, of Pennsylvania, rose, and observed that, before he voted on this question, he must know whether the committee can wait for the return of the person proposed to be sent for. He knew not, for his own part, where Mr. Edwards was to be found. The session was now near its close, it would be unnecessary to send for him, if, when he came, the House had adjourned, or the committee was not prepared to go on. If we do send to Wheeling, when our messenger gets there Mr. E. will be gone, and we shall be pursuing him from town to town, nobody knows how long. If it was in order, he should move that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion to lay the subject on the table was decided in the negative, by a large majority.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said the objection he had to the matter now before the House, would apply as well to the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia, as to the recommendation of the committee. He could perceive no necessity for the further interposition of the House, and it might be improper to call for it. We have referred the memorial to a committee, said he, with what propriety it is not for me now to say, and have vested that committee with full power to send for persons and papers. We could give no greater power. Under the authority already possessed, the committee were authorized to send for this individual, without our interference, and he thought they should do so. If the public character of the individual rendered it improper to compel his attendance without the interference of the Executive, it would be competent for the committee, without applying to this House, to request such interference. He had some experience of parliamentary proceedings, and he believed it unprecedented for a committee, vested with full powers, to call upon the House to do what might be as well done without their aid. He could easily conceive, that a subject of no great magnitude, in itself, might be clothed with much artificial importance, by such proceedings; and he saw no propriety in the committee reporting the journal of their private proceedings, from time to time, to this House. He was averse to the repeated agitation of the subject in this manner, to the prejudice of other business, by the daily or weekly report of the journal of the committee's proceedings. He desired a full and prompt investigation; the prompter the better; but he thought the committee had ample power over the subject, and he hoped the House would not be called upon to act unnecessarily in the business.

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, referring to the intimation, as he understood it, of the committee, that the presence of Mr. Edwards was so necessary that the investigation of the charges made by him could not go on without his presence, said he thought there could be no such indispensable necessity for the presence of Mr. Edwards here. The House would perceive, he said, that any individual, intending to do a serious mischief to another, might select a particular moment to prefer charges against another, and, by abandoning his position, preventing an investigation of his motives as well as his charges, leave an erroneous impression on the public mind. It was desirable that the accuser should be where he places his accusation; the common sense of mankind shows that the accuser ought to abide by the consequences of his accusation. But, if he flies from that responsibility, the investigation should not, therefore, be delayed. Such delay would be to furnish the individual with an opportunity of doing all the mischief he desired. Unless it could be ascertained that the individual in question could be brought to this place within a reasonable time, it was desirable, it appeared to him, that the investigation of his charges should not be delayed until he could be sent for.

Mr. WEBSTER replied to the gentleman from Delaware, as to the report made from the committee. It was certainly no unusual thing for the chairman of a committee to make a motion in this House, by the instruction of the committee; and, if a portion of the minutes of the committee were coupled with it, he did not see that that would alter the case, as to the expediency or propriety of the practice. With respect to the suggestion, which had been made, that sending for Mr. Edwards would procrastinate the inquiry, the gentleman from Georgia was not to suppose that the committee was going wholly to suspend this investigation, to wait for anybody's attendance.

Mr. McLANE, still fully impressed with the correctness of the view which he had taken of this matter, moved to recommit the report.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he hoped the motion for recommitment would not prevail; and he rose for the purpose only of calling the attention of the House to a fact, that the select committee have acted by the authority and in the name of this body, and that, whether gentlemen think that Mr. Edwards ought to be brought before the committee or not, the writ is now on its way; that it will be served upon him; and that he will be brought here, whether we vote in one way or another, on this question. In case this inquiry is to be prosecuted, said Mr. R., I cannot consent to act on that committee, except by the imperious mandate of this House, without the presence of the informer. The committee having first resolved that this inquiry should be prosecuted—that the informer should be brought before the grand jury, have reported the fact—for what? That the House, being one of the co-ordinate branches of this Government of ours, should communicate to the other co-ordinate branch, that which, in courtesy, the other branch ought to be put in possession of. What do we ask of the President? To aid us to bring this Minister before us? No; we need no authority from him. We will, despite of any man in this land, have him before us. If, indeed, he shall have made his escape from the country, we cannot follow him to Mexico; but, anywhere short of the Balize, the warrant of this House is as high authority as any known in this land, and, as such, I trust it will be supported. If I had thought that, in the act of that committee, the privileges of this House, the privileges of the American people in their Representatives, had been compromised, no consideration that man can name, would have induced me to give it my sanction. It was at my motion that the order was passed to bring the accuser before us. I hope the House will proceed as proposed. The committee have maintained the authority of this House, which I never will surrender, and have, in their report, acted to the Executive with that comity and urbanity, which, when it shall cease to prevail between the co-ordinate branches of any Government like ours, must throw every thing into confusion.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, said it had been, and should be, his course, pending this subject, to abstain from saying any thing in relation to the merits of it, and to abstain from exhibiting any thing like feeling in relation to it. In his opinion, the course which the committee had pursued, on this occasion, was a proper one. The Executive had probably given its orders to this individual, and his actual position might not be so well known to any one as to the Executive. Mr. C. thought it was probable that, before any process could reach him, he would have left Illinois, and might have reached New Orleans, and the information communicated to the Executive might be effectual to answer the end of the process of this House reaching him. Mr. C. concluded by repeating that he would not trust his feelings on this occasion, for he wished to suppress them, so far as to speak on the merits of this controversy, &c.

Mr. FOSYTH asked if he had understood the gentleman from Illinois rightly, when he informed the House that this person was now on his way to New Orleans, and about to pass thence from the United States?

Mr. COOK said that he had so stated, presuming it to be the fact.

Mr. FOSYTH said it was only what he suspected. The Parthian throws behind him his poisoned arrows as he retreats, and then flies beyond the reach of pursuit. But, Mr. F. said, he could not fortunately leave the United States before the process of the committee could reach him. The vessel which was to have the honor to bear him out, had not yet left the navy yard at this place, and, as he would scarcely venture to sail without the protection of the guns of the nation, he could yet be overtaken.

Mr. COOK said that, when up before, he had intended to suggest, that the vessel which was destined to carry Mr. Edwards to Mexico, was yet at this place; that by this vessel, information could be given to him of his presence being desired here; and that the only, at least most probable way, in which the process of this House could reach him, and he could be recalled for the purposes of this House, would be by means of this vessel.

Mr. FLOYD said that the committee had thought it necessary that this individual should be present during the examination of his charges. They were perfectly aware that the authority with which they were invested by the House, was sufficient for all the purposes of bringing him here, and, in the course which they had pursued, had no object but to give the President of the United States, in a respectful manner, information of the course which it had been thought proper, by the committee, to pursue; and he hoped the opposition to it would be withdrawn.

Mr. McLANE said he was not anxious to embarrass the proceedings by the motion which he had made, under the conviction, in his own mind, that the President ought not to be called upon to do what the House has the perfect power to do. He was anxious for this investigation to go on. He thought, with the gentleman from Virginia, that the informer on this occasion ought to be present; but he thought, also, that the whole matter was already within the power of the committee. To save trouble to the House, however, he would withdraw his motion for recommitment.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, said the House had given the committee all the powers which it possesses in relation to this matter. The question is now, whether it is necessary to call upon the House to aid the committee to carry its powers into execution. The committee have all the powers of this House on the subject, and have certainly the same power to communicate the fact of their proceedings to the President, that this House has, and on the same principle on which they would have power to ask information from him.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he had not offered his first motion on this subject (that which the House refused to consider) before this House had referred the inquiry into the subject to a committee, with power to send for persons and papers. It appeared to him, he said, at the time he made the motion, that such a proceeding was absolutely due, in courtesy to the Executive. Perhaps, he said, he had some little feeling on this subject, arising from the difference of the manner in which his proposition, and the nearly similar one of another gentleman, had been received. He saw no necessity, however, for pressing his amendment, though he could not see any occasion for all this particularity on the subject. In deference, therefore, to the wishes of several of his friends, whose opinions he always respected, he withdrew his motion for amendment.

The question recurring on the report of the committee—

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, said he was rather sorry that the gentleman from Georgia had withdrawn his motion, because it was perfectly free from any ambiguity, which the proposition of the committee was not. If the amendment had prevailed, however, he could not have voted, for this reason: He was one of those who hoped, the other day, that the motion for printing the memorial would have prevailed, and that he should thus have been enabled to judge of the necessity of the presence of the accuser. At present, he said, he did not feel himself competent to decide whether his presence was necessary or not. He, for one, moreover, was not willing to notify the President that the committee thought the interposition of the authority of the House necessary, because the committee are themselves competent to do it, and, if they think proper, it is their duty to do it. There was another consideration on this subject, which Mr. F. thought must occur to the mind of every one. Is it possible, is it probable, at any rate, that Congress will remain in session for two months to have the presence of this gentleman? It would take a month to give notice to this individual, another month to get him here, and after he got here, the investigation of the case by the committee would not occupy less than two or three weeks. A full investigation of this case, Mr. F. hoped, would take place at the next session. Under the present circumstances, he saw no occasion for giving information to the President of the opinion of the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT, of New Hampshire, said he was desirous of understanding rightly what was the object of the motion before the House. If he had a correct view of it, some other gentlemen who had spoken had not. It had been suggested, that there was not time to send for this person, and that the House ought not to give this notice to the Executive, because by so doing it would commit itself. Those questions, said Mr. B., are not now before the House. The House has confided the question to a select committee; that committee has decided it, and it is a question no longer to be discussed. I do not understand the resolution as it is understood by one gentleman, as being intended to give facility to the execution of the power which the committee have undertaken to exercise, but as intending this, and nothing more: that this person, whom the committee have sent for, who, they have said, shall come here, and who, I have no doubt, will come here, is a person whom the President, with the consent of the Senate, has ordered on service to a foreign Government. Some time ago, we gave to the President power to appoint Ministers to certain Governments, whenever he should think it expedient to do so. We have, by the act of our committee, temporarily revoked that power so far as he has exercised it in this particular instance. He has said, that Ninian Edwards shall be Minister to Mexico; we have said, that he shall not go. If the United States have great interests at stake in Mexico, and it is necessary we should have a Minister there, it is proper that we should inform the President that the person whom he has appointed for that purpose we have recalled. If the President sent him, and we, in the plenitude of our power, ordered him back, is it not necessary that the President should be informed of the fact? It had been suggested, that the committee has the power to communicate this information to the President. My opinion, said Mr. B., is, that they have not. They have not the power to communicate directly with the President on the subject, but they have the power to give information on the subject to this House, of which they are the organ, and the information being so given, the question now is, whether it be proper to give it to the Executive. If the appointment of a Minister was necessary, it continues to be so. If it was necessary a month ago, no change of circumstances having occurred, the interest of the country now equally demands that a Minister proceed directly to Mexico; in which case it might be necessary for the President, on receiving this information, to designate some other person for this station, &c.

Mr. BUCK, of Vermont, made a few observations, the import of which were, that it was not material whether this information were given to the Executive by the committee, or by a vote of this House—so that whether the present proposition was agreed to or not, appeared to him to be of little importance.

The question was then taken on the report of the committee, as above stated, and it was agreed to, almost without a dissenting voice.

Mr. FLOYD then moved that the Clerk of this House be directed to adopt measures to expedite the printing of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon which the said communication is founded, and that the said communication, with its accompanying documents, be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. Ninian Edwards notified by the President not to Depart from the United States.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In conformity with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of yesterday, I have received a copy of the proceedings of the committee to whom was referred a communication from Ninian Edwards, lately appointed a Minister Plenipotentiary to Mexico, in which it is decided that his attendance in this city, for the purpose of being examined by the committee, on matters contained in the said communication, was requisite. As soon as I was apprised that such a communication had been made to the House, anticipating that the attendance of Mr. Edwards might be desired, for the purpose stated, I thought it proper that he should be informed thereof, and instructed him not to proceed on his mission, but to await such call as might be made on him, either by the House, or its committee; and, in consequence, a letter was addressed to him to that effect, by the Secretary of State.

Public Lands—Pre-emption System—Adverse Report.

Mr. WHIPPLE, from the Committee on Public Lands, who were instructed by resolutions passed by the House, on the 31st December, 1823, and the 2d and 28d of January last, to inquire into the expediency of granting pre-emption rights in the purchase of public lands, in certain cases, and to whom was referred the petition of Hardy Doyal and George Caperton, and the petition of L. C. Davis, made a report thereon; which was laid on the table.

The report is as follows:

Before adverting to the particular cases embraced by the resolutions and petitions referred, the committee deem it proper to make some general observations on the subject of pre-emption grants, as connected with the general policy of the Government in relation to the public lands.

By reference to the various laws on the subject of pre-emptions, it will be perceived that, where the United States have acquired territory where settlements existed at the time of the acquisition, the persons having made such settlements have been permitted by the Government to retain their lands by paying therefor the minimum price, subject to a reasonable limitation as to the quantity to be retained.

In cases where territory has been acquired from foreign powers by treaty, this privilege has been extended to the period in which the United States took the actual possession of the ceded territory. Some modifications of these principles have, at times, and under particular circumstances, existed, but the main principle has been generally adhered to.

The committee are of opinion that an extension of these principles would be injurious to the Government, as well as to those who may hereafter become the purchasers of the public lands, and probably to those, also, who may venture to settle upon Government lands without authority hereafter.

It cannot be perceived by what principle persons having no color of title should, after lands on which they have settled were known to belong to the United States at the time of making such settlement, claim the pre-emption right to such lands.

Should the Government sanction applications of this nature, an inducement would be offered to persons of an enterprising disposition to anticipate, in every quarter, the Government in its sales of the public lands, and to settle upon and improve the most valuable tracts of land, which they would claim at the minimum price, whenever such lands were brought into market by authority of the United States.

Purchasers of land finding themselves prevented from acquiring good lands, would abstain from purchases, and resort to illegal settlements, in the hope of obtaining that at the minimum value, which they could not obtain at fair and open sale.

Thus, a competition would be excited among a certain description of our population, to locate themselves upon the public lands without much regard to lines or boundaries, and with very little respect for the rights either of the Government or their Indian neighbors.

When it might become necessary for the Government to offer for sale the tracts on which these settlements had been made, the persons interested would find arguments at hand, in their poverty and distress, and the situation of their families, to show why they should be permitted to retain their homes and their improvements.

Abuses like these would necessarily attract the attention of the Government, and induce Congress to adopt rigorous measures to repress them, by which many who had thus precipitately made unauthorized settlements would be deprived of their labor, and again be compelled to begin anew, thus losing the labor of years.

A system of indulgence to those who trespass by making unauthorized settlements upon the lands of the United States, after those lands are known to be the property of the Government, would, in the opinion of the committee, be productive of much perplexity to the Government, as well as of injury to those concerned in the purchase and settlement of the national domain.

The committee will now proceed to consider the several resolutions and petitions referred to them, which relate either to pre-emption rights or to indulgences prayed for by those who have made unauthorized settlements upon the public lands.

By the resolution of December 31st, 1823, the committee are "instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of granting to actual settlers in that part of the State of Louisiana, lying east of the Mississippi and island of New Orleans, a right of pre-emption to public lands, in the same manner, and for the same period of time after possession thereof by the Government of the United States, as was granted to such settlers in the late Territory of Orleans, after possession thereof as aforesaid."

It will be perceived, by reference to the act of Congress of April 12th, 1814, that pre-emption rights were granted to actual settlers in that part of the State of Louisiana west of the river Mississippi, up to the date of said act, that is, to the 12th April, 1814.

APRIL, 1824.]

Public Lands—Pre-emption System—Adverse Report.

[H. OF R.]

The United States took possession of this portion of the State of Louisiana on the 10th of December, 1808, consequently, settlers for a period of eleven years after the possession of the territory of Orleans by the United States, had the right of pre-emption of the lands on which they had settled secured to them.

In that portion of the State of Louisiana which lies east of the river Mississippi and Island of New Orleans, a different rule was adopted.

The Government did not get possession of this portion of the ceded territory until the autumn of 1810; prior to which time it was under the Government of Spain, consequently, settlers in this portion of the territory had the right of pre-emption secured to them by the act of 1814, only for a period of four years after the possession by the United States.

The resolution, therefore, contemplates extending to all who had made settlements on the public lands of the United States, in the portion of the State of Louisiana east of the river Mississippi, up to the year 1821, the right of pre-emption of the land on which they have settled.

The committee deem it inexpedient to extend the right of pre-emption in this manner.

The act of the 12th April, 1814, extended equally to all portions of the State of Louisiana, and if any inequality existed in the situation of the people of different sections of the State, this circumstance ought not of itself to be made ground of claim upon the Government. Those who reside east of the river Mississippi and Island of New Orleans, had, by that law, the right of retaining their lands at the minimum value, although they had settled on them without leave of the Government, four years after the lands were, by solemn transfer and formal possession, known to be the property of the United States; the Government has, therefore, treated these settlers with great lenity and indulgence; and if some of their neighbors have, by the peculiarity of their situations, derived greater benefits from the act of 12th April, 1814, the committee cannot, on this account, be induced to deem it proper to sanction the principle that persons ought to be encouraged to settle upon the public lands for ten or eleven years after they are known to be the property of the United States. It may, however, be doubted, whether the act of 1814 has not operated nearly equally upon the settlers on the public lands within the State of Louisiana. It was well known by the people, that the whole territory acquired by the treaty ceding Louisiana to the United States, would ultimately fall under their Government, and there can be little doubt that many settlements were made within the territory in anticipation of this event; hence, the time of taking possession of different portions of that tract of country, could produce very little inequality with respect to those who had pre-emption rights granted them by the act of the 12th April, 1814.

By the resolution of January 2d, 1824, the committee are instructed "to inquire into the expediency of granting the right of pre-emption to all persons to mill seats on public lands, where the same may have been actually improved as such by them."

It will be readily perceived that, if the Government should sanction a principle of this kind, these valuable appendages to the public lands would be universally taken up and occupied to the great injury of the Government, and with no advantage to those who may wish to purchase public lands, except to the favored individual.

The committee are therefore of opinion, that it would be injudicious, and that it is inexpedient to adopt such a provision.

By a resolution of the same date, the committee are instructed "to inquire into the expediency of granting to actual settlers prior to the 1st of July, 1820, in the State of Alabama, the right of purchasing, by pre-emption of at least one-quarter section of land, embracing their family residences."

The committee refer to the general observations in the commencement of this report, and again repeat that they can see no sound reason for permitting persons who have knowingly made unauthorized settlements on the public lands, to have and enjoy peculiar privileges and indulgences; they are therefore of opinion that the adoption of such a measure would be impolitic and inexpedient.

By a resolution of January 23d, 1824, the committee are instructed "to inquire into the expediency of reviving the law of the 25th March, 1816, relating to the settlers on the lands of the United States."

This act, as will be seen by reference to it, provides that persons settling on the public lands of the United States, may, upon application to a register, recorder, or marshal, or to such person as either of them may appoint, be permitted to remain on such lands, provided the applicant shall sign a declaration, purporting that he or she has no claim to the lands on which he or she may be located. Books are to be kept and a registry of the applications and permissions is to be made, and such forms prescribed as the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, may direct. The persons availing themselves of the provisions of this act are to be considered as tenants at will, and to obligate themselves not to commit waste, and to yield quiet possession when the lands shall be sold by the Government.

The committee can see no good reason for renewing this law, which has been continued in force until the 3d March, 1819, a period of three years.

Those who had located themselves on the public lands prior to, and until the 3d of March, 1819, have had opportunity to avail themselves of the benefits of this act, and those who have since that time made unauthorized settlements on the vacant lands of the United States, can have no just ground of complaint, if left to the ordinary operation of the laws relating to such persons.

To revive the law of 1816, would be to hold out inducements to settle on the public lands, under the expectation, that until such lands were sold, the persons making settlements would be permitted to cultivate and improve them for their own profit and benefit. Were the Government to grant these facilities, it is easy to perceive that no regard whatever would be paid to the regulations of the laws forbidding unauthorized settlements upon the public lands.

The experience of the Government would lead us to conclude, that the final request of these settlers would be for pre-emption rights, or at least to be permitted to retain their crops. But the committee trust that enough has been said to show the indefensible nature of this proposition; they will therefore dismiss it.

The petition of Lewis C. Davis was referred to the committee on the 26th January, 1824. He states that he purchased a quarter section of land in the State of Alabama, for which he gave fourteen dollars per acre, that he is unable to pay for it and was compelled to relinquish it, and prays to be permitted to re-enter the land at the pre-emption price. There appears to be nothing in this case to entitle the petitioner to particular favor, and the committee see no cause why he should not be subjected to the operation of the laws and regulations of the Government relative to such cases.

The petition of Hardy Doyal and George Caperton, of Alabama, referred to the committee on the 27th January, 1824, states that the petitioners have erected a grist-mill on the public lands and cleared a farm adjoining it; that they have expended their whole property in the enterprise; they therefore pray to be permitted to take a certain quantity of land including their mill, at the pre-emption value, and that the Government should grant them a credit of six months from the issuing of the patent.

The committee deem it unnecessary to enter into detailed reasoning to show the inadmissibility of this proposition. It is sufficient to remark, that it is in direct contravention of the policy which it is believed the Government ought to pursue, for the purpose of putting a stop to unauthorized settlements on the public lands.

Penelope Denney.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDICT in the chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Penelope Denney." Several documents were read. The question being still pending from a former sitting, in January, to amend the bill, by providing the support of Mrs. Denney from the Navy Pension Fund, instead of the Treasury of the United States, a debate arose, in which Messrs. CAMBRELENG, FULLER, WOOD of New York, WARFIELD, and BUCHANAN, took part.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to strike out the enacting clause—and the debate was then farther continued by Mr. FULLER, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. CAMBRELENG, Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. WARFIELD, and Mr. SHARPE.

In this debate, the merits of Denney were not disputed, nor the wants of his mother, but it was objected to the bill that it introduced a new principle in the pension laws of the United States, by providing for parents; the present laws only making provision for widows and children; and it was further argued that, if given at all, the pension should come out of the Treasury of the United States, and not out of the Navy Pension Fund. That fund, consisting of contributions of prize money, was, at its creation, pledged to a class of persons to which cases of this kind did not belong, and it would be a breach of public faith to touch it.

The question was then taken on striking out the enacting clause, and decided in the negative—ayes 58, noes 68.

The question then recurring on striking out the clause of the bill which provides to pay the pension "out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States," and inserting, in its place, "the Navy Pension Fund," the debate was resumed by Messrs. BRECK, CAMBRELENG, FULLER, HAMILTON, and BUCHANAN; and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 89, noes 58.

The bill was then reported to the House; the amendment was agreed to, and the question being on ordering it to a third reading, Mr. BRECK called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. METCALFE then moved to lay the bill on the table, which was negatived—ayes 50, noes 88.

The yeas and nays, on ordering the bill to a third reading, were then taken: Yeas 62, nays 98. So the bill was rejected.

SATURDAY, April 24.

Adjournment of Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the joint committee appointed to report what business required the attention of Congress during the present session, and at what time Congress shall adjourn, made a report in part with respect to the business to be taken up, which is divided into classes, and reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That all the legislative business before the Senate; the bills before the House of Representatives, mentioned in schedules No. 1, 2, 3, 4; and so many of those mentioned in schedule No. 5, as time shall permit—be acted upon at the present session. That precedence be given to private claims, examined and sanctioned by the committees to which they were respectively referred, and to bills of a public nature which it is believed will not require protracted discussion. And that those which are embraced in schedule No. 5, which shall not be decided upon before the rising of Congress, be preferred in the orders of the day, at the commencement of the next session of Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR explained the arrangement which the committee had made, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That, after this day, until otherwise ordered, the House will daily take a recess, from two o'clock, until four o'clock, in the afternoon.

Mr. CAMPBELL spoke in opposition to the resolution. There would be a difficulty in procuring a quorum. The evening session must be short. He was utterly opposed to nocturnal sessions, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR replied, and insisted that the measure proposed was the best mode of avoiding the necessity of nocturnal sessions. It would obviate the necessity of prolonging the session.

At the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER, the motion was modified, so as to propose a recess from two o'clock until four, and the hour of meeting in the morning to be ten o'clock.

Mr. DWIGHT inquired whether, if this resolution should be adopted, it is probable the committee would concur in the date of adjournment resolved upon by the Senate?

Mr. TAYLOR replied, and explained.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. STEWART, WRIGHT, LITTLE, TAYLOR, McCoy, KREMER, and STEWART.

The resolution was then adopted, and the arrangement of the orders of the day was ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, April 26.

Retrocession of Alexandria.

Mr. NEALE presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, praying that they may be restored to their parent, the State of Virginia. — Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

WEDNESDAY, April 28.

Claim of Daniel D. Tompkins.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

The House of Representatives having referred back the accounts and claims of Daniel T. Tompkins, late Governor of New York, to be settled on the principles established by the report of the committee, and the law founded on it, in the last session; I have reconsidered the subject, and now communicate the result.

By the report of the committee, which it was understood was adopted by the House, it was decided that his accounts and claims should be settled on the four following principles:

First. That interest should be allowed him on all moneys advanced by him for the public, from the time of the advance to that of his being reimbursed.

Second. That a reasonable commission should be allowed him on all moneys disbursed by him during the late war.

Third. That an indemnity should be allowed for all losses which he had sustained by the failure of the Government to fulfil its engagements to send him money, or Treasury notes, within the time specified, to be deposited in certain banks, as collateral security, for loans procured by him, at the request, and on account of, the Government.

Fourth. That he should not be held responsible for losses incurred by the frauds and failures of sub-agents, to whom moneys were advanced through his hands.

On the first: That of interest on his advances for the public, I have allowed him $14,438 68. This allowance is made on advances admitted by the accounting department, and on the declaration of Mr. Tompkins that the remittances made to him, after his advances, and previous to the 24th of December, 1814, when a very large sum was remitted to him, were applied to public purposes, and not to the reimbursement of his advances.

On the second head: That of a reasonable commission for his disbursements, during the late war, I have allowed him five per cent. on the whole sum disbursed by him, amounting to ninety-two thousand two hundred and thirteen dollars, thirteen cents. I have made him this extra allowance in consideration of the aid which he afforded to the Government at that important epoch, in obtaining the loan of a considerable part of the sums thus disbursed.

On the third head: That of an indemnity for losses sustained by him, in consequence of the failure of the Government to fulfil its engagements to send him money or Treasury notes within the time specified, I have allowed him $4,411 25, being the amount of the loss sustained on the sale of the Treasury notes, for which he was responsible.

On the fourth head: That of losses sustained by him by any frauds or failures of sub-agents, none such having been shown, no allowance whatever has been made to him.

From the amount thus allowed to Mr. Tompkins, after deducting the sum paid him, under the act of the present session, and the moneys charged to his account, there will remain a balance due him, of $80,238 46, as appears by the sketch herewith communicated.

In making a final decision on Mr. Tompkins's claims, a question arises, shall interest be allowed him on the amount of the commission on his disbursements? The law of the last session grants to the President a power to allow interest on moneys advanced by him to the public, but does not authorize it on the commission to be allowed on his disbursements. To make such allowance belongs exclusively to Congress. Had his claims been settled at the end of the last war, on the principles established by the law of the last session, a commission on disbursements would then have been allowed him. This consideration operates with great force in favor of the allowance of interest on that commission, at this time, which I recommend to Congress.

I think proper to add, that the official relation which I bore to Governor Tompkins, at that very interesting epoch, under the highly distinguished and meritorious citizen under whom we both served, enabling me to feel very sensibly the value of his services, excites a strong interest in his favor, which I deem it not improper to express.

JAMES MONROE.

APRIL 28, 1824.

The Message and document were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

And then the House adjourned.

MONDAY, May 8.

Claim of Massachusetts.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, from the Military Committee, to which was referred the Message of the President of the United States on the claim of Massachusetts for services rendered by the militia of that State during the late war with Great Britain, made a report, accompanied by a bill "to authorize the settlement and payment of the claims of the State of Massachusetts for certain services rendered during the late war." The following is a copy of the report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the Message of the President of the United States, "on the claim of Massachusetts for services rendered by the militia of that State during the late war with Great Britain," beg leave most respectfully to report:

That, in considering the subject submitted to their investigation, they have been fully impressed with its intrinsic importance, and its association with events which were once the occasion of much sensibility and excitement. They trust, however, that they have approached the discussion, devoid of all prejudice, with an honest desire, in doing justice, to sustain those great principles of concord and power, which are essential to the durability of this Union.

Your committee deem it entirely unnecessary that they should recite all the circumstances comprising a history of this claim, as they are generally known to the nation, and are to be found in an authentic shape, in the documents accompanying the President's Message. To this source your committee would ask a special reference.

It will be sufficient for present purposes to premise, that a large portion of the claim of Massachusetts does not appear to be affected by those constitutional difficulties which so long, in the consideration of the Executive of the United States, operated as an impediment to its adjustment.

Your committee are unanimously of opinion that the services rendered by the militia of Massachusetts, which may be considered beyond all exception, and as entitled to remuneration, are comprised in a class of cases in which, by the spontaneous impulse of the militia, with or without the sanction of the Executive of that State, or with or without a requisition on the part of the officer of the United States commanding the department, they assembled, either for the purpose of repelling actual invasion, or under a well-founded apprehension of invasion. It is, in fact, on this principle, and on this principle only, that the claims for militia services of the various States have been audited and allowed at the Department of War. Services of this description, patriotically performed, ought not to be prejudiced by a pre-existing difference of opinion between the Executive of Massachusetts and the commanding officer of the United States forces, as to an abstract construction of the constitution, when such a difference of opinion appears to have had no sort of effect on the extent and character of the services afforded. But, on the other hand, your committee are equally unanimous in declaring that, in all cases where the acts of the Executive of Massachusetts gave a direction to the services of the militia of that State, in opposition to the views of the General Government, the claim for such services is altogether inadmissible; for these, the government of Massachusetts may be considered to have incurred an ulterior and exclusive responsibility to her own people.

Your committee waive the discussion of the question how far the renunciation, on the part of the Executive and Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, of the unconstitutional principles on which the then Governor of that State acted, in the early stages of the war, is necessary to the allowance of any portion of the claims of the State for the services in question. These claims, when first presented for adjustment, immediately after the late war, were considered rather in the mass, than in reference to the particular items of which they are composed. In fact, at that early period, the principles on which the claims for militia services ought to be audited and allowed, were but imperfectly fixed. The subsequent presentation and examination of the claims of the several States, for such services, have shed much light on this subject, and have afforded many advantages at the present moment in examining those of Massachusetts. Distinctions, important to the elucidation of principles, and to the ascertainment of justice, have been taken, and sustained, which might naturally have been overlooked at the commencement of the discussion.

Your committee, however, cannot abstain from indulging in one remark, that, if the fact of the Government of Massachusetts having declined, for some years subsequent to the late war, to renounce the unconstitutional doctrines of her then Executive, as developed in the opinions of the judges of her supreme judicial court, can be supposed ever to have borne upon that portion of the claim which the committee have recommended for payment, the recent disavowal of her present Executive and Legislature furnishes at least a belief that all danger of a future collision between the General Government and the States, in reference to the authority of the former over the militia of the latter, has been permanently removed. In this light, the committee cannot but regard the renunciation as honorable to the Chief Magistrate and Legislature of Massachusetts, and as highly useful in fixing the true interpretation of the constitution, on an interesting and important point. This disavowal, in consonance, as it is affirmed, with the sentiment of the great mass of the people of Massachusetts, is, indeed, a reiteration of the language which was expressed by the Senate of that State, as early as October, 1812, at the moment when the unfortunate irritation between the National and State functionaries was most exasperated, and when remuneration for these services formed neither a subject of calculation nor desire.

Your committee, in conclusion, recommend that, in all cases where the militia of the State of Massachusetts were called out in conformity with the desire of an officer of the General Government, or to repel actual invasion, or under a well-founded apprehension of invasion, during the late war, the claim of the State for such militia services be allowed, under the usual rules of auditing and allowing similar claims; provided the number of troops so called out were not in undue proportion to the exigency.

Your committee likewise recommend that the claims of Massachusetts, not comprehended in the above description of cases, be disallowed. And, in conformity with the foregoing principles, ask leave to report a bill.

Mr. HAMILTON moved to refer this report to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, objected to this course, as giving undue preference to this over other business. He wished it to be referred in the usual course of business, for the purpose of discussion, simply to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMILTON urged the importance of this claim, as claiming from them urgent consideration. The course which he now proposed had been pursued in regard to certain claims of the State of Georgia, and he thought the claims now reported upon were at least equally entitled to attention from the House. The misrepresentation in some cases, and misunderstanding in others, under which this claim labored, rendered it highly expedient that it should have a prompt examination, when he had no doubt of being able to satisfy the House of the expediency of providing for its liquidation, &c.

Mr. COBB said he did not mean to utter a single word in opposition to the justice of this claim. It was very probable the gentleman from South Carolina might be able to convince even incredulity itself on the subject. My only objection to the proposed reference is, said Mr. C., that there is no resemblance between this case and that of the Georgia militia claims, to which, I presume, the gentleman refers; but, if there were, that the subject of those claims of Georgia is before an ordinary committee, and not a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I am willing to give this claim the same direction as they have received.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that, with regard to the Georgia militia claim, he knew it had taken that direction. The claim of Georgia to which he alluded, however, was that last reported upon, respecting the Indian reservations within the limits of that State.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. HAMILTON, and decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. COBB, the report was then referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Occupying Claimant Laws, &c.

On motion of Mr. LETCHER, of Kentucky, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DWIGHT in the chair, on the remonstrance addressed to the Congress of the United States, by the State of Kentucky, on the subject of the decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of Green vs. Biddle, involving the constitutionality of the occupying claimant laws of Kentucky, as they are usually called.

Mr. LETCHER then submitted a proposition, in the following words:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law, requiring, in any cause decided in the Supreme Court, in which shall be drawn in question the validity of any part of the constitution of a State, or of any act passed by the Legislature of a State, that — justices shall concur in pronouncing such part of the said constitution or act to be invalid; and that, without the concurrence of that number of said justices, the part of the constitution, or act of the Legislature, as the case may be, so drawn in question, shall not be deemed, or holden, invalid.

"Resolved, That the justices aforesaid, in pronouncing their judgment in any such cause, as aforesaid, ought to be required, by law, to give their opinions, with their respective reasons therefor, separately and distinctly, if the judgment of the Court be against the validity of the part of the constitution or act drawn in question, as aforesaid.

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill in conformity to the preceding resolutions."

Mr. LETCHER observed that, in the much celebrated and never to be forgotten case of Green vs. Biddle, the judgment pronounced and the principles decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, had given great alarm to the people of Kentucky. As that was a case which bore upon the present question, and which, indeed, had immediately led to the resolutions and memorial now before the committee, it might not be irrelevant for him to take a very brief review of it.

He did not intend, he said, to make a tedious law argument; he would, however, suggest, on the threshold, if any gentleman, from Virginia or elsewhere, felt the slightest wish to attempt to maintain that decision as correct, upon any of the well-settled doctrines of the law, without wishing to be understood as using language of a gasconading character, he would say, the limited delegation from Kentucky were ready, at any time, and before any tribunal, to meet them.

In the year 1789, Kentucky, then an integral part of Virginia, and being desirous of becoming an independent State of the Federal Union, entered into a compact with Virginia, with a view to a separation for that end. It consisted of eight articles; one of which was drawn into dispute in the case to which he had alluded; and the decision of the Supreme Court upon it, had virtually declared that Kentucky, although nominally a sovereign and free State, has, nevertheless, no legislative jurisdiction over her own soil. She is a sovereign State; but yet has no power to pass any law for the aid, the convenience, the comfort, and the protection of her own citizens. This decision, the people of Kentucky had viewed as a most ruinous and extraordinary one; and it is only because they have entertained the liveliest hope that the case still admits of some remedy, that a greater excitement has not prevailed.

But what, said Mr. L., are the laws of Kentucky, which that decision has pronounced a violation of the compact, and therefore unconstitutional? and what were the circumstances under which they were enacted? The first act of the Kentucky Legislature passed in the year 1797, the second in 1812. Each had for its object, in case of his eviction, by a paramount title, to secure to the occupant, who had settled upon the land in good faith, believing it to be his own, and who had made valuable improvements upon the same, a reasonable compensation for those improvements.

The necessity of these several laws grew out of the condition of the country. The early settlers of the State had to contend with the most complicated and appalling difficulties. They had not only to encounter every species of toil, of peril, and of suffering, incident to the settlement of an unexplored wilderness, but they had to struggle with a formidable and savage foe, in a war of ten years' duration. When, sir, they had conquered this enemy, and in some small degree begun to enjoy the fruits of their efforts, innumerable claims were set up to the land, which they had first conquered and then defended; claims which grew out of the mistaken policy, not of Kentucky, but Virginia. That policy had literally covered the country over and over again with a great variety of conflicting claims. These adverse claims necessarily occasioned, to the first settlers, the greatest distress, and trouble, and litigation. The early adventurer to the country, who had experienced every sort of privation, was very illy requited for his boldness, his industry, and his enterprise. Just after he had been able to obtain a good tract of land, to build houses, to clear fields, with the most flattering prospects before him of providing for a dependent family; at the moment he was prepared for the enjoyment of quiet and repose, suddenly he found himself expelled from the possession of the very farm he had been laboring to improve; with nothing left him, but the privilege of buying and improving another place, and again losing it at law, without the most distant hope of compensation for his labor thus employed upon it. Such was the melancholy condition of the first settlers in Kentucky. This state of things brought about the injurious practice of buying and selling every sort of land claim, some real, others fictitious; of alarming the ignorant and illiterate; of extorting money for a compromise; of swindling, in all its various moods and tenses—in short, sir, of creating a system of speculation, of fraud, and oppression, from the effects of which we shall never, I fear, be able to get entirely rid. The existence of such afflicting evils required a speedy remedy; that remedy was the immediate passage of the law of 1797. It was a just and beneficent law, imperiously called for by existing circumstances, demanded by every consideration of justice, and most salutary in its operation. It is a duty, said Mr. L., which every Government owes to each and all its citizens, to furnish every means in its power to diffuse among them happiness, contentment, and equal rights—to reward industry, by protecting every one in the free enjoyment of the benefits of his own labor, and to prevent the cunning and the idle part of the community from fattening upon the proceeds of their neighbors' hard earnings. The Legislature of Kentucky, therefore, in the enactment of those laws, acted correctly, if they were not already precluded from the rights of legislation over the soil of the State, by the terms of the compact. Now, what are the provisions of this compact, which bear upon this question, and which, in the opinion of the court, amount to a consent upon the part of Kentucky never to exercise legislative rights in connection with her freehold?

The third article, to which the court refers, in exclusion of the residue, to maintain the correctness of their opinion, is in the following words: "That all private rights and interests of lands within the said district, derived from the laws of Virginia, prior to such separation, shall remain valid and secure, under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in this State."

To understand correctly the meaning of the words expressed in the foregoing provision, by the contracting parties, it becomes important to look to the relative condition of each, and to ascertain the contemplated object of the contract. Kentucky, unprotected and unaided, had experienced all the fortunes and all the horrors of an Indian war. She had waded through her troubles, had been weighed in the balance, and not found wanting; had borne down every opposing obstacle, and proved herself worthy of enjoying all the blessings, the privileges, and immunities, of a free and sovereign State. She petitioned Virginia to aid her in obtaining them. Virginia was ready, willing, and anxious to render her every facility. All the feelings of Virginia towards her were of the most partial and benevolent character; she felt as a parent to a child. Indeed, there existed mutual affection; each understood well the situation of the other. In this state of things, they made the compact. The object was—what? Why, to enable Kentucky to set up for herself; to confer upon her the right of enacting laws to suit her condition; to adopt such regulations as were most conducive to her own interest, and to superintend her own internal affairs in a manner most agreeable to her own will, free from any and every control of the mother country.

How, then, are you to interpret the words of the stipulation just referred to? The first and best rule is, to use as much common sense as you can well employ, in giving a construction to any contract, and to lay aside the doctrine of "construction construed;" to crowd in as few artificial, unmeaning distinctions, as possible; and to endeavor to ascertain the fair meaning of the parties, as expressed by the words of the contract.

"That private rights and interests, &c., derived from the laws of Virginia, &c., shall remain valid and secure," &c. What was the nature of those private rights here agreed to be made secure? They were rights and interests of an imperfect character, such as surveys, warrants, entries, &c., which were preparatory to obtaining a grant or patent from the Government; not absolute rights, which had been made complete by the emanation of grants; for this obvious reason: the latter class required no agreement to make them valid and secure; they were already as much so as they could be, even with the strongest provisions—they were vested rights. It would, therefore, be at once saying that neither of the parties to the aforesaid instrument understood what they were doing, to suppose they would have engaged in a serious negotiation to guard against an evil which could not happen. "Rights derived from the laws of Virginia," &c. The term, "laws of Virginia," as here used, as understood by both parties, as understood in common usage, meant nothing more nor less than the statute laws of Virginia, as contradistinguished from the statute and common laws of England—the acts of the Virginia Assembly, which had from time to time been enacted, creating rights of various kinds, such as poor rights, settlement and pre-emption rights, village rights, military rights, &c. Under these Virginia statutes, many of the citizens of Virginia had become interested, to a considerable extent, in inchoate rights to lands in Kentucky, which grew out of this course of legislation. Virginia, therefore, felt anxious (and very justly too) to make a provision of this kind, to enable those who had, under the several acts aforesaid, vested capital in the purchase of these lands, and whose rights were incomplete, to have them made secure; and Kentucky, willing also that Virginia should act a faithful part towards her own citizens, agreed to the aforesaid article; the meaning of which is, that she, (Kentucky,) on her part, would pass no law which would destroy those inchoate, equitable rights, created by the State of Virginia; that she would present no obstacles in the way to prevent their ultimate perfection. Sir, the term "laws of Virginia," is still understood in Kentucky, and Virginia, also, up to the present period, in legal as well as common style, to apply distinctly and exclusively to the Virginia code of laws, without the slightest connection with or dependence upon the common law of England. The parties, therefore, who draughted this compact, never once thought of including the common law. If such had been their object, it was very easy, by the use of a single expression, to have made a declaration to that effect. But the principles of the common law could not very well apply to the situation of the country. To prove, however, that the interpretation given by the court of the clause to which I have alluded, is wholly erroneous, we have but to look a little further into this compact, and examine for a moment the fourth stipulation. What does it declare?

"That the lands within the proposed State, of non-resident proprietors, shall not in any case be taxed higher than the lands of residents, at any time prior to the admission of the proposed State to a vote, by its delegates in Congress, when such non-residents reside out of the United States; nor at any time, either before or after such admission, where such non-residents reside within this commonwealth, within which this stipulation shall be reciprocal; or where such non-residents reside within any other of the United States, which shall declare the same to be reciprocal within its limits; nor shall a neglect of cultivation or improvement of any land within either the proposed State or this Commonwealth, belonging to non-residents, citizens of the other, subject such non-residents to forfeiture, or other penalty, within the term of six years, after the admission of the said State into the Federal Union."

The second rule of construing a contract, (if not already laid down by legal writers, for the guidance of judges, ought to be,) is, to examine the whole of it; to see if all the parts will harmonize, and to look into the consequences, which will of necessity result by this or that mode of construction; and to ascertain, by such and such interpretation, whether the object of the contractors is or is not defeated. This second rule has been entirely overlooked by the court in pronouncing their decision; the fourth article makes no sort of figure whatever in the opinion delivered; and, by construction, one might presume they did not see it. It is, however, very clearly expressed by this clause of the contract, that Kentucky, after the expiration of six years, for a failure upon the part of non-residents to cultivate or improve any of the land within her boundary, belonging to them, might properly and justly subject such lands to forfeiture, or might affix any other penalty she, in her sound discretion, should think fit.

Now, sir, a question necessarily presents itself, not for the consideration of the Supreme Court, for they have made their final decision—Are those occupant laws as rigid, as severe, as hard, in their operation against non-residents, as a law creating forfeiture of land, in pursuance of the power unquestionably given to Kentucky, in the foregoing clause? Surely not. Kentucky, then, for adopting the measures which she has done to protect her citizens, has manifested a greater forbearance in relation to non-residents than the court has given her credit for. She has refused to extend her powers of legislation, so as at once to put an end to all controversies, with which she has been so much oppressed.

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. L., the construction given by the court to the third article of the compact is wholly inconsistent with the stipulations contained in the fourth. It renders the latter null and void. It defeats the very object and purpose which each of the contracting parties had in view. It confers all the benefits of the agreement upon one side, without any corresponding advantage on the other; one party gets all, the other nothing. Such was not the wish and understanding of those who formed the agreement. In a few years after its date, the first occupant law, it will be seen, was adopted by Kentucky. Her course of policy was not a matter of secrecy; Virginia was apprised of it, and fully acquiesced in its justice. No murmuring or complaining is heard of. Had then the course of legislation upon the part of Kentucky have been so highly unjust—so entirely in opposition to her agreement—is it not fair to presume, when the whole subject was fresh in the recollection of all, that some dissatisfaction would have displayed itself? No official communication, however, is sent to Kentucky, alleging a breach of faith. Again, in confirmation of the right to pass these several laws, we have a long course of legal decision, by the inferior and appellate courts, for the last twenty-five years; by judges, too, whose firmness, intelligence, and legal acquirements, are in no manner lessened in consequence of the Supreme Court's declaration, in this same opinion, that the Kentucky courts may have made such and such decisions, but they had never seen them. These judges, whose decisions are treated so cavalierly, sir, (it might be said in strict truth,) would not fear a comparison of legal skill, even with their Supreme Honors. We have, sir, in support of our laws, our Legislature, our lawyers, our judges. Indeed, more—we have the disinterested and concurrent testimony of other gentlemen, not citizens of the West, high, very high, in legal reputation, who are practitioners before the same court, most decidedly upon our side of the question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, look for one moment to the effects and consequences of the construction contended for by the court. Kentucky comes into the Union—how? Possessed of equal rights and privileges with the other sovereign States? No; a mere appendage; in no better situation than when a district, without the ability of regulating her own internal concerns. Her expectation was to be ranked among her sister States as an equal. But, how wofully has she been disappointed! Now, she is told for the first time, she surrendered and relinquished all pretensions of that sort long since. Construction brings about all this. Yes, construction! Its mighty powers are irresistible; it bears down every thing before it; it creates new principles; it infuses the spirit of the common law into a contract, against the will of both parties; it destroys laws long since established; and it is daily acquiring new strength. From this case, and others to which reference might be made, the result is plain, that, unless some regulation is made, and some necessary and salutary restraints are adopted, the Supreme Court, by its extensive jurisdiction, as it now exists, will finally draw into its vortex all State authorities.

My proposition, Mr. Chairman, is not of a mere theoretic and speculative character. It introduces no new and dangerous principle. If you desire to amend your constitution, it cannot be done unless by a concurrence of two-thirds of all the States. If, upon the passage of any bill upon your table, the President of the United States chooses, in the exercise of his constitutional privilege, to put his veto upon it, what is the result? It is returned with the objections, and cannot be incorporated into your statute book, as a law, without a majority of two-thirds of both Houses concur in declaring it shall be. But a minority of your Judiciary, upon the most solemn and important questions, involving the rights, the interests, and prosperity of a whole community, can so expound laws and constitutions, as to prostrate all State rights! This, sir, most certainly is an evil which may be remedied by judicious and prudent legislation. It is an evil which is growing rapidly, and which, if not checked, will produce very serious discontent.

Sir, said Mr. L., the resolutions which I have the honor of presenting for the consideration of this committee, cannot, I apprehend, endanger the dignity or importance of the judges. Their firmness will not be weakened; their intelligence will not be affected; their reputation will not be impaired by their passage. I would agree to no proposition which had for its object such results. It is indispensably necessary, in every well-regulated Government, to have the most enlightened judiciary, prepared at all times to do their duty, without fear, favor, or affection. A timid, time-serving court, in any country, is worse than a nuisance. But, sir, in legislating upon this subject, let it not be forgotten that judges, at last, are but men; perfection and infallibility are properties which do not attach to them. Let us, therefore, increase the chances of a correct decision upon such occasions as are embraced by the resolutions, by requiring five to concur.

Mr. Chairman, how does the matter stand, according to the present state of facts? You have now seven judges upon the Supreme Bench; four constitute a quorum. Say three are absent, upon some constitutional question which comes before that tribunal, vitally important. The arguments are heard; three concur in declaring the law unconstitutional—one dissents. The judgment of the court below is reversed. A decision is obtained in this way by a minority. One of the judges writes his opinion, and two hear it read, perhaps, say agreed, as we often do in this House, without knowing the question—more for the sake of form, than substance. Their decision goes out, is published, and is received by the State courts, as binding authority. Suppose, at the next term, all the judges are present,—a similar question is again before the court; the absentees concur with the one judge who dissented upon the former occasion. What, then, is the consequence? You have two contradictory decisions in relation to the same subject-matter—both sent out as a sound exposition of constitutional law, as precedents for the country. One decision determines A shall have this property; another declares B, whose cause was precisely such a one as A's, shall not recover in his case. Thus stood the cause from Kentucky; four judges present—three concurred in believing the laws involved in the controversy were against that clause of the Constitution of the United States, which declares, among other things, that no law, impairing the obligation of a contract, shall be passed. One dissented. Try the weight of intellectual authorities pro and con.; put them in the scales—which will preponderate? The judge who dissents, most assuredly is at least equal to one of the three who concurs in the decision. There are then two left in the balance. I will not stop to inquire whether they were likely to understand the kind of case submitted to their consideration, involving intricate doctrines, in relation to a species of land-titles with which they were in nowise very familiar. Let it be conceded, for the sake of argument, that they deserve to be ranked amongst the most enlightened jurists of the country—you cannot, however, make more than two upon that side of the question. Look to the opposite scale—and what have we? The Legislature of a whole State, year after year, have asserted, in the most unqualified manner, their constitutional right to enact these laws. They so decided, upon mature deliberation, not influenced by excitement. All the judges of all the courts have, by a long course of decision, without exception, maintained the same power; they have done so, after having repeatedly given to the subject the fullest investigation. Two judges of the Supreme Court, strangers, in every sense of the word, to the subject, have asserted no such right existed. Upon whose decision would you place most reliance? Which is entitled to the greatest share of confidence—that of the two, or the collected wisdom of a whole State, both of the political and the legal kind? Which, under all the circumstances, is most likely to be correct? The answer is by no means perplexing. One leading principle in all our institutions, is, that a minority in the exercise of any official duties shall not control. But, in this instance, there is a departure from the rule; a minority has given an exposition of the constitution, upon a question of the first magnitude, which is to be acknowledged by all as correct doctrine, and treated accordingly. Can this be right? Is it according to the spirit and genius of our Government? But what is there objectionable in requiring five to concur, before any law of a State shall be held null and void? There is more safety in such a regulation than to leave it as it now stands. You may rest assured, sir, the States would be much better satisfied with a decision unfavorable to their laws by five judges than by two or three; and should it become the duty of the court, in the administration of justice, to make such decisions, five will not hesitate to do it. There is little or no danger of the judges of the Supreme Court being under the influence of the several States. The danger is altogether upon the other side. They are not dependent upon the States for their office, or the emoluments of it. No reason does or can exist, therefore, to suppose that the judges of this court ever did, or ever will, lean in favor of the States, against the General Government.

Occupying Claimant Laws, &amp;c.

Mr. FORSYTH offered the following amendment, as a substitute to the first of the above resolutions:

Resolved, That a quorum of the Supreme Court, to transact the business of that tribunal, should consist of such a number of the Justices composing it, that a majority of the quorum shall be a majority of the whole court, including the Chief Justice.

Mr. FORSYTH supported his motion in a short speech; and Messrs. WICKLIFFE, CLAY, FORSYTH, WEBSTER, MERCKE, P. P. BARBOUR, RANDOLPH, and TRIMBLE, respectively, spoke at considerable length on the question.

Mr. WICKLIFFE addressed the committee, in substance, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The subject is an important one, and on that account alone, I hope to engage the attention of the committee in its discussion. Some of the friends of the measure on your table, were inclined not now to press it, under the belief that the time was unfavorable to the full and free discussion which its magnitude demanded. The duty of those, charged by the remonstrance with its presentation here, required, at their hands, an effort in furtherance of the views of the Legislature of Kentucky; and I am gratified to discover a wish in the committee that the debate should now progress.

The character of this question, which proposes an important modification in the judiciary act; the deep interest which one of the States feels upon the occasion; require of Congress an indulgent, and, I hope, a favorable consideration of the resolutions submitted by my colleague, (Mr. LETCHER.) Were it a subject in which the State of Kentucky was alone interested, her representatives on this floor would regard the determination of the committee now to progress with its discussion, more an act of kindness to them than a matter of right. But it is one involving a principle of vital importance to the whole Union; and, although presented to us by a single State, (inferior to none in the practice and support of Republican principles,) it demands of Congress a dispassionate deliberation.

I will not unnecessarily consume your time, and I hope not to exhaust your patience, whilst I endeavor, in a few words, to call your attention to the true character of the question presented by the remonstrance and resolutions now before us.

It may not be improper, in order to arrive at that object, to state some of the causes which have brought them into existence, and forced them upon our attention. You are informed, by the memorial of the Legislature of Kentucky, accompanied by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, (of which it complains,) that the power of that State to pass certain laws, denominated the Occupying Claimant Laws, is denied by that court; that they violate the compact between the States of Virginia and Kentucky; and, therefore, impugn the 10th section of the 1st article of the Constitution of the United States, which declares, among other things, "That no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." A question naturally presents itself to the mind of every person unacquainted with the history of Kentucky and her internal police: "Are these laws of such mighty importance as to call forth, in strong language, the feelings of the Legislature? Are the principles settled by the case of Green and Biddle, and the evils which flow from that decision, such, that the Legislature of Kentucky cannot, by some modification of the laws in question, avert or palliate them?" I answer, Yes; such is their character. They are laws rendered necessary to the prosperity and happiness of the State, by the fatal policy pursued by Virginia, in the disposition of her vacant lands, in the then district of Kentucky. And if the court be correct, to the extent of the principles assumed in that opinion, no legislative aid, no change or modification of these laws, can avert or palliate the miseries which must inevitably ensue. The people, in the exercise of their high and sovereign powers in convention, cannot rid themselves of the effects of the principle settled by the Supreme Court; which principle is fixed like an incubus upon the rights of the State. We can do nothing but present our grievance before you; point to the injury which has been inflicted; and beseech you to adopt the measure on your table, and thereby strengthen the ramparts of State sovereignty. It is by the preservation of legitimate State rights, that you give the best security to the stability and happiness of this Union.

I said, sir, these laws were rendered necessary to the prosperity and happiness of the citizens of Kentucky, by the misguided policy of Virginia; a policy ruinous, but liberal, benevolent, and patriotic in its objects. With the exception of the delegation of Virginia and Kentucky, but few, if indeed any, of the members of this House are acquainted with the mode by which lands were acquired, and are now held, in the latter State. Prior to the Revolution, large portions of those lands were granted by the Crown to the officers of the army engaged in the French and Indian wars, which preceded the Declaration of Independence. Toward the close of the Revolution, many persons, as if in quest of danger, penetrated the wilderness; and after many dire struggles with the savages for empire, maintained with loss of much blood their infant settlements. Virginia, (in a spirit of justice to her creditors, and in fulfilment of that pledge of public faith of which she has always been proudly tenacious,) after securing to the early adventurers and settlers in Kentucky, what are called "settlement and pre-emption rights, poor-rights, and corn-rights," (terms well understood by the citizens of Kentucky,) opened her land office, 1779-'80; and by it she poured out the contents of a Pandora's box upon the ill-fated inhabitants of the State. By the provisions of the land law of 1779, warrants for land were issued to any and every person, upon the payment of the State price in the paper currency of Virginia. The proprietors of these warrants were required to locate the same by an entry in the surveyor's books, with such certainty and precision, that each subsequent locator, in like manner, could appropriate the adjacent residuum. I am certainly correct, when I tell you, that warrants for three times the quantity of vacant land, then owned by Virginia, in the district of Kentucky, were issued. In many districts of country in Kentucky, I have known to exist there, four, five, and six, distinct adversary claims to the same tract of land. Hence the phrase, in frequent use, "that Kentucky is shingled with land claims." Many of these claims were settled by the original proprietors and first adventurers to that country; men who had to contend with dangers, and endure sufferings, not easily to be imagined by the present population; and more easily conceived than described by those who witnessed and participated in them.

In this state of things, removed at a great distance from the seat of government in Virginia, laboring under difficulties and embarrassments, which were not felt and duly appreciated by the great body of the people of Virginia, the citizens of the then district of Kentucky petitioned the Legislature of Virginia to permit them to become a free and sovereign State. The politicians who filled the public councils of the State, at that period, upon becoming more intimately acquainted with the wants, interests, and difficulties of the people of Kentucky, were satisfied that their future happiness and prosperity depended upon the favorable issue of their application.

In 1789, a law passed the Legislature prescribing the conditions upon which this new government was to be established. This is what is termed, in the decision of the Supreme Court, "The compact with Virginia." By the seventh section of that compact, it is provided that all private rights and interests of lands within the proposed district, derived from the laws of Virginia, prior to such separation, shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now in existence in this State.

The latter clause of the eighth section reads as follows: "Nor shall a neglect of cultivation or improvement of any land within the proposed State, or this Commonwealth, belonging to non-resident citizens of the other, subject such non-residents to forfeiture, or other penalty, within the term of six years after the admission of the said State into the Federal Union." These are, substantially, the only parts of the compact which have any connection with the present subject. This compact is made a part of the constitution of Kentucky. The Supreme Court, in their opinion, do not decide upon it as a part of the constitution of the State, but as a contract between the State of Virginia and the State of Kentucky. Whether this act of the Virginia Legislature can be denominated a contract, within the meaning and purview of the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits "a State from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts," is a question I leave for others to decide. It is not necessary for my purpose that I should here discuss it. Virginia, at the date of the compact, had no statutory provision similar to the occupying claimant laws of Kentucky. She had not then felt the necessity of them—circumstances since that time have made it necessary for her to protect the occupants of her land under a practice adopted by her courts, not very unlike the laws of Kentucky.

Occupying Claimant Laws, &c.

[H. OF R.]

I believe many States in the Union have been compelled to resort to such laws. As early as 1796, Kentucky commenced her legislation upon this subject. Her best and wisest statesmen projected and approved the law which was then enacted. This law provides, in substance, that if any person shall peaceably, and in good faith, seat and improve lands, to which he shall have a title derived from the Commonwealth, upon eviction therefrom by a paramount title, he shall be paid for all valuable and lasting improvements which he shall have made upon the land before notice of the adversary claim, and subjects the occupant to the payment of rents and profits, after suit brought; and also compels him to account for all waste, &c., committed upon the land; and to pay for the deterioration of soil. Is there any thing unjust or iniquitous in this law? I answer, no. It received the sanction of the courts of Kentucky, and was acquiesced in by all classes of her citizens. There was no murmuring, no denial of the power in this State to legislate upon the subject, from 1796 to 1811 and 1812, at which period the act of 1796 was repealed, and that of 1812 passed. Then it was, for the first time, I believe, made a question of constitutional power in the State. The law, however, passed, not without a violent opposition, by a respectable and intelligent minority, who, I believe, were governed more in their opposition by the question of policy and expediency, than constitutional power.

It is due to candor to state this law did not receive the sanction of the Governor of the State. It was suspended for twelve months. Its principles were the subject of free and full discussion before the people; and at the succeeding Legislature it was passed by a constitutional majority of both branches, the Governor's objection notwithstanding.

This latter act exempts the occupant from the payment of rents and profits, until after judgment of eviction or decree shall be pronounced against him. It compels the successful claimant to pay the cost of seating and improving the land; and moreover provides, that, if the valuation of the improvements shall exceed three-fourths the value of the land in its unimproved state, then the successful claimant may compel the occupant to keep the land, and to pay for the same the amount of valuation fixed by commissioners to be appointed by the court. These commissioners are directed to make the estimates, as well of the rents, profits, and value of the land, as the costs of seating and improving the same, together with the waste and damage committed, and reduction of soil. The report of these commissioners upon oath, (seven in number,) was to receive the sanction of the court, and to be made the basis of their judgment. Until the court had thus disposed of the question of improvements, &c., no writ of possession could issue upon the original judgment. Such are the outlines of the two acts of the Legislature of Kentucky, passed under a most thorough conviction that she possessed the power, and deeply impressed with the belief, that they were demanded by the condition of the country.

And, whatever may have been said about the infraction of constitutional law, the purity of the motives of the Legislature who passed, and the judges who approved their adoption, has never been, cannot be, questioned. It requires the efforts of refined legal subtlety to demonstrate clearly the unconstitutionality of these laws. The eighth section of the compact permits the Legislature of Kentucky, after six years, to subject the lands of non-resident proprietors to forfeiture for non-cultivation. From this clause it seems a mild power might be inferred—one of less magnitude—a power which, by its exercise, saves to the non-resident his land from forfeiture for non-cultivation, by requiring him to pay the meritorious occupant for doing that which the State had a right to compel him to do, viz: the improvement of his land within her territory. The delay incident to the investigation and trial of a land cause, (to say nothing of the designed procrastination of it by the artful claimants, with a view to swell the item of rents on the final account,) furnished a very just reason for a change or repeal of the act of 1796.

Suits have lingered upon the dockets for twenty years, and, in some instances, longer. Under the act of 1796, the occupant was charged with the rents after the commencement of the suit; and it not unfrequently happened that, after losing his home, and his labor of twenty years, he was ruined by a demand for rents of land which he believed to be his own. It was thought the act of 1796 was defective in other respects. The number of suits was continually increasing, and the occupants not only feared the loss of their lands and improvements, but ruin by a claim for back rents. The gradual improvement of the country was consequently retarded.

I have been thus particular, Mr. Chairman, (and, I fear, tedious,) in order that the committee and the public shall understand the nature and character of those laws. I am anxious that the councils of my State shall be acquitted of all impurity of motive.

If I have given you a correct history and character of these laws, (and I believe I have,) you will acknowledge that Kentucky ought to feel on this subject; and she has, through her Legislature, expressed that feeling to the nation.

Not long after the passage of the act of 1812, its validity was questioned in the appellate court of the State. The judges of that court, men of intelligence, and who, as jurists, would not be shaded in a comparison with the justices of the Supreme or any court, decided, not by a minority, but by the undivided opinion of the whole court, that the Legislature had the power to pass the law of 1812.

This decision, supported by reasons irresistible, the Supreme Court (although the book which contained it was in the Library of Congress, to which they had unlimited access) say they "have not had an opportunity of examining it." It was not my purpose, nor is it required of me, by the nature of the proposition on your table, to maintain the validity of those laws; nor will I indulge an uncharitable opinion of those whose interest or duty it was to contest them. I am only anxious to evince to the committee their importance, and to satisfy them they were not the enactments of hasty and inconsiderate legislation, but the productions of soberness and reason, dictated by a sound policy, imperiously demanded by necessity, and approved by the judgments, not only of the people, but the Legislature and the courts of the State. When laws of so much importance to the prosperity and happiness of a State, sanctioned by successive Legislatures and courts, consisting of judges of great talents, shall have been prostrated by the opinion of three justices, however learned and dignified, it becomes the duty of the States to inquire into the expediency of so organizing that court that more security shall be given to their respective rights. The opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Green and Biddle may be correct; it is, nevertheless, unsatisfactory and afflicting to my constituents; nay, sir, to the whole State—unsatisfactory, because it is the opinion of a minority of the members of the court, without the aid of its head, opposed to the opinion of the Legislature, and the inferior and superior courts of the State; afflicting, because the character of the State has been traduced—not by the court, but by those who, like the justices, were unacquainted with the real condition and character of the people for whose safety and protection these laws were enacted. I will not contend, as some have done, that the case of Green and Biddle was not legitimately before the court, nor that it was an act of usurpation in the court to have assumed jurisdiction of the cause. The question involving the validity of these laws was fairly presented to the court for its decision. I admit the right and the power of the Judiciary to decide upon constitutional questions; and, when fairly presented, it becomes their duty to decide them upon their constitutional responsibility. I am desirous, therefore, that, whenever the occasion arises for the exercise of this high and important power by the Judiciary, it shall be exercised in the mode best calculated to administer justice, and inspire confidence in the public mind. What better mode can you adopt, combining these two great subjects, than the one suggested by the resolutions offered by my colleague?

The prostration of those laws, so indispensable to the prosperity of the State; laws which secured to the industrious occupant, should he be unhoused by a better title, an indemnity for his labor bestowed upon the land; and of a policy, existing for twenty-five years, sanctioned by a large majority of the Legislature; approved and sustained by the unanimous decisions of the supreme court of the State; made the basis of numerous compromises and contracts, was well calculated to produce a shock in public feeling, and to call forth the almost unanimous voice of the whole State, against the correctness of the opinion of the three justices of the Supreme Court.

I have said the power to decide upon constitutional questions, involving the validity of the laws or constitution of a State, appertain to this court. Yes, sir; they have the power, not only to fritter down the sovereignty of the State governments, but to set at defiance the legislative powers of Congress. It is necessary that the power to decide upon constitutional law should be vested in the judiciary; and it is the duty of the Representatives of the people to watch, with a vigilant eye, its exercise. I do not mean to say that the power, in this case, has been intentionally abused. Its exercise, however, by a minority of the court, has spread dismay over the whole State. In ordinary cases, where the Legislature may have trespassed upon the confines of the constitution, and the encroachment is repelled by the judiciary, reform and amendment may take place. Was this the condition of Kentucky: did the decision leave a hope that any future legislation upon the subject, even in conformity with what Virginia, since the compact, has prescribed for her own citizens, was permissible, we should not feel so sensibly the effects of the opinion of the court. The court deny to Kentucky the right to legislate in reference to this subject. Virginia has parted with the soil and sovereignty: she cannot, therefore, legislate; nor can the two States, by any alteration of the terms of the compact, (if the decision be correct,) resume the power in themselves, jointly or separately, to legislate upon the question of land titles acquired prior to 1792, in the State of Kentucky.

Did Virginia possess the power, and were her statesmen made acquainted with the real condition of those for whose benefits those laws were passed, I know that she estimates too highly the blessings of a free Government, to refuse relief, such as that extended by the Legislature of Kentucky, to those whose lands were lost by adversary titles.

Kentucky has no hope that she can be relieved by any act of Congress, from the evils which the misguided policy of her parent State forced, and the decision of the Supreme Court has riveted, upon her. She must, and she will, with that firmness and patriotism with which she has been hitherto characterized, maintain, under all circumstances, her attachment to the Union, her reverence for the constituted authorities of the Government. She has never deserted the General Government, nor is she willing to be abandoned by it.

Occupying Claimant Laws, &c.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. TREMBLE, of Kentucky, wanted to say a few words, and would detain the committee only a few minutes. He thought the subject might be placed in a new aspect, as important as any that had been given to it. What, said he, is the question; and how does it come before us? A compact exists between the States of Virginia and Kentucky. A citizen of Kentucky, holding a title to land there, under the laws of Virginia, or a non-resident (say a citizen of Virginia) holding in like manner a title to lands in Kentucky, derived from the laws of Virginia or Kentucky, brings an action at law or suit in chancery for the land, and obtains a judgment or decree in his favor, under which he is put in possession of his right. The occupant, who was sued, holds a title of record for the same land, derived under the same code of laws, which title he exhibits to the court, and thereupon demands payment for the value of the lasting improvements made by him on the land, and requires an assessment of the value of those improvements under the laws of Kentucky, usually called the "Occupant Laws;" the adverse party contests the right of the occupant to claim payment for his improvements, upon the plea that the Occupant Laws are in violation of the compact between the two States. The Supreme Court of the United States and the inferior courts take cognizance of the case under the second section of the third article of the Federal Constitution, in which article we find the following clauses, among others, viz: "The judicial power (of the United States) shall extend to controversies between two or more States, between a State and citizens of another State, between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects." And thus the right and power of the State of Kentucky to pass the Occupant Laws, and the validity of the laws themselves, are drawn in question before the Supreme Court. Mr. T. referred to the case of Green and Bidle as an example, the details of which would be found in the remonstrance from the Legislature of Kentucky. It was known, he said, that only four of the seven judges sat in that case, three of whom were of opinion that the State of Kentucky had no power to pass the Occupant Laws just referred to, and the other judge dissented; so that, in point of fact, only three judges concurred in the opinion declaring those laws invalid. In this respect it is a question of State powers and State rights, and he would like to know when and how a minority of the Supreme Court became possessed of the power to decide against the validity of a State law? Was it right to suffer a minority of the court to exercise such broad powers? The friends of State rights insist that a law of Congress ought to pass, declaring that no decision shall be given by the court in such cases, unless a majority of all the judges shall concur in it.

His own opinion, looking to the policy of the question, was, that the law ought to require a concurrence of at least five of the seven judges, if not all of them. Would any member show him a solid objection to that number? Look, said he, at the root of the question: each State has plenary power—legislative, executive, and judicial—over all its municipal concerns. The power of each is paramount within its own limits, except in those cases where all have brought themselves under Federal subordination. The States grant to Congress and the nation the supremacy over certain enumerated subjects, and they retain the supremacy over all other subjects. Now, suppose the States to be yet independent of each other, and foreign to each other, as they were before the Federation; how would two or more of them decide a dispute between them, or between their citizens? Exactly as all sovereigns have done, and are compelled to do—abandon the dispute, or settle it by making war, or by reprisals, to enforce the right, or by sending ambassadors to make a treaty of settlement and compromise; or by referring the matter in contest to friendly sovereigns as arbitrators. But the framers of the constitution foresaw that Federal and State rights and powers might come in conflict with each other, and that controversies might arise between two or more States, or between a State and citizens of other States, or between citizens of different States; and they knew that the system of Federation would be incomplete, unless some mode could be devised by which such disputes could be peaceably adjusted, because they must have known that such disputes had dissolved and destroyed all the old confederations of the old continents. Two modes of adjustment were suggested: first, to leave each State the right of naming friendly arbitrators upon each contested question as it should arise; and, second, to constitute a body of perpetual arbitrators. The first mode was in use among the ancients, and the last was once in use, and probably yet is, among the Swiss Cantons. It is the mode adopted in our constitution; the power is vested in the Supreme Court, and its subordinate courts, and the judges are constituted a perpetual body of friendly arbitrators. He called them friendly arbitrators, because there was no magic in the word judge—all judges being nothing more nor less than friendly referees. The court takes the place of friendly sovereigns, and are agreed upon beforehand to determine certain high disputes, which, if that provision had been left out of the constitution, would have been settled by war or by treaties, as among other sovereign powers. But the constitution itself is in the nature of a treaty; it is an agreement—a solemn compact—a compact of union—a perpetual treaty of union—and therefore he thought it strictly proper to say, that the States, and the people of the States, had stipulated and agreed that the judges of the Supreme Court should be friendly arbitrators, to determine all controversies arising in the class of cases enumerated in the second section of the third article of that instrument; and here the main question comes forward: How many of these arbitrators ought to concur in a decision, where the validity of State laws are disputed? Shall all concur, or a bare majority; or some intermediate number; or can a minority decide? We are here debating the proposition, but no one ventures to defend the propriety or policy of letting a minority exercise the power. Shall it be left to a bare majority? Can we deduce a sound rule from the theory or practice of our Government? The constitution is silent on the subject. It declares that—"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." The Federal courts were established by the law of September, 1789, and that law enacts that the Supreme Court shall consist of one Chief Justice and five Associate Justices, any four of whom are declared to be a quorum to do business; but it omits to say how many shall concur in giving a decision. That omission, however, was supplied by the compulsive operation of the law: If the six judges sat in a case, three of them could not decide against a State law; but if four of them were ready to concur, the court could then give judgment; but four is two-thirds of six; and so, from the necessity of the case, a State law was not invalidated until two-thirds of all the judges were against it. If only five judges sat in a cause, three, being a majority of five, could render a decree; and if only four sat, three of them must concur, or else the court would be equally divided; and thus it happened from necessity that no decision could be made against a State law, unless two-thirds of the whole court concurred when all sat, or three-fifths when five sat, or three-fourths when only four sat. And here he entreated gentlemen to remark, that no state of things could possibly occur, in which a minority of the whole court could invalidate a law. The conformation of the court put it out of the power of the body to encroach upon State rights by the invalidation of State laws. By the act of February, 1807, the court is to consist of seven judges, but no further regulation is made in that law, and of course four continued to be a quorum to do business. But as three is a majority of four, or of five, and a minority of seven, it is obvious, that when only four or five of the judges sat in a cause, a minority of the body could invalidate a State law. The act of 1807 ought to have directed how many of the judges should concur upon questions touching State rights, but it was then neglected, and Congress is now called upon to supply the omission. Shall we leave the court to regulate itself, or shall it be put "under such regulations as the Congress shall make." How shall we find a rule? By analogy, by looking into the theory and practice of the Federal Government and the State Gov-ments, by consulting the reason of the thing, by following the dictate of sound policy.

By analogy: State powers and State rights are put in question, and therefore the case of two sovereigns, referring a matter in controversy to other friendly sovereigns, bears a close analogy. It would be called, at the bar of the court, a case in point; and yet there is not a case to be found in all the books of international law, wherein three or more friendly sovereigns have decided a dispute referred to them, unless all of them concurred in the opinion. In such cases, an award by a minority, or a bare majority, would be pronounced as an outrage upon the parties making the submission. No sovereign would submit, and no nation ought to submit, to an umpire of minorities. Mr. T. again asserted, that by our own constitution, the judges are put in the place of friendly sovereigns, acting as referees between sovereigns, so far, at least, as State rights and State laws are drawn in question before them, and that, therefore, they ought to govern themselves by the rules and usages adopted by those who arbitrate between sovereigns. These rules would require a concurrence of all the judges, and he thought it quite probable that the time would come, when those rules would have to be adopted. Take the case of a reference in court, to three arbitrators, by consent of parties; all of them must concur in the award, unless the order of reference specially declares that any two of the number may decide the matter. From this, and similar cases, he argued, that all analogies required a concurrence of the whole body of judges or arbitrators. In all the State constitutions, there are clauses declaring what number of members shall form a quorum to do business in the legislative body; and why? Because it is generally understood that, without such a clause, none of the members could rightfully act until all were present. A similar clause, he said, would be found in the Federal Constitution.

On motion of Mr. McKim, the committee rose and the House adjourned.

Deaf and Dumb Asylum.

Mr. MOORE, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed on the memorial of the trustees of the institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb in the State of Kentucky, made a report on the said memorial, accompanied by a bill for the benefit of the said institution; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

Your committee entered upon the investigation of the subject referred to them, deeply impressed with the conviction that the great object of human legislation is to promote the happiness, as well as the security of the species. Its legitimate sphere extends beyond the erection of fortresses, the creation of military and naval armaments, fiscal arrangements, the punishment of public crime, and the reward of public virtue; and it is, when it interposes its benignant power in behalf of those domestic institutions, which are formed to alleviate the ills which originate in the infirmity of our nature, that its advantages are most generally felt and acknowledged by the mass of society. In the infancy of nations, indeed, institutions of this character are so limited in number and extent, as to claim but little attention, because the necessity of them is less obvious and imperative. But, as wealth, refinement, and population increase, bringing in their train a melancholy series of casualties and anomalies, the necessity of some provision for human infirmity becomes more apparent, and charity finds a rapidly expanding area, in which she may exercise her godlike propensities. For evidence of this truth, we may appeal to the universal history of civilized nations, as well as to the annals of those States of our Commonwealth, which have made the most rapid progress in population. If institutions, precisely similar to that to which the attention of your committee has been called, are less numerous, and of more recent origin, than other receptacles of human misfortune, these circumstances may be attributed, partly, to the relative paucity of cases, partly to an amiable weakness, which has prevented parents from banishing their children, thus affected, from the cheering comforts and endearments of home and kindred, and partly to the incredulity which has so long prevailed on the subject of any effectual alleviation which the skill of man could devise and apply. The influence of these causes has, however, been, for some time, diminishing. The fame of the philanthropic Abbé de L'Eppée has reached the utmost limits of the civilized world, and humanity triumphs in the conviction that, even in cases which come so entirely home to the "bosoms and business" of mankind, the imperfections of our nature may be, in some degree at least, corrected by the skill and perseverance of science and of art. Entertaining these general views, your committee admit neither difficulty nor hesitation, in applying them to the case which has been referred to their consideration.

The Kentucky institution for the tuition of the deaf and dumb, appears to your committee to have strong claims on the protecting benevolence of Congress. It is the only institution of the kind existing in all that vast and fertile range of country which lies west of the Alleghany chain of mountains. Institutions of this description can never, for reasons which we deem sufficiently obvious, become so general, even in the diminished ratio of the number of persons for whose benefit they are founded, as those which have for their object the instruction of the more favored, and, happily, far more numerous portion of our species. Your committee, therefore, believe, that the National Legislature would pursue a wise policy in adopting as its own, and cherishing by its protecting care, a few establishments of this kind, already in successful operation. Applications have already been made for the admission of pupils from many of the circumjacent States; nor have such applications been made in vain. Kentucky, forgetting her inability, in the zeal and fervor of her philanthropy, has placed the unfortunate sons of her sister States upon an equal footing with her own. The aid solicited by the petitioners is a boon asked, not for a single member of the Confederacy, but for a whole section of country rapidly increasing in population and resources, and justly entitled to the attention of Congress. The deaf and dumb asylum was incorporated and endowed by the Legislature of Kentucky, in 1822, and went into operation in the spring of the following year. At the late session of that body, a most respectable committee, composed of two members of the Senate, and four of the House of Representatives, was appointed to visit and examine the institution. In their report they say, "that they remained in Danville, and visited the asylum on two successive days, and were greatly gratified in witnessing the progress made by the pupils, whose facility and correctness in comprehending the signs made by the teacher, and in expressing their ideas, exceeded any thing that could have been anticipated by the most sanguine friends of the institution. All those who had been instructed for four months in the asylum, wrote good hands, spelled correctly, &c." And the committee, after noticing, in the highest terms of approbation, the administration of the institution, concluded by recommending it "to the continued and extended patronage of the Legislature." The number of pupils, at that time, was fourteen; five more were expected in a few days, and it was anticipated that, in the course of the present year, the whole would amount to forty. The trustees have ascertained that more than one hundred and thirty persons in Kentucky needed the benefits which that institution alone could confer, and of these more than one-third could receive them only from public munificence. It is believed that the number of cases in the adjacent States will bear a like proportion to their population. Under these circumstances, the following resolution passed both Houses of the Kentucky Legislature: "Resolved, That a respectful memorial from the Legislature be transmitted to the Congress of the United States, on behalf of the Kentucky Institution for the Tuition of the Deaf and Dumb; soliciting their attention to the petition of the trustees of said institution for the aid of the National Legislature." From some cause, unknown to us, the memorial thus ordered, was never presented by the committee appointed to prepare it. Your committee find that the principle and policy of extending relief to institutions of this character, have been recognized by the Congress of the United States, in a grant made to the Connecticut Asylum, and in that case they discover a strong precedent to justify the passage of a bill for the benefit of the Kentucky Asylum. They, therefore, beg leave to report a bill.

FRIDAY, May 7.

Navigation of Western Rivers.

Mr. HENRY, of Kentucky, moved to postpone all previous orders of the day, to go into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "for improving the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers;" and a bill "for deepening the harbor at Presque Isle, and for repairing Plymouth beach;" which was carried—ayes 69, noes 46.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on these bills, Mr. MARKLEY in the chair.

Mr. HENRY, of Kentucky, moved to strike out the two first sections of the first of the above bills, and insert the following:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to take prompt and effectual measures for improving the navigation of the waters of the Ohio River, by causing channels to be cut through all the bars which cross the current of said river, from Brownsville, in Pennsylvania, to the Mississippi, upon which said bars there shall not be, at the lowest stage, at least three feet water; or by causing dykes or sluices, or wing walls, to be constructed upon said bars, or by such other mode as, in each particular case, may be deemed most advisable."

Mr. HENRY made an explanatory statement of the facts, and of the nature of the plan proposed.

Mr. WICKLIFFE objected to the plan proposed in the amendment, and thought the improvement should be confined to the eradication of trees partially sunk in the river.

Mr. RANDOLPH coincided in this view, and stated the result of experiments on the Rappahannock and Roanoke Rivers.

Mr. HENRY replied, and defended his amendment.

Mr. CLAY suggested the following modification, viz: to strike out the clause which describes the mode of improving the river by dams, sluices, &c., and insert the following—"so as to insure, at the driest season, a uniform depth of three feet of water over each of said bars; and for this purpose, the President is authorized to employ any of the engineers in the public service which he may deem proper."

The amendment, thus modified, was agreed to, nom. con.

The blank for the distance below the surface at which the planters and sawyers shall be cut off, was filled with ten feet.

Mr. SCOTT moved to amend the bill in the fourth section, by including in its provisions the river Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The blank for the sum to be appropriated was filled with $75,000.

Mr. CLAY moved to rise and report the bill, and accompanied the motion with a series of observations on the circumstances of the case for which the bill provides.

The committee rose, and reported the bill concerning the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi, and asked leave to sit again upon the other bill committed to it; which was granted.

Five Millions New Stock.

The engrossed bill "to authorize the creation of a stock to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, to provide for the awards of the commissioners under the treaty with Spain, of the 22d of February, 1819," was read a third time.

Mr. TIER addressed the Chair as follows:

I am called upon, by the bill upon your table, to vote away five millions of the people's money, and such is the repugnance of my mind to the feature and principles of that bill, that I feel myself called upon, by every consideration of justice and sound policy, to place upon it my solemn veto. I shall endeavor to condense my ideas into as few words as possible, to render myself intelligible; and, although I cannot hope to change the opinion of a single member of this House, after the protracted discussion which the subject has undergone, yet I cannot feel that I shall have done justice to my country, if I pass it by in silence. The charge against the Government, to the extinguishment of which the moneys intended to be raised by the operation of the present bill is to be applied, arises out of a treaty concluded between the United States and the persons exercising the Government of Spain in the year 1819, wherein it is stipulated between the two powers, that "the Government of the United States shall pay to its own citizens a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars, for spoiliations committed upon our commerce, and unlawful seizures made by Spain, of the property of our citizens;" the payment to be made immediately, "at the Treasury, or by the creation of stock bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, payable out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands in Florida, or in such other manner as the Congress of the United States may by law prescribe;" these payments to be made "after certain commissioners, named in the treaty, or a majority of them, shall have adjusted and allowed the claims," which claims, it is admitted on all hands, never have, as yet, been adjusted and allowed, and which have been under consideration about three years. The decision of this question depends in part upon the construction which may be given to the above clause of the treaty, and the policy proper to be pursued under that construction. Hence, two general questions present themselves for our consideration—1, What is the proper construction to be given to this treaty? and 2, What shall be a correct policy to be pursued under that construction? In the solution of the first question, it becomes necessary to inquire, what were the motives or causes which led to the making of, or entering into, the treaty? What is the nature of the obligation imposed upon the contracting parties? and lastly, What rights do the claimants derive under it? There are two leading causes or motives for making and entering into treaties between nations—one is of a nature mild and peaceable, for the extension and regulation of friendly relations already subsisting between the parties; the other is of a nature adverse and hostile, for the reparation of friendly relations which once subsisted between them, but which had been broken off, and for a redress of grievances which had occurred during the suspension of those friendly relations, and comes in place of war. In the last general class of causes, there may be various motives for entering into a treaty with a foreign power—as when you are totally incapable of contending on equal grounds, for the want of an adequate force, or the want of due preparation, or, where the nation with which you contend has nothing to indemnify you for going to war; and when, from their peculiar situation, to go to war with them would not add to your honor or your present or future safety; and, under all or any of these circumstances, the most powerful nation would find a sufficient motive, and be fairly warranted in making a treaty, inadequate to the purposes of equal retribution and indemnification.

The causes which led to the making of the treaty under consideration seem to be of the latter kind; that is, for the reparation of friendly relations which once subsisted between this Government and Spain, and for the redress of grievances which occurred during the suspension of those friendly relations; and is expressed in the treaty to be for spoiliations committed on our commerce, or "unlawful seizures made by Spain of the property of our citizens." As the causes or motives which led to the promulgation of this treaty are only adverted to as matters of reference in its construction, and as they are set out in the treaty itself, it would seem a waste of time (which has now become very precious) to go into a detail of the various aggressions which induced this Government to call upon Spain for indemnity, and more especially as every honorable gentleman in this House must be well acquainted with them.

The next inquiry which occurs is, what is the nature of the obligations imposed upon the contracting parties? Every treaty comprehends several duties or obligations. Those which arise between the contracting powers as bodies politic; those which exist between the citizens or subjects of those powers; those which subsist between the respective Governments, and the citizens or subjects of each power; and those which are common to the Government, and its own citizens or subjects. Without going very deeply into abstract reasonings, it seems necessary to inquire a little into the nature of Governments, to come to a correct conclusion upon the case before us. Man, in a state of nature, independent of all political regulations, is bound to act honestly toward his fellow-man, and to do him all the good he can without subjecting himself to an injury; hence, where one man in this state of existence does another an injury, that other has a right to indemnity in some mode allowed by the law of nature, and, under such circumstances, might redress his own wrongs. But, having entered into the social compact, he is precluded from doing so: and, being so precluded, he has a right to call upon his Government to do that for him which he is not at liberty to do for himself; but, at the same time that he has a right to call upon his Government to redress wrongs committed against him by other Governments or their subjects, he has no right to expect any other reparation than that which he himself could have obtained, with competent power to enforce his claim; or, in other words, he can have no claim to an indemnity from his own Government which would not have been in the power of the aggressor to make. The examination of these principles will lead to a correct understanding of the obligation which the Government is under to those claimants for whose benefit the money in this bill is to be applied. Let us for a moment refer to the relative situation of the Government to those claimants, and see how they stand toward each other. It is a well-established, fundamental principle of the social system, that a man gives up a share of his natural rights and privileges, that he may have the remainder better secured to him; and one of those privileges which he surrenders, as before hinted, is his right to redress his own wrongs; and having given up that privilege, he has a right to expect of his Government to redress them, so far as shall be convenient and proper, taking into view every circumstance connected with its accomplishment. The Government, therefore, takes upon itself the task of redressing the wrongs of its subjects or citizens, agreeably to the principles before stated, keeping always in view the good of the whole community. Therefore, when it makes a treaty with an aggressing power, it is its duty to provide for its own indemnity and the indemnity of all its subjects, if convenient, and reasonably practicable; hence, it becomes a protector or guardian for them, not only to see that other nations do them justice, but to do them justice itself; and from this parental and protecting character, and none other, arises all the claims which its citizens or subjects have upon it; and for the purpose of carrying into effect all its functions with the greater facility, it is divided into departments, each of which has assigned to it certain limited and defined powers, and which every other department, as well as every citizen, is bound to respect, confide in, and submit to, so long as it acts within the sphere of its own authority; among these departments, or divisions of the Government, is the treaty-making power, and which is as perfect and absolute in the exercise of its various functions, and is entitled to as much deference, as any other power acting within the scope of its authority; and when that power has been exerted upon a particular occasion, its act is binding, not only on those immediately connected with the transaction, but upon the whole community.

Having examined the general powers of the Government, and its duties towards individuals who compose it, so far as they seem necessary for my purpose, I will apply those principles to the case before us, and see what will be the result. If I have laid down a single principle which is not substantially warranted by the authorities, or which will not stand the test of ethical analysis, I shall be open to correction and conviction by honorable gentlemen opposed to me. In this case, then, the Government of Spain has made unlawful seizures of the property of the claimants; this Government, as the guardian and protector of their rights, has interposed between them and Spain, and concluded the treaty now under consideration, to indemnify and remunerate them for losses sustained in consequence of such unlawful seizures. For the clear understanding of the nature of the obligation of the Government to those claimants, it will be necessary to give the several clauses of this treaty a separate and distinct consideration. As it regards the adequacy or inadequacy of the redress secured by it to those claimants; or, in other words, whether it be a provident or improvident treaty, I conceive, is not a subject for our present consideration. If, however, I were to give an opinion, I should say we had a right to presume it was the best that could have been gotten at the time. There is no honorable gentleman in this House that does not know the deranged—nay, the miserable vassal and bankrupt condition of that nation at the time it was made. And, although it may suit some honorable gentlemen to decry the treaty and the treaty-makers, I am disposed to make the best of the one, and think the most charitably of the others. Yet, however improvident the whole treaty may be, and inadequate the redress to the claimants, it is not for us now to change the nature of the former, or make up the deficiency in the latter; a duty has devolved upon us to carry it into effect, according to the terms of it, as the treaty-making power has laid them down—for that having passed upon it, it is conclusive with us. It is a co-ordinate branch of the Government, it has its powers to exercise, and its duties to perform; and, having performed them, it is not for us to violate our trust by trampling upon its authority, even if it had acted wrong; for, by so doing, we should make ourselves particeps criminis. If the honorable gentlemen who signed this treaty have looked over the interests of these claimants, and have taken an insufficient indemnity, let the responsibility rest with them; let us do our duty, and carry it into effect, in the manner they have prescribed. It was their duty to make the treaty; it is ours to carry it into effect; according to its terms. The honorable gentleman from New York cannot see in this treaty a triple alternative; I think I can very plainly see a double one.

The language of the treaty is: "The Government may, after the commissioners shall have admitted and allowed the claims to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, pay them immediately at the Treasury, or in the creation of stock at six per centum per annum, payable from the proceeds of sales of the public lands in the territories ceded, or in such other manner as the Congress of the United States may prescribe by law."

If these, then, are the terms of the treaty, what is the duty of the Government resulting from it, as regards the claimants? It is the duty of the Government now to discharge its obligations to the claimants in good faith, according to equity and justice. Obligations between the Government and the people are like all other obligations, and ought to be construed like them. I lay down the following as correct rules of construction with regard to contracts: All implied contracts (of which this is one) are to be construed according to equity and natural justice, taking into consideration all the circumstances connected with the transaction, or that thing which forms the consideration for making it. That each has a right to have it performed according to his reasonable expectation. That, in express contracts, where there is an alternative, or more than one mode of discharging them, the obligor has a right to select which of the modes he pleases; but when he has selected his mode, or made his choice, he is not at liberty afterwards to change it without the consent of the obliged. I further lay it down, as a fundamental principle with regard to trust and trustees, that the trustee can never be made accountable beyond the value of the trust estate, and that, where money is to be paid out of a certain or uncertain fund, you can never make the trustee or holder of the fund pay the money out of his own estate; and in no case can he be required to pay it until it becomes due. Here, then, it appears clearly, by the terms of the treaty, that the Government intended to reserve to itself the right to take into its own hands the fund out of which this money was to be paid, if circumstances would seem to warrant it—that is, if it should appear the lands were likely to turn out a productive fund, the object of the Government, no doubt, was to hold the land and pay the money immediately at the Treasury, or in such other manner as Congress might prescribe. Several reasons for such construction urge themselves upon the mind with great force.

It is said, by an honorable gentleman on the side of the question with myself, who is somewhat acquainted with its geography, that, although it is called "a land of flowers," it is, in fact, a land of sand-heaps, mosquitoes, frogs, serpents, and alligators. I know nothing of it myself, except what I have gathered from the general history of the country. But, I presume, its history or geography, at the time of the purchase, was very little known, which rendered its value very uncertain indeed; besides which, it may be recollected, that, by that same treaty, a part of that beautiful country, west and south of the Sabine River, and said to be more valuable than all the Floridas, was ceded to Spain as a part of the consideration for making the treaty—leaving it, indeed, very doubtful, whether all the lands ceded to the United States would be more than sufficient to the demands of those claimants. Again, it does appear evident, that something of this kind must have borne weight with the treaty-makers, as they have only undertaken by the treaty to secure to the claimants a sum of not more than five millions of dollars—leaving the balance, which is said, by some, to amount to more than ten millions, to future negotiation or total abandonment, guarding, very cautiously, all the time, against pledging the Government, in any shape, for more than five millions of dollars. And further, for the very purpose of meeting the contingent or uncertain value of the Florida lands, they introduced the optional provision in the treaty, before alluded to, which secures to the Government the right to keep those lands, should they be found valuable, as an indemnity for the cession of the lands beyond the Sabine; and at the same time to exclude the idea of a responsibility beyond the value of the Florida lands. The Floridas, while under the dominion of Spain, had already occasioned a hiatus in our sovereignty along the Gulf. To obtain possession of it, therefore, was considered a matter of great importance; and, no doubt, a sacrifice of a portion of land beyond the Sabine was made for the purpose of accomplishing an object of so much importance to the Government as that of securing the control of a maritime frontier, from the northern extremity of Maine to the mouth of the Sabine. I think, then, I am fairly warranted in saying, that, considering every circumstance connected with the transaction, the deranged and impoverished condition of Spain, the probability of her total incapacity to make any reparation for injuries done us, the peculiar situation of the Floridas in relation to the United States, and the necessity of taking them, or nothing, this country at the time, still bleeding with wounds inflicted by a recent war, the facility which its possession by a foreign power gave to drain the Southern country of its black population, the miserable imbecility and corruption of the Spanish authorities, calculated rather to favor than detect and punish piracies; besides the reflection that the sinuities and indentations of the coast, being eminently calculated to furnish a safe retreat in case of pursuit—hence, I say, under all these considerations, it was thought advisable to obtain the dominion and sovereignty of the country, if it could be had without actually paying money out of the Treasury—and hence, the sum stipulated to be paid the claimants was limited not to exceed five millions of dollars; and, at the same time, the payment confined to, and contingent upon, the value of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in those territories. This accounts, too, for the peculiar phraseology of the treaty in stating, “The five millions to be paid by the creation of stock, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, payable from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, within the territories ceded.” If it were intended that the whole of these claims should have been paid, why limit them to five millions? or, if it were intended that even this sum should be positively and unconditionally paid, why introduce the above restrictive clause? Why, I say, make it payable by the creation of stock with interest payable from the proceeds of the sales of those lands? The reason, I think, is very obvious. It was never intended to pledge the Government beyond the value of those lands, and at the same time to make for the claimants the best possible bargain that could be, under these restrictive circumstances. I am here met by a position taken by some of the friends of this bill, that Government is bound, at all events, to pay the interest, annually, on the stock created, and that to issue it, redeemable only out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands in Florida, would be creating a stock, in its nature irredeemable, which is always unfavorable, say they, for the Government, as it goes to create a perpetuity, except at the caprice of the holder.

In reply to this proposition, I would remark, (and I think I am warranted by the rule of construction and the language of the instrument in making it,) that you cannot torture the words of the treaty, or so distort its meaning, as to draw from it such a conclusion. If the treaty-makers had intended that such construction should be given to it, why were they not explicit—why not put down the very words, to be paid annually? Why use the circumlocution they have, when they might have come to it at once? Why leave it in doubt, or to construction? I say they have placed it, in my mind, beyond all doubt, and I conceive, in the mind of the whole world, except by the most unnatural distortion of the fair import of the words. Why did they not say the claims should be paid by the creation of stock at six per centum per annum, if such was their intention? If such language had been used, and they had stopped there, there could have been no misunderstanding, even with the most illiterate; or had they said they should be paid at the Treasury without saying more, no men—not even the claimants themselves—could have pretended to misunderstand them. They might have been much more concise, and have only said, the United States shall satisfy the claimants to the amount of five millions of dollars; that would have ended the matter with the most skeptical mind, and Government would have been left to its discretion to pay it in any way satisfactory to the claimants. But they have gone on and said, “Those claims should be paid, not exceeding five millions of dollars, in the creation of stock, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, payable from the proceeds of the sales of the lands in the territories ceded;” and the friends of the bill supply the words, payable annually, not out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands, but at the Treasury of the United States: for such is the effect of the construction for which they contend. Here principles for which I contended in the outset, apply. The Government becomes a trustee for the claimants; it has negotiated for them; has made the best bargain it could for them, without going into a doubtful contest with the sword. It has secured to them a fund of uncertain value, of which it is willing to give them the whole benefit, if it becomes necessary to the satisfaction of their claims; reserving to itself, however, the right to the surplus, if any there be. I say that it is a fair presumption that it was the best bargain that could have been made for them with a bankrupt nation. The Government being the natural, or rather the legal guardian, of the claimants, it stands completely in the place of a trustee for them, and by no principle in equity can it be required to pay more than the value of the fund which it holds. Let it be however a good or bad bargain, it has been made by the treaty-making power of this country, a power over which this House has no immediate legal control. It is a contract completely binding upon this House, the nation, and the claimants themselves; and unless we mean to trample upon one of the constituted authorities of the country, and usurp a power never intended by the constitution to have been placed in our hands, we shall conform ourselves to the contract made by that power. It is the duty of the Government, as the guardian of these claimants' rights, to make the best of the funds placed in its hands for them; and if they can be paid their interest annually out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands, agreeably to the contract made for them, they ought to be paid; if not, they ought to be paid as speedily as possible, but without encroaching upon other funds of the Government. What will be the principle established by the passage of the bill upon your table? You not only set aside the solemn act of a co-ordinate authority, but, sir, you establish the principle, that, unless you can obtain complete pecuniary redress by treating with a nation, you must go to war. An honorable gentleman on my right tells you, that the Government has interfered between the claimants and the Spanish authorities; it has undertaken their cause, and prevented them from seeking redress in their own way against that power; and now, says the honorable gentleman, after interfering, and preventing them from making the best bargain they could, you are not willing to make them full reparation.

And, sir, what are you to get in lieu of your five millions of dollars? I will not say a land of mosquitoes, frogs, serpents, and alligators. I will suppose the best that can be said of it. You know not what you have got; you have got some wild lands in a country whose geography no man in this House can know with any certainty; you have relinquished the bird in the hand for the bare possibility of obtaining the one in the bush. You have indemnified a few insurance companies and underwriters, and have saddled the nation with a certain debt of five millions, and the interest until paid. By the bargain you drive, you violate one of the first rules of private economy, that is, "never to buy, at any price, an article you can neither use nor sell." Have you not already more public lands than you can dispose of to advantage? Are they not the greatest drug in the market? Have you not lands in nine different States and Territories? And, sir, will the Florida lands pay the interest on the capital vested? They certainly will not. If indeed, you appropriate the proceeds of the sales of all the public lands in the United States, they will scarcely pay the debt and interest in ten years. If you make a calculation of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in that State where the population is increasing more rapidly than in any other State in the Union, and at that period, too, when there were more lands sold, perhaps, than at any other—I mean the years 1820-'1-'2; upon such calculation, sir, it will be found that this debt and the interest can scarcely be paid in one hundred and fifty years. I have allusion to the State which I have the honor in part to represent. The sales of the public lands in that State, if I mistake not, averaged in the years 1820-'1-'2, three hundred and thirty-two thousand one hundred and sixty-five dollars. From this sum deduct the interest of the debt, which is three hundred thousand dollars, and we find a balance of $32,165 to be applied annually to the extinguishment of the original debt. And, sir, can you hope that the lands in Florida will ever be as productive as the lands in Indiana? If so, it is a vain hope, which will never be realized.

One further view of this subject, and I have done. Gentlemen may endeavor to make themselves believe those calculations are fallacious, and my views visionary. I presume a fair method of calculating, and one that no honorable gentleman can object to, will be to compare the value of the two kinds of stock. What would be the difference in value of stock, payable from the proceeds of these lands, the value of which is totally unknown, and the value of that kind of stock proposed by this bill? The one directs you to the Treasury of the United States annually, for the sum of three hundred thousand dollars; the other leads you through this land of reptiles described by my friend from Virginia. I say, what is the fair value of each, and what the discrepancy? This tests the policy of the bill. I put it to every honorable gentleman in this House, what difference would you make in the price of the stock? Would you make 20 per cent.? If so, you are throwing away a million of dollars on the claimants. But, sir, I say there is forty per cent. difference; and, if so, you are throwing away two millions.

When Mr. Test had concluded—

Mr. RANDOLPH moved its recommitment to the Committee of Ways and Means, and supported the motion by a speech.

After some remarks from Mr. BARTLETT, the question was again taken on recommitting the bill, and decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, by yeas and nays.—For the bill 117, against it 66.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

SATURDAY, May 8.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, the House took up the bill "authorizing the President of the United States to enter into certain negotiations relative to lands located under Virginia military land warrants, lying between Ludlow's and Roberts' lines, in the State of Ohio."

[This bill provides, "That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to ascertain the number of acres, and, by appraisement or otherwise, the value thereof, exclusive of improvements, of all such lands lying between Ludlow's and Roberts' lines, in the State of Ohio, as may, agreeable to the principles of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Doddridge, lessee, against Thompson and Wright, be held by persons under Virginia military warrants, and on what terms the holders will relinquish the same to the United States; and that he report the facts at the commencement of the next session of Congress."]

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, presented a memorial on the subject, which had been transmitted to him by an individual in the State of Ohio; which was read.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, stated the grounds of the bill, and the merits of the titles which are proposed to be quieted by it. He replied, also, to certain statements in the petition just read, which he considered not entirely accurate.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, with a view to cover as well the claims not located, as those which are, and which it appeared to him equally proper to provide for, moved to lay the bill on the table, to allow him time to prepare an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. VANCE said, that, however the description of claims referred to by Mr. BARBOUR might require future legislation, he did not think it ought to be connected with this bill, which embraced a distinct class of cases.

Mr. BARBOUR withdrew his motion with a view to introduce his proposition separately from it.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, moved to amend the bill by adding to it a provision requiring a statement of the amount paid by the purchasers to the General Government for the land, and when paid, to be included in the communication to Congress.

After some observations from Mr. RANKIN and Mr. VANCE, this motion was withdrawn by the mover, under the impression that the information might be otherwise obtained.

Mr. McCoy, of Virginia, expressed his doubts of the expediency of legislating on this subject at all. When Congress did legislate on the subject, they ought, at least, to give the holders of military warrants the option of locating the warrants on other lands than those now open to them, &c.

Mr. McARTHUR, of Ohio, feeling himself interested in this bill, said he should decline voting upon it. He stated, however, some of his views on the subject, one of which was, that the bill was one-sided, regarding the United States only, and could not prejudice any interest of the United States. He had hoped the claimants under Virginia would have been allowed a participation in the investigation proposed by this bill, but the committee, it seemed, had determined otherwise. Some of the statements in the petition which had been read, he pronounced to be false, and it had apparently been drawn up without any knowledge of the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, further explained and defended the provisions of the bill, gave a history of the case embraced in it; and, on his motion, the report of the select committee in the case, was read.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without opposition.

Wabash and Miami Canal.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. Ross in the chair,) on the bill to authorize the State of Indiana to open a canal through the public lands, to connect the navigation of the rivers Wabash and the Miami of the Lake.

Mr. CALL, Delegate from Florida, moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "ninety feet," proposed by the bill to be given for the location of the canal, and insert in lieu thereof a provision for giving the square of a mile on each side for the whole length of the canal.

In support of this motion, Mr. CALL delivered a speech of some length, which he commenced by replying to an anticipated objection on the score of precedent, by saying that a grant of land for a road was in principle the same as a grant for a canal, and a grant similar to this, for a road through a part of the State of Ohio towards Detroit, had been lately made. He then turned his attention to the importance of the canal proposed to be made, which, he said, would open a communication which would connect New Orleans with the Western Lakes, to the great facilitation of military operations for the purposes of defence, &c., not to speak of the facilitation of commerce. But this channel, however important, it would not be possible to open, for a long time at least, without the aid of a grant of the public lands, &c.

Mr. RANKIN, the Chairman of the Committee of Public Lands, stated the views of the committee on the subject. They duly appreciated the importance of such a canal, believing it to be the best point for the connection of these waters, but were restrained, by principles on which they had always acted, from going beyond the space necessary for a canal, and for assisting the collection of tolls thereon. If Congress intended to give a grant to this canal, or any other road or canal, it was much preferable that the grant should be in money, rather than in land. The road which has been spoken of, was claimed as a right, accruing under the treaty of Brownstown, and could not be considered as a precedent for this measure. With regard to the expediency of granting aid to this measure, Mr. R. said, if it should be included in a general system of internal improvement, he should be in favor of it, but was opposed to acting upon it in the manner now proposed.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, made a few remarks, expressive of the deep interest he felt on this subject, and of his conviction that the benefit to accrue from it to the United States, would doubly repay the whole expense of making the canal.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Indiana, explained the geographical character of the country through which the canal is to run. It was a measure so perfectly practicable, that he believed the deepest part of the canal from the surface, supposing the canal to be a dead level, would not be more than twenty-five feet. Its length would be only from fifteen to twenty miles. The country on both sides of the route was extremely rich, as rich, indeed, as it possibly could be, and capable of producing a vast amount of agricultural products. On the importance of this work to that country, and to the United States generally, he dwelt at some length, and then replied to the objections made by Mr. RANKIN, on the ground of the obligations of the compact with Virginia, and showed by computation that the proposed appropriation of land would advance the value of the public lands to a much greater amount than that of the proposed appropriation.

On motion of Mr. TRACY, of New York, the committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, May 10.

Navigation of Western Rivers.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, the House took up the bill "for the improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers."

Mr. BUCHANAN offered, as an amendment to the bill, the following:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the navigation of the Ohio River to be improved over the following sand-bars, or either of them, at his discretion, to wit: the sand-bar which crosses said river one mile and a quarter below Flint Island; the sand-bar two miles above French Island; the bar just below Henderson; the bar below Straight Island; the bar below Willow Island, in the Mississippi bend; and the bar opposite to Lower Southerland, below Cumberland Island; and, for the purpose of ascertaining and directing the best method of carrying the provisions of this act into effect, he may employ any of the engineers in the public service which he may deem proper: Provided, nevertheless, That an experiment shall first be made upon one of the sand-bars, and if, in his judgment, it shall be successful, then, and not otherwise, he is hereby authorized to cause experiments to be made upon the remaining bars."

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, was opposed to this amendment of the bill, as being calculated to embarrass it, and, in effect, to defeat it. He objected especially to the proviso, which requires a previous experiment before the appropriation is to be applied. The obstacles in the Western rivers are, he said, so various in their kind, that an experiment on one could not apply to the rest of them—and the President must depend on the opinions of others as to the success of the experiment when made, &c. He preferred direct legislation on the subject to any contingent provision. Mr. S. went on at considerable length to show the propriety of the amendment adopted in committee, making Brownsville the point of commencement where the proposed improvement met the national road, and rendered complete and entire the chain of communication between the East and West, &c., stating a variety of facts to show the great advantages to the West which would result from this measure.

Mr. HENRY, of Kentucky, replied, and advocated the amendment, on the ground that it was of paramount importance to obtain a recognition of the principle embraced in the bill, and that the particular modification of it was not of so great importance. For the sake of conciliating the opinions of all who were friendly to the principle of the bill, he was willing to yield his own opinion as to the details of it; and, with that view, he was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, moved to amend the proposed amendment so as to cause two experiments to be made instead of one, &c.

Mr. BUCHANAN rejoined—expressed his regret that the debate should be renewed—the committee's report was confined to certain bars in the river which were not of different kinds, but of one kind; and all he wished was, that a trial should be made on one of these before money should be expended on the rest.

Mr. TRIMBLE advocated the amendment. He was in favor of an experiment, and thought it ought first to be attempted on the lower part of the river.

Mr. McARTHUR was indifferent whether one or two experiments were made in the Mississippi, but advocated the propriety of extending the experiment to the Ohio River also, the obstructions in which were quite as dangerous to property as those in the Mississippi.

Mr. STEWART suggested to Mr. MALLARY to modify his motion, so as to require two "or more" experiments.

Mr. MALLARY did not accept of the suggestion.

Mr. KREMER advocated the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN. He had had some experiments in attempts to remove sand-bars in the Susquehanna, the result of which had been very unfavorable. He therefore wished an experiment made on one of those in the Ohio.

Mr. HOGBOOM, of New York, took similar ground, and stated the difficulties which had been experienced in the Hudson, where vast sums had been thrown away in attempts to remove sand-bars, without any permanent benefit from the expenditure.

Mr. POINSETT, of South Carolina, suggested that there was a great difference between removing obstructions from sand in tide rivers and those where the stream always ran one way. In the former class of streams, the removal of one sand-bar was succeeded by the formation of others; but, in streams like the Mississippi and the upper part of the Ohio, where the water always ran in one direction, the case was very different.

The amendment of Mr. MALLARY, proposing two experiments, was agreed to—ayes 77, noes 71.

Mr. BUCHANAN's amendment, as thus amended, was then put, and carried.

The several other amendments, reported by the Committee of the Whole, were then agreed to.

Mr. McARTHUR then offered an amendment in the fourth section, to make its commencement read as follows: "And for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River, from the mouth of the Missouri to New Orleans, and of the Ohio River, from Pittsburgh to its junction with the Mississippi," so as to include the Ohio River in the experiment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, the House agreed to take up the report of the committee on the claim of Beaumarchais. The motion was carried—ayes 81, noes 54.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMPBELL of Ohio in the chair, on that report.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: It is well known to most of the committee, that Mr. Beaumarchais, in the first years of the Revolution, furnished clothing and military supplies to the United States to the amount of several millions of livres; that his account has been finally settled at the Treasury, and the whole amount paid, except one million of livres, which the accounting officers of that Department contend he received from his own Government, and was one of the nine millions which Louis XVI. gratuitously gave to the United States. It is admitted by the claimants that he did receive a million in behalf of the United States, but they say, and the agents of the French Government say, that it was given him to be expended in secret service money, and that he has satisfactorily accounted for the disbursement of it to his Government, to whom alone he was accountable. From this decision of the Treasury Department, an appeal is made to Congress.

Hitherto, Mr. Chairman, the merits of this claim have hinged upon the fact whether the million in question was received by Mr. Beau-marchais, for the purchase of supplies, or not, and, as the arguments adduced on either side of the question are, in the absence of the highest evidence, derived from a great mass of circumstantial testimony, and are comprehended in long and numerous documents, I will beg leave to call the attention of the committee to the most important facts. Such a review will give the necessary information to those who have not found time to read the report, and refresh the memories of those who have.

Early in the year of 1776, Mr. Beaumarchais called on Mr. Arthur Lee, then an agent of the United States, in London, and informed him that the French Government were willing to furnish the United States with supplies to the amount of two hundred thousand louis d'or, which he proposed to transmit through the French West Indies, under color of a commercial transaction. Mr. Beaumarchais soon afterwards returned to Paris, and there made a more special and formal arrangement with Mr. Silas Deane, also an agent of the United States, for the transmission of these supplies; and to give it the appearance of a commercial adventure, and conceal it from the British Government, it was further agreed that tobacco, and other American products, should be remitted to Mr. Beaumarchais.

In pursuance of this arrangement, eight cargoes of military stores, clothing, and other merchandise, were shipped, by Mr. Beaumarchais, to the United States, in the years 1777 and 1778—and, during the same time, France furnished the American Commissioners, who were, at that time, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Lee, and Mr. Deane, with two millions of livres in cash, and they obtained a third from the Farmers General. During the shipment of these supplies, there seemed to have been great uncertainty, on the part of the Commissioners, about the source from whence they were derived. Mr. Lee, judging from what had passed between him and Mr. Beaumarchais, and from the subsequent assurances of the French Minister, always insisted that they were derived principally from the King—while Mr. Deane seemed to think that we were indebted for them solely to Mr. Beaumarchais. On a comparison, however, of their several letters, it is impossible to reconcile the statements of the different Commissioners with one another, or those of the same gentlemen, at different times.

In the year 1778, Mr. Deane was recalled, and Mr. Adams, late President of the United States, was sent to supply his place. In September of that year, the three Commissioners wrote to the Count de Vergennes, then Premier of France, stating their doubts about the source of these supplies, and requested to know of him what part of them had been furnished by Beaumarchais, and what part by the King—that both they and the people of the United States had always believed the greater part of these supplies had been furnished by His Majesty, and that they would discharge the obligation as soon as Providence should put it in their power. To this application Mr. de Vergennes answers, that the King had furnished nothing—that he had permitted Mr. Beaumarchais to furnish himself from his arsenals, on condition of replacing the articles, and that he would, as to these articles, interpose to prevent the United States from being pressed for immediate payment. This correspondence was transmitted to America, and in the following year, Congress directed their President, Mr. Jay, to write to Mr. Beaumarchais, acknowledging the debt and promising payment. From that day to this, he has stood upon the books of the Treasury as a creditor for the whole amount of these supplies, and payments were made him from time to time. Besides the remittances in tobacco, and other domestic products, equal to about 10 per cent. of the value of the supplies, bills were drawn in his favor, on our Commissioners in France, for between two and three millions of livres, payable in one, two, and three years.

In the year 1782, Mr. Deane returned to France, and made a settlement with Mr. Beaumarchais, by which the balance due to him was about nine hundred thousand dollars. This settlement, however, was not ratified by Congress, because it was said Mr. Deane had no authority to make one; and because, I presume, Congress did not approve it. But in 1784, Mr. Barclay, who was appointed our Consul General to France, was vested with authority to make a settlement with Mr. Beaumarchais, subject to the ratification of Congress. He accordingly made one, differing not materially from the settlement since made at the Treasury, but it did not receive the confirmation of Congress. Probably this settlement would have been ratified, if a circumstance had not come to light, which is a curious one, as well in the history of diplomacy, as in the life of that distinguished man, Dr. Franklin. In the year 1786, on a settlement of the account of Mr. Grand, our banker in Paris, it was discovered that he had given credit but for eight millions received from the French Government by way of gratuity, instead of nine, which, in a treaty dated three years before, Dr. Franklin had acknowledged to have received. Dr. Franklin, on being informed of the variance, applied to Mr. Grand for an explanation, who, in turn, applied to the Count de Vergennes, but he refused to state to whom the million in question was paid; and that, as it was paid out of the Royal Treasury on the 10th June, 1776, (which was before Dr. Franklin arrived in France, and before Mr. Grand became the American banker,) a copy of the receipt for this million could not be necessary for their exoneration. It was then conjectured by Dr. Franklin that Mr. Beaumarchais had received this million. In 1788, a committee of three members of Congress (of which Mr. Arthur Lee was the chairman) had the subject of Mr. Beaumarchais' accounts referred to them for settlement; and, in their report, by not allowing many of his claims for commission, insurance, and other charges, and charging him with some supposed losses,—they made him a debtor to the United States to a large amount.

After the adoption of the new constitution, Mr. Beaumarchais, complaining of the injustice that has been done him, renewed his application to the Government; and, in 1798 a settlement of his accounts was made by the Auditor, under the superintendence of Mr. Hamilton, on more liberal, and it appears to me more correct principles, by which a balance was found due to him of upwards of two millions of livres. But the report recommends that payment should be suspended until some further explanation should be given of the "lost million," as it was often called. But, in the following year, Mr. Gouverneur Morris, as Minister from this country to France, applied to the Minister for Foreign Affairs for information relative to the million that remained unaccounted for, and, by a well-timed compliment, succeeded in obtaining the receipt for this million advanced in June, 1776, by which it appeared to have been paid to Mr. Beaumarchais.

In the following year, Mr. Beaumarchais wrote a long and eloquent memorial on the subject of his claim, in which he insisted that he had rendered an account to his own Government of the money he had received from it. But the coincidence of sums and dates furnished such strong circumstantial evidence against him, that he was held chargeable at the Treasury for the million he had received in June, 1776. After his death, (which took place about 1799,) the claim was renewed, in behalf of his representatives, in 1802, by Mr. Petion, the Chargé d'Affaires from France; and in 1805, by Mr. Turreau, the Minister Plenipotentiary, who then stated, for the first time, that, on an examination of the archives of his Government, it had been discovered that the million received by Mr. Beaumarchais in June, 1776, had been paid him for a secret political service. On the last application, the subject was referred to a committee of this House, who, after charging Mr. Beaumarchais with the million in question, reported a balance of about forty-one thousand dollars, which was paid him, with interest. In the succeeding year, Mr. Turreau again pressed the claim on the notice of the Government, and stated that the million had been paid for a secret political service, but not for the purchase of supplies. The subject was not then acted on by the House. Since that time it has been repeatedly brought before Congress, and from first to last the memorial of the present claimants has been referred to six different committees, exclusive of that of the present year—three of whom reported in favor of the claim, and three against it.

On the question whether Mr. Beaumarchais received the million, of June, 1776, for the purchase of supplies, or not, (the point on which the committee chiefly differed, there is much circumstantial evidence on both sides. The following facts are unfavorable to the supposition that the supplies were purchased from his own funds: The mediocrity of his fortune; many of the articles furnished were drawn from the King's arsenals; the repeated declarations of the French Minister to our Commissioners; the letter of the Minister to the King, in May, 1776, in which he speaks of advancing a million for the use of "the colonies;" the letter from the King of France to the King of Spain, in which he says he has furnished money and other succors, ostensibly on the score of trade; and, lastly, the letter of Mr. Beaumarchais himself, of December, 1776, wherein he states his advances to have been about one million of livres.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

But, on the other hand, there is the solemn declaration of Mr. de Vergennes that the King had furnished nothing. He certainly was not warranted in saying the King had furnished no supplies, if he had furnished money to purchase supplies. But, again: there can be no doubt but Mr. Beaumarchais must have been held accountable to his Government for this million, for whatever purpose it was put into his hands. But if it was intended as douceurs for persons about the Court, or to procure intelligence, or to bribe foreign agents, or for any of those purposes for which secret service money is usually employed, it is said, and it seems not improbable, that the vouchers in such cases are destroyed. The evidences of such details they might wish to withhold, not only from the world, but from their successors. But there could be no reason to destroy the vouchers, if they related merely to the purchase of supplies. The absence, then, of all vouchers of the particulars of disbursement, affords some evidence that the money was expended for one purpose and not for the other.

On weighing this conflicting evidence, I am free to admit, Mr. Chairman, that there is a preponderance of testimony that Mr. Beaumarchais received the million in dispute, for the purchase of supplies; and, if France had been passive on the occasion, or, if we had paid any valuable consideration to her for this million, I should think we were justified in charging Mr. Beaumarchais with that amount. But, when it is recollected that we received these supplies immediately from Mr. Beaumarchais, have settled the account upon our own terms, that the million which we claim as a credit was paid, not by us, but by France, as an act of bounty, and that the French Government insists that this bounty was used for another purpose—when these things are recollected, it does seem to me, that we are precluded from entering into a contest with France on this subject; or, in other words, that we cannot, consistently with our honor or self-respect, pay off an undisputed debt, with a doubtful and disputed gift. On this occasion, Mr. Chairman, I cannot recognize one rule of morality for the nation, and another for individuals. I would pursue the same course in public as in private life; and, as an individual, I never could seek to give the bounty of a benefactor a direction which he objected to, for the purpose of making a discount to the acknowledged debt of a third person. Sir, in this case, France is right, or she is not. If she is right, that the million was furnished to Beaumarchais for secret service money, then we have no pretext for refusing to pay him the balance of his account; but, if she is wrong, then the error consists in claiming our gratitude for nine millions when she has given us but eight, which can in no manner affect the account of Beaumarchais.

The whole of the present difficulty has grown out of the mistake of Dr. Franklin, in the treaty of February, 1788. When he signed that treaty, suppose he had been aware that but eight millions of livres had actually been received, and that he had said to the Count de Vergennes: "You call on me to acknowledge the receipt of nine millions, as the gift of your Government, while I know only of eight; show me how the other million was used for our benefit, and I will freely acknowledge that too;" if, in answer to this, the Count de Vergennes had said, what his successors have said, that the million was used for a "secret political service," can it be believed that Dr. Franklin would have hesitated to receive the assurance, and to sign the treaty which he actually did sign? If he would not, there would have been no ground for the present dispute. But, let us suppose that he would not have been content with the simple assurance of the French Minister, then either that Minister must have given him satisfactory evidence concerning the disposition of the doubtful million, or he would have acknowledged only eight millions, in either of which cases Mr. Beaumarchais's claim is indisputable. Assuredly, if our agent had signed a treaty under a mistake, as he himself states, that mistake should be rectified with the French Government, which should either give us a satisfactory explanation, or hold us bound in gratitude but for eight millions, neither of which can affect the claim of Beaumarchais.

Mr. Chairman, we ought to be consistent with ourselves, with regard to the declarations of the French Government. When Monsieur de Vergennes declared to our Commissioners, in September, 1778, that the military supplies were furnished solely by Mr. Beaumarchais, we acquiesced in that assurance, and required no further proof. Again: Mr. Gallatin, in his late correspondence with the Duke de Richelieu, Minister of Foreign Affairs in France, stated, that if the French Government would make an explicit negative declaration, that the million paid to Mr. Beaumarchais, in June, 1776, was not applied to the purchase of supplies, the difficulty with the accounting officers of the Treasury would have been removed. And, although the answer of the Duke de Richelieu may be considered as somewhat equivocal, yet that which Mr. Turreau had made in 1807, was as positive and explicit as it could be. Had this declaration been made the year before, it would seem, from Mr. Gallatin's letter, the million would not have been deducted from Beaumarchais's account; and, it having been made since, the same consequence should follow. On every ground, then, Mr. Chairman, I am free to say I would vote at once for an appropriation to the whole amount of this claim, whatever may be my private opinion of the source whence Mr. Beaumarchais derived the million; it being certain that he did not derive it from us, and that we have used the supplies which it purchased. But, as our citizens have claims against France for spoliations on their commerce to a large amount, (probably twenty times as much as this claim,) and the French Government has itself introduced Mr. Beaumarchais's claim into the negotiation, I think we may adjust the whole together, without any dereliction of national justice or honor, and I therefore hope the committee will adopt the resolution for that purpose offered by the committee.

When Mr. TUCKER had concluded—

Mr. DWIGHT called for the reading of the report of the committee of this House in 1814, (and of which committee Mr. LOWMEYER was chairman,) unfavorable to the claim.

Mr. FARRELLY called for the reading of the opinion of the Attorney-General, Mr. Rodney, in 1807.

Mr. CLAY, in a short speech, expressed a very decided opinion in favor of the claim.

Mr. LIVERMORE took the opposite side, and delivered a few observations in opposition to an allowance of the claim.

Mr. DWIGHT then rose, and went at great length into the whole subject, in reply to Mr. TUCKER and Mr. CLAY, quoting a number of documents in support of his statements, and concluded his speech with offering a resolution that the petitioner have leave to withdraw her petition.

Mr. FARRELLY followed in reply, and spoke at considerable length, to show that the demand was just, and ought to be allowed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose in opposition to the claim, quoted declarations of the Count de Vergennes, remarked on the opinion of Mr. Pinkney, and adduced general arguments against allowing any part of the demand.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, rose, and, expressing a desire to deliver his sentiments, which were most decidedly in favor of the claim, moved that the committee rise.

The committee rose accordingly, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, May 11.

Navigation of Western Rivers.

The engrossed bill making an appropriation for improving the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, was read a third time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays on the question of its passage; and they stood, yeas 155, nays 60.

So the bill was passed and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, in the chair,) on the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the report of the committee to whom was referred the claim of the representatives of M. de Beaumarchais.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, who was by custom entitled to the floor, having yesterday moved for the committee's rising, then rose, and delivered, at great length, his views in favor of the claim.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, delivered his views in opposition to the claim; and concluded his speech, by moving that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, with a view that leave be refused.

The question on the committee's rising, being then taken, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, noes 40.

The question, on granting leave to sit again, was decided in the negative—yeas 60, noes 91.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the report of the committee was then ordered to lie on the table.

Canal in Indiana.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. MARVIN in the chair,) on the bill "authorizing the construction of a canal through the public lands, in the State of Indiana, between the Wabash and Miami of Lake Erie."

The question recurring, from Saturday, on Mr. CALL's motion to strike out "ninety feet," and insert "one mile," for the extent of the reservation on each side of the canal—

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, objected to the amendment, as trenching on the terms of the cession of the Northwestern Territory by Virginia to the United States, which declare that the whole of that cession shall be a fund for the payment of the common expenditures of the United States.

Mr. RANKIN took the same ground; the proposed canal was a local work, and not one of the "common expenditures" of the U. States, and thought it was better to give money than land in aid of it.

Mr. TEST contended, that giving a mile on each side of the canal did not violate the terms of the cession more than 90 feet—it was in the spirit of that cession, because it enhanced the value of all the rest of the lands ceded. Unless this land was given, Indiana would be unable to effect the object. This was the only opportunity, at once, of giving timely aid to the canal, and of enhancing the value of the public lands.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, denied that this canal was a local measure, and he stated its effects on the Union at large. He advocated the amendment—and read an extract from the writings of Mr. Fulton on the benefits of canals. He replied, also, to the objections of Mr. ALEXANDER, &c.

Public Lots in Washington.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, thought that, if the canal would so greatly enhance the value of the public lands, it would be better for the United States to make the canal than to give all the benefit of the work to Indiana. The calculation was, that the canal would cost only $300,000, and they asked land to the value of $500,000. He for one would never consent to give it.

Mr. CALL, Delegate from Florida, spoke in reply, and urged the present low value of the public lands in that quarter as an argument in favor of the bill. All that was proposed to be given would, at present value, amount only to $35,000. The additional value would arise from the enterprise and industry of the State of Indiana. He replied to the arguments of Mr. ALEXANDER, and dwelt at some extent on the value of this line of water communication, and the facility of making the canal.

Mr. SHARPE, of New York, thought the only question was, whether this was the proper time to engage in the undertaking. He wished farther information on this point, and expressed some apprehensions of the danger of the precedent.

Mr. RANKIN replied, and explained the facts of the case, and repeated and confirmed the arguments he had before urged.

Mr. JENNINGS called for the reading of the memorial of the Legislature of Indiana on this subject. It was read accordingly.

Mr. JENNINGS stated the topography of the country through which it was proposed to cut this canal. He adverted to the opinion of General WASHINGTON, in favor of this and other Western communications. He went at considerable length into a discussion of the objections from the terms of the Virginia cession, and of the practicability and general importance of the measure.

Mr. TIER followed in farther explanation of the bill and the amendment.

Mr. MCCOY delivered at some length his objections to the amendment, as granting to one State what was intended only for general objects. He urged the danger of the precedent, the difficulty with which Virginia could get enough land to pay her Revolutionary soldiers, &c.

Mr. SHARPE thought the grant in the amendment very large, and the time for completing the work too great. This measure would be superseded, moreover, by the general plan for internal improvements. He thought it was enough, at present, to provide for surveys, as had been already done.

The question on the amendment moved by Mr. CALL, for giving a mile on each side the canal, being then taken, was decided in the negative.

Canal in the Territory of Florida.

The committee then took up a bill to authorize the Territory of Florida to open a canal through the public lands; and, having gone through it, reported the latter bill, which was ordered to a third reading, and asked and obtained leave to sit again on the former.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 12.

Inland Trade between Missouri and New Mexico.

Mr. SCOTT laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House any information which he may possess, in relation to the intercourse and trade now carried on between the people of the United States (and particularly the people of the State of Missouri) and the Mexican provinces; how, and by what route that trade or intercourse is carried on; in what it consists; the distances, &c.; the nations of Indians through which it passes; their dispositions, whether pacific or otherwise; the advantages resulting, or likely to result, from that trade or intercourse.

Indiana Canal.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, in the chair,) on the bill to authorize the State of Indiana to open a canal through the public lands; and the question recurring from yesterday on the amendment granting ninety feet of land on each side of the proposed canal, it was agreed to.

The blank in the second section was so amended, as to require the survey to be finished within three, and the canal to be finished within twelve years.

THURSDAY, May 13.

Public Lots in Washington.

The following report was yesterday made by Mr. BRENT, of Louisiana:

The committee appointed by virtue of a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 4th day of March, 1824, have had the subject which that resolution proposes under consideration, and submit the following report, viz: A letter from J. Elgar, Commissioner of the Public Buildings, dated 5th of May, 1824, by which it appears that the gross amount of the sales of the public lots, in Washington city, as made by the Commissioners and Superintendent, was six hundred and eighty-nine thousand four hundred and forty dollars, eleven cents, subject to a deduction for losses, occasioned by failures of purchasers, the amount of which has not been ascertained. The committee have not been able to obtain information from the books of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, of the number of public lots sold, when sold, by whom, to whom, and for what price each lot; what part of the purchase money has been paid, and the exact balance due. To obtain this information, would require more time than probably remains of the present session of Congress, as the Commissioner of the Public Buildings states that it could not be done in less than two months.

As to the disbursements which were made by the late Samuel Lane, Commissioner of the Public Buildings, the committee find that a balance of $22,961 77 was due by the late Samuel Lane, Commissioner of the Public Buildings, at the time of his death, together with the balance of $1,740 14, which he had received on account of the sales of city lots; and that, since his death, his estate has received credit for different sums of money amounting to $9,075 08, which leaves a balance due the United States of $15,590 85; that his executor has not yet completed the settlement of his estate; and, therefore, it is impossible for the committee to say how much of that balance will eventually be refunded to the United States. It is probable the balance will be somewhat diminished, but that a large sum will remain unpaid.

The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be made, and submitted to this House, upon the first day of the next session of Congress, a full and complete statement of the exact number of lots belonging to the United States, in the city of Washington, which have been sold by the public agents for that purpose, when sold, by whom, to whom, and for what price each lot was purchased; what part of the purchase money has been paid, the amount due, and by whom due, and when payable; whether the debts are well secured, and whether the money received has been applied; to what purposes, and by whom.

Occupying Claimant Laws, &c.

The resolutions some time since offered by Mr. LETCHER (in relation to decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States) were taken up—ayes 80, noes 48.

The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on those resolutions, which are as follows:

“Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law, requiring, in any cause decided in the Supreme Court, in which shall be drawn in question the validity of any part of the constitution of a State, or of any act passed by the Legislature of a State, that — justices shall concur in pronouncing such part of the said constitution or act to be invalid; and that without the concurrence of that number of said justices the part of the constitution or act of the Legislature (as the case may be) so drawn in question, shall not be deemed or holden invalid.

“Resolved, That the justices aforesaid, in pronouncing their judgment in any such cause, as aforesaid, ought to be required by law to give their opinions, with their respective reasons therefor, separately and distinctly, if the judgment of the court be against the validity of the part of the constitution or act drawn in question, as aforesaid.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to amend the first resolution by striking out all after the word Resolved, and inserting—

“That provision ought to be made by law that in all suits now pending, or which may hereafter be pending, in the Supreme Court of the United States, where is drawn in question the validity of any treaty or statute of the United States, or where is drawn in question the validity of any statute of a State, or the constitution thereof, or of any authority exercised under any State, on the ground of re-pugnancy to the constitution, treaties, or laws, of the United States,—no judgment shall be pronounced or rendered until a majority of all the justices of said court, legally competent to sit in the cause, shall concur in the opinion either in favor of or against the validity thereof; and, until such concurrence, such suit shall be continued under advisement: Provided, however, That said court should not, by such provision, be prevented from rendering judgment in any such suit, when it should be of opinion that the final adjudication of the merits thereof did not require the decision of such continuance or legal question as aforesaid.”

The Chair decided this amendment to be out of order, as there was another amendment pending.

Mr. FORSYTH, who had offered this amendment, withdrew it, to allow discussion on that presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CLAY spoke in opposition to the amendment, and in defence of the resolution as offered by Mr. LETCHER. He objected to that part of the amendment which prescribes that a majority of the judges, “competent” to decide, shall be required—there being no umpire to decide upon their competency; and if two declined, a majority will be only three judges. He thought that when four judges should be found on one side and three on the other, the united decisions of the State Legislature and State Judiciary, together with the three Supreme Court judges, would outweigh the judgment of the remaining four. He insisted on the equity and policy of requiring five judges to concur when the whole authority of one or of many States was to be set aside. He adduced the case of the bankrupt laws, passed by a majority of all the States, as an illustration of the position. He thought that no danger could arise from such an arrangement to the interest of the General Government. It would soothe the States whose laws were set aside, and conciliate the confidence of all parties concerned.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR met the objection made to the resolution of Mr. LETCHER, that, if it prevailed, a minority might control a majority, by refusing to concur in their decision. This, he said, was no more, but much less, than happened every day in the case of an ordinary jury, where one man's refusal controlled the decision of eleven men.

Mr. WEBSTER spoke in reply, and stated a difference in these two cases, since, in the one, a minority did virtually give a decision, (because the court must decide, one way or the other,) whereas, in the other, the refusal prevented a verdict, and no decision was given on either side. He went into the general principles on which the Supreme Court was erected, by the constitution, as a safeguard to the General Government against the State governments, when disposed to violate the constitution. He maintained that no greater number should be required when a State was a party, than when an individual, claiming under a Supreme Court.

State law, was a party—because the authority of the State was involved in its laws. He stated the improbability that all the seven judges should, in each case, attend; and, if one judge should be involved in the question, five only would be left. If this resolution passed, not even four out of these five, could decide. He referred to the late case of the steamboat monopoly. In that case one judge was absent, and if it had happened, as it might, that another was indisposed, or interested in the question, so as to leave a court of five judges only, four out of the five would not have been competent to pronounce a decision, if the provision of Mr. LETCHER's resolution had been law. It was a fair presumption, that State judges would lean toward the authority of their own State. A mere majority of those judges could decide against the United States, but now, more than a majority was to be required to decide against a State. This was unequal. The very case of the bankrupt laws, quoted by gentlemen, furnished a strong instance. He protested against a greater number being required to decide a cause one way than the other. He passed a eulogy on the Supreme Court as a tribunal. Its whole weight with the community rested on the strength of the reasons it brought for its decisions. He adverted to the encomium pronounced on a great judge in New York, (Chancellor Kent,) and subscribed to it with the most entire assent, and he quoted from an introductory lecture lately delivered by that jurist, a very decided testimony to the distinguished character of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CLAY replied—and while he subscribed to a very high opinion of the Supreme Court, he could not acknowledge that the moment a man was appointed a member of that court, he became exalted above his whole species in intellect and virtue. He spoke of their power practically to make the constitution, by giving, authoritatively, their interpretation of it. He warned the country of the consolidating influence of this power, and maintained the necessity of guarding the State tribunals. The Supreme Court was virtually an umpire between the General Government and the States—its appointment was by one of these two parties, and its bias might be expected to be towards that party on which every member of the tribunal was dependent.

On the subject of the attendance of judges, he had attended sixteen or seventeen terms, and had never witnessed more than two, at the most three, where a full court was not present. In the steamboat case, he asked whether, had four Supreme Court judges decided against three, the opinion of the Supreme Court of New York; of Judge Kent, (than whom there was not more, at the utmost, than one greater jurist on the bench of the Supreme Court,) and of the Court of Errors of that State, added to the opinion of three judges of the Supreme Court, ought not to outweigh the opinions of four Supreme Court judges.

In reference to the argument respecting a jury, he observed, that the want of a verdict, when all did not agree, was not owing to the mere declaration of law, but to the reason of the case, on which the law was founded. He viewed the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts as worse than nothing in the case, and he concluded by expressing an earnest hope that it would not be adopted.

The debate was farther continued by Mr. BUCKNER, who spoke in opposition to the amendment; when, on motion of Mr. METCALFE, the committee rose and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, May 17.

Beaumarchais Claim—Motion to Consider it in the Negotiations between France and the United States.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved the following resolution, which he supported by a short speech:

"Resolved, That the petition of Eugenie Amelie Beaumarchais de la Rue, be referred to the President of the United States; that he be requested to cause the same to be considered in the pending negotiations with the French Government, relating to the claims of American citizens, for property illegally seized and confiscated; and if found to be just, then, and in that case, to be allowed in the final adjustment of the aforesaid claims."

The House refused now to consider this resolution by a small majority.

Supreme Court.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to alter the time of holding the sessions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. METCALFE offered the following amendment to the bill:

"Be it further enacted, That, in any case now or hereafter depending in the Supreme Court, in which shall be drawn into question the validity of any part of the constitution of a State, or of any part of an act passed by the Legislature of a State, unless two-thirds of the whole number of justices composing the said court shall concur in pronouncing such part of the said constitution or act to be invalid, it shall not be held or deemed invalid."

Mr. METCALFE, of Kentucky, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker—It is an indispensable duty, which I owe not only to the Legislature of Kentucky, but particularly to those whom I have the honor immediately to represent, that I should, on the present occasion, exercise one of the privileges properly pertaining to the Representatives of a free people—a privilege which I but seldom claim, but which, I am persuaded, will be liberally and generously accorded to me, provided I do not abuse it, by the enlightened patriotism and magnanimity of the body over whose deliberations you preside.

In looking around me, however, I behold an audience composed, not only of the most distinguished statesmen, but mainly of the brightest luminaries of the law in this Union; and reflecting that this is a question peculiarly suited to the investigation and discussion of lawyers, and that I am not a member of that respectable profession, it would require more hardihood than I possess to shield me entirely from feelings of embarrassment—feelings which, I presume, do not result from any unusual timidity of character; nor am I willing to admit that those feelings proceed from any indisposition on my part to express my sentiments here, or elsewhere, either upon this, or upon any other subject, but more especially upon a subject of such vital importance, and so deeply interesting to those from whom I derive my power, and whose agent I am. But I cannot help perceiving that I am liable to be taken in the net of legal technicality, at least. Besides, I am conscious of the magnitude of this question—of the anxious solicitude with which my countrymen look forward to the decision which may ultimately be had upon it—of the want of time in this body to investigate it fully during the present session, and my own want of preparation, or learning, or capacity, to do it any sort of justice. A knowledge of one truth, however, affords me some consolation. In the eyes of wise and honorable men, even the rude, uncultivated man, in his efforts to do good, in whatever light the strength of those efforts may be viewed, will always find some favor. And in this question, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. M., the interest of the most humble, as well as the most exalted, of our citizens, is deeply, very deeply involved. Indeed, it must be conceded that, in such a question, the most humble are the most interested—it being a maxim, admitted by all, denied by none, that the further you remove power from the people, the further you put their rulers out of their reach, or beyond their control, the greater will be the oppression of the industrious and productive classes of the community, the more abject and miserable will be the condition of the unlearned, the ignorant, and the poor.

I unhesitatingly give it as my opinion that a poor man, for an inconsiderable sum, ought not to be subject to a suit in the Federal court. In matters of contract and dealing between man and man, if no difference is made, or attempted to be made, between resident and non-resident citizens; if no obstacle is thrown, or attempted to be thrown, in the way of the latter, which does not equally apply to the former, either as it respects the process by, or the principle upon, which their respective rights are to be decided, the enactments and adjudications of the States ought to be final—if you please, the supreme law of the land. Cite a poor man, or a man who, in point of wealth, is not above mediocrity, especially if he is not very dextrous and crafty in the management of lawsuits, to appear himself, or by counsel, hundreds and thousands of miles from home, for the purpose of trying his title to the little all he possesses, and he has but little prospect of success; besides, it is not very material whether he gains or loses his cause—the process by which he arrives at a decision, robs him of all he is worth, and leaves him in penny, want, and misery. Such laws are not only exceedingly vexatious, but a departure from the benign and salutary principle of administering justice as near to every man's door as practicable. And is it not doubly vexatious, unequal and partial in its operation, to allow a non-resident to institute his suit in the State courts, thereby apparently waiving his right to use the Federal courts; and, after harassing the resident for many years, and subjecting him to much cost and trouble, before the former tribunals, then to allow the said non-resident, by appeal, writ of error, or some other process, to revive the suit which he had lost before the tribunals of his own selection in the Federal courts? Do you call this justice, or sound policy?

A distinguished poet has said: "He that thinks must govern him that toils." A doctrine which I shall not attempt to controvert. But, said Mr. M., if the thinking few who rule are not to be responsible to the toiling million, for their conduct, it requires no great share of penetration, or of experience, to satisfy the mind that the latter will, sooner or later, become the slaves of the former, and all the labor of their hands, over and above what their absolute necessities require, will go to enrich and pamper their thinking masters.

If, said Mr. M., I may be permitted to use the appropriate, elegant, and I will venture to say, among philanthropists and lovers of human equality, the never-to-be-forgotten figure of the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) I will say, that, if you divide society horizontally, placing the thinking few, who rule, above, and the toiling million below, the prediction which I have just now uttered will soon come to pass. In behalf of that toiling million who are now struggling and groaning beneath the weight of that horizontal partition—an intolerable load—allow one of themselves, who never expects or desires to be placed upon the upper side of it, for a short time, the kind indulgence of the House.

We have the happiness, it is true, to live under a Government, the model of which is not to be found; and it is in vain to search for its likeness, either in ancient or modern history—a Government which may be considered as the offspring of a union of many Governments, and, in its turn, the prolific parent of many more, all of which are united and uniting in one, with continual increase of numbers—a splendid system, in which the divisions of power are vastly numerous, but extremely complicated, requiring the keenest intellectual perception, the most discriminating powers of mind, with much learning, experience, and soundness of judgment, to enable us to assign to the different Governments, and their various departments, their due portions respectively, and proper limitations of power.

If any one of these departments, or of the different functionaries, shall attempt by virtue of the soft and easy process of construction, to gain an accession of power, not fairly delegated or authorized by the constitution; and thereby to prevent a co-ordinate, or any other branch of the Government, from exercising the power and discharging the duty which properly pertains thereunto, it certainly becomes us to impose some restraint upon the usurping department.

If, in reality, there exists a disposition on the part of this court to encroach upon the authorities of the United States, as is believed to be the case by many of the most patriotic and wise republican statesmen in the Union, will not the proposition which is now under consideration, if adopted, have a tendency to check that disposition, or to render the effects of it less frequent and common than under the present arrangement? That it will have such a tendency, must be admitted. But, on the other hand, if the fears and apprehensions of those who look upon the court with an eye of jealousy, are unfounded and unreasonable, the tendency of this amendment will be to remove that jealousy, to reconcile discordant departments, and to give more satisfaction and peace to society.

Of late, we have the mortification very frequently to hear of conflicting claims of power, between the Federal and State governments, between the various departments of the several governments, and more especially between the Federal judiciary and the States.

How are we to check the growing evil? Will the proposition which is now under consideration do it? For my own part, said Mr. M., I answer with trembling uncertainty—for it is not exactly the plan which, above all others, I would prefer—in the affirmative. It would most certainly diminish the chances, and lessen the probability of encroachment. In cases wherein the validity of State laws are brought into question, and laws, too, which have received the sanction of the State courts, so large a majority of this body of magistracy will seldom if ever concur in giving an opinion against such enactments and decisions, unless they are clearly and manifestly unconstitutional; a thing which it is believed will but seldom occur; and when it does, the opinion of the court will be so well supported by argument so strong and conclusive as to carry conviction wherever it goes—and thus, by reconciling all parties, the court will regain its popularity and high standing among the citizens of this republic—the Federal and State governments, and their different departments, will then move on harmoniously, while the people are contented, prosperous, and happy.

If the eye of the patriot is turned to the present condition of things in this country, what a singular and disheartening spectacle does he behold! By some, it is insisted that the Federal Government is aiming at consolidation. By others, and myself among the number, it is believed that the Federal Judiciary is aiming, by virtue of the spherical sovereignty which it claims for itself, at the supreme control of the State governments; and assuming to itself political, as well as judicial power.

On the other hand, it is insisted that the State governments are in the habit of reeling from their proper orbits, of impinging upon the Federal authorities, and thereby creating great confusion and disorder. And it is probably true that none of those governments, and that no one of the different departments, do in every instance confine themselves as strictly as they ought to do, within their respective constitutional limits; and, at other times, by failing or refusing to fill up the whole space allotted to them, as much injury is produced as by transcending their respective limits. Indeed, I presume this is true. But whenever a conflict occurs between the Federal and State authorities, whether in the right or wrong, the former is sure to prevail against the latter—hence, the necessity and propriety of restraining this strong power, and of guarding the weak against its usurpations and encroachments; and, at the same time, it would be wholly useless to impose any additional restraint upon the State authorities, because of their comparative feebleness, their want of strength to resist the Federal authorities. It is notorious that they cannot long make defensive, much less can they make offensive war.

But, how to remedy those evils, and at the same time to guard and protect the people against the hurtful and pernicious consequences of these alarming conflicts, is the question. To effect this desirable object, said Mr. M., is what the proposition contemplates. Can there be any danger in making the experiment? I put this question most respectfully, and with due deference; but I put it emphatically—Can there be any danger in making the experiment?

There are other difficulties, too, resulting more, I believe, from the happy, or rather the unhappy, faculty we have in construing or misconstruing the constitution, than from any real defect in that instrument. Look at the various and contradictory constructions which have been put upon it, not only by subordinate departments, but by the highest functionaries of this Government; and from thence let any man, if it be possible for him to do so, move on to the conclusion that it is either wise or politic to compel all the departments of the State governments, legislative, executive, and judicial, all of whom are sworn to support the Federal Constitution, as well as their honors, to yield their own opinions upon the constitutional validity of State laws, and to bow submissively to the constructive dictum of three members, a minority of the Federal Judiciary.

But the Legislature of Kentucky did pass a law, the validity of which was contested by the nest of worthies with which that State abounds, and has long abounded, and who are known by the mild name of land speculators. The Federal, not the Delphic oracle is consulted, and the response is, that "the law is unconstitutional and void, the first settlers of that district having bartered away a portion of that power and sovereignty which belongs to, and is exercised by, every other State in this Union, and by every other people or Government on the globe, having bartered away the right of succeeding generations, and succeeding legislators, throughout all time to come, to suit their legislation and their laws to the ever-varying condition of things, which necessarily arises in the progress of civil society." Such, in substance, is the response which has been uttered and proclaimed to the world; and even more than this, for it goes to establish the fact, that the said first settlers of the district not only banished from Kentucky that portion of her sovereignty, but that they absolutely extinguished it; that they did not even leave it with Virginia, which State, I verily believe, if she had the power, would grant us relief in some form or other.

But, what is the consequence of this decision? The cords of peace and social intercourse, by which society is bound together like a band of brothers, is cut asunder; the home of the husbandman is again rendered insecure; the hand of industry is paralyzed, and discouraged from the performance of its duty, the oracular music of this trio of the Federal judiciary having fallen sweetly upon the ears of a set of men, who ought to have been drummed out of Kentucky many years ago, with a certain appropriate march at their heels, announcing to them that the delectable and happyfying business of land-jobbing would again become profitable, up they spring, like so many birds of prey; with keenly whetted beaks, they pluck the crumbs from the hand of honest industry; and they pluck anew at the vitals of society, the very heart-strings of which they would pull away if they could. Now, as the response runs, "the bleeding victim may writhe in agony, but there is no power beneath the sun, by which a remedy can be applied. It is true, that society is greatly retarded in its march to prosperity and happiness, but the die is cast, and, like the decree of fate, it is unalterable!"

Such are the effects of a decision which has been given by this, not soon to be forgotten—three; to whom your laws seem to attach something like infallibility, but who could not, by possibility, in their situations, have understood the subject.

Now, what opinion would a stranger form of the boasted excellence of our constitution, after being told of the decisions of the Executive and Judicial branches of this Government upon it, and of the consequences resulting from those decisions? The one denies the existence of any power in Congress, or elsewhere, to pass a good and wholesome law, the effect of which would be, in a thousand ways, to promote the national interest, and to bind together, and forever to perpetuate this grand and noble Confederacy; the other denies the existence of any power in the Legislature of a State, to remove one of the most afflicting evils—an evil of such magnitude that it is an abomination to the land where it exists—from society.

I understand this decision of the court to mean nothing more, or less, than that their honors have a right to take the consciences of all the departments of the State governments under their sovereign care and protection. I understand it to be a denial of the right of the Representatives of the people, by statutory provisions, to regulate the affairs of the people. If the doctrine maintained by the court be correct, their own peculiar notions of what is equitable between man and man, between adverse claimants of land, and so on, as the different individual cases may arise and be submitted these august three, is to be the supreme law of the land. Have we come to this? Is it true that our ancestors or predecessors have deprived us of the power of passing a plain law, which may be read by the plain, unsophisticated farmers of our country, as they run; and a law which, by reading, they may understand? Are we to have no page in our statute books, indicating to the toiling husbandman what are his rights, or in what way the fruits of his labor and industry are secured to him? Instead of referring him to the statute books for such information as he may desire respecting the laws, is it intended to turn his eyes upon the judges of the Supreme Court, and tell him that the law is, or will be, whatever their honors may choose to make it?

But, sir, said Mr. M., the fault is not in the constitution. It is in those who construe and misconstrue that instrument.

In referring to these facts, said Mr. M., I intend no ungenerous imputation against those high functionaries of the Government—no disrespect whatever; for they have the same right to their opinion that I have to mine; and it is as much their duty to exercise it. But, having given an opinion which I conceive to be most glaringly erroneous, and most afflictively injurious and hurtful to those whom I have the honor immediately to represent, my object is, as it ought to be, to effect an amendment to the law, which will go to save my countrymen in future from the effects of a decision to be given by this feeble, and yet powerful three. And my reference to the opinion of the President has been made for the purpose of showing that you do not, by placing a man in an elevated station, render him infallible; and thereby, to prove the unsoundness of the policy that would bestow upon such a tribunal as this, the power of dictating according to their peculiar notions of what is the orthodox construction of this charter of our rights, to each, and to all of the departments of the State governments. Three individuals! a majority of the court, as now organized, truly; but a minority of the whole court are to decide upon the constitutional validity of State laws; and to annul adjudications of the State courts; and from their decision there is no appeal; it is irrevocable.

Day of Adjournment.

Before, said Mr. M., I consent to the lodgment of such a power, in the hands of such a tribunal, I must be convinced that the whole three are beings of a superior order; that they are not the slaves of human passion; that they do not love power; that they are not to be set in motion by that powerful spring of human action, called self-interest; that they have an exemption from all the frailties of human nature; and, in fine, that the link which they form in the chain of created beings, is at least half way between that little forked, feeble animal, that inhabits this our planet, and those superior intelligences that fill the celestial regions. For be it remembered, that this is the controlling power of this Government—a power of such superior dignity, that it has become the Government itself; and he that questions, or attempts to expose its decisions, is sure to be accused of having a devil, or to be denounced as a rebel against his country.

Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, rose and opposed the amendment, as practically operating to leave the constitutionality of any State law interminably uncertain. He vindicated the decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of Cohens, (formerly referred to in the debate on Mr. LECHE's resolutions,) and maintained that that decision was virtually a decision of the question whether the United States have or have not a Government.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, said, the Constitution of the United States secures to the citizens of each State the rights of citizens of the several States. The citizens of one State may hold property in any other State. They may contract with the citizens of any other State, and are entitled to a just remedy to enforce such contracts. Might it not happen that non-residents might acquire large claims against the citizens of any given State? Such, for example, as was the case a few years ago in relation to Eastern merchants with the people of the West. Such, indeed, as was the case with the people of the State whence this proposition originated, and the merchants east of the mountains. In such a case, if the debtor State should adopt unconstitutional measures for the relief of its citizens, would not the principle requiring the concurrence of a large portion of the Judges of the Supreme Court to correct such a procedure, more expose the creditors to the injury, than the usual mode of decision would the debtors? Such a principle, indeed, he conceived well calculated to alter the whole theory of our Government.

The object of Government was as well to protect minorities as majorities. This principle would go far to destroy those rights.

But the particular case, which might by possibility occur for the decision of this tribunal, was one of grave and serious importance. He said the United States had admitted the State he had the honor to represent into the Union, under a compact that slavery shall not exist within its limits. At present, a large portion of the citizens of that State were under the impression that the introduction of slavery would tend greatly to relieve their pecuniary embarrassments, embarrassments which, indeed, afflicted every portion of the West. Acting under the influence of a strong anxiety to relieve themselves from their distress, many of them were now disposed to test the binding character of this compact, and to abrogate it. Without intending to express any opinion on the effect of this compact, he would remark that, should a majority of the people decide on the adoption of the measure, it would doubtless make a case for the decision of the Supreme Court; and, should it happen, it will be a fearful question. It will involve nothing less, sir, than the balance of power between the slave and non-slave-holding States. Those who witnessed, as well as those who know of, the convulsive discussion in this House on the Missouri question, cannot fail to appreciate the magnitude of this subject. In deciding that question, should it ever arise, if a majority of that court shall be found to decide against the validity of the act of the State, but not a sufficient majority under the provision now under consideration, it could not fail to shake the nation to its centre.

While this tribunal may be called on to decide questions of such momentous magnitude, he thought it behooved the House to examine well the effects of the principle now proposed. For such examination, we certainly are not prepared at this time, and the amendment, therefore, should not now be adopted.

Mr. A. STEVENSON, of Virginia, suggested that, as the session was far advanced, and this subject was of great moment, it would be most expedient to withdraw the amendment at this time.

Mr. METCALFE expressed some reluctance at adopting this course, but finally consented to withdraw the amendment; and, having done so—
The bill was ordered to a third reading.

TUESDAY, May 18.

Day of Adjournment.

Mr. CONNER, of New York, moved to consider the joint resolution on a day of adjournment, and called for the yeas and nays on the question of consideration; which were ordered.

Mr. OULPEPEE, of North Carolina, was opposed to an adjournment at so early a day as even the latest which was proposed. He adverted to the appointment of a committee of investigation on charges preferred against a high officer of the Government, and to the summons which had been despatched by an officer of the House for the person who preferred those charges. The House had been heretofore informed that, allowing time for going and returning, the individual in question might be expected to arrive here by the 26th of this month. For his part, he said, he was unwilling to go away without allowing a reasonable time for the return of the messenger, &c. The charges which had been preferred, had been considered of sufficient importance to entitle them to investigation, and he was not disposed to adjourn until that investigation was completed, and the whole facts of the case reported to the House, when, he said, he would express his opinion of the merits of it, regardless of consequences, and he hoped the House would do the same.

Mr. WAEFIELD, of Maryland, said, that every one knew that the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House had gone for the purpose of bringing to this House Mr. Edwards, to be examined respecting certain charges which he had preferred against one of the highest officers of the Government. Whether, in sending for him, the committee of this House had done right or wrong, was not now the question; but, having done it, he was of opinion that a due respect to the parties interested, to public opinion, and to consistency in the course of this body, would induce the House, at all events, to continue the session until the person to whom he referred should have had a reasonable opportunity of reaching the Seat of Government. Otherwise, said he, in what situation before the public shall we present ourselves? He was as willing as any gentleman to bring this session to a close; but, a due respect to the distinguished officer whose conduct is arraigned, and to every consideration connected with the subject, forbade, in his opinion, an adjournment earlier than the 31st instant; which day, therefore, he proposed.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, put it to the House, whether, under the circumstances known to them, they would remain in session to await the arrival of the officer of this House. He had just been informed that the Sergeant-at-Arms arrived at Louisville, so as to leave that place for Edwardsville on the 4th of this month; by the 10th of the month he may have reached Edwardsville; by the 17th he may have arrived at Louisville, on his return: it will take 8 or 10 days to get thence to Wheeling, and three or four days thence to this place, supposing no interruption of the journey to occur: and when it is recollected that there was no regular chain of steamboat navigation, and that travellers have sometimes to wait several days for a passage, could it be in the contemplation of any gentleman to wait here until the messenger returns—say, till the 15th, or even the 10th of June. He wished the resolution were made blank, so as to fill it with such a day as a majority of the House should be found to approve.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, said that, when this subject was before the House the other day, the member from Illinois stated, from his knowledge of the distance, &c., that an answer to the summons of this House might be expected by the 23d or 24th of this month. From the facts which had since come to the knowledge of the gentleman, Mr. W. said, he should like to know what was his present opinion on that subject.

Mr. COOK said that, when he made a statement on this subject some days ago, it was impossible that he should be apprised of the obstructions to the progress of the messenger of the House. He had stated that he might return by the 23d or 24th of the month, but that was upon the supposition that no difficulty had occurred in his progress in the river. Since making that statement, he had seen a letter from the Sergeant-at-Arms, that he was not able to leave Louisville before 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the 4th of May. He might reach Edwardsville in five or six days. If an opportunity should present itself for resuming his journey by water, he might return to Louisville in five days, say by the 15th of this month. It was not probable that he could reach this place in less than fifteen days after his arrival at Louisville. It would not be reasonable, therefore, to calculate on the arrival of the messenger or Mr. Edwards sooner than the 30th of the month, under any circumstances. And if the House is disposed to wait for him, said Mr. C., as I sincerely hope it is, that object will be entirely defeated by fixing on an earlier day for the adjournment than the last of this month. Mr. C. repeated, that he most sincerely hoped that the House would continue in session until Mr. Edwards should arrive.

Mr. MCLANE, of Delaware, said, that there was no member of the House who would remain here, were the session prolonged, at greater personal inconvenience, or sacrifice of interest or of feeling, than himself. But it was too late now for gentlemen to listen to considerations of that description. The decision has been taken. Every gentleman must have known, when this investigation was instituted, that it would be attended with serious inconveniences. I was myself fully aware of it, said he, and it was for that reason, among others of higher import, that I was opposed to the institution of this committee of investigation. The House, however, determined to go on, and it does appear to me to be due to the parties and to the character of the House, that it shall now be carried through, and that every opportunity shall be given, to all the parties concerned, for a full investigation. Laying aside all personal considerations, the public good demanded this course. From what had been said by the honorable member from Illinois, it was apparent that an earlier day for the arrival of Mr. Edwards, than the last day of the month, could not be fixed. But the reasons which influenced him, Mr. McL. said, would prevent him from voting, at this time, to fix any day of adjournment. The Committee of Investigation had sent for the individual who preferred the charges which are under investigation. If I understand the process with which our officer is charged, said he, it does not authorize the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring this individual here. It is a mere summons to him to attend, which he may obey, or not. He probably may not be ready—few individuals would be ready, at so short a notice, to set off on so long a journey, the day he receives the summons. In any event, he cannot get here before the thirty-first of the month, and perhaps not for some days later. And for what purpose, sir, have we sent for him? Is it to present himself here, and say, "Here I am," and thus let the business end? That is certainly not my view of the case. Here is a charge which the House has deemed of sufficient importance to institute an inquiry in relation to it. They have sent for Mr. Edwards, to deliver what testimony he may be able to afford in relation to it.

Day of Adjournment.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, entirely concurred in most of the views of the gentleman from Delaware, but he differed from him as to his conclusion. From the information which had been given to the House, by the gentleman from Illinois, it was perfectly evident, and must strike the mind of everybody, that Mr. Edwards cannot be expected to arrive here before the fourth or fifth of June. If the House waited for his arrival at all, consistency and a sense of duty would require them to remain in session until he was examined, that the information which he possesses may be eviscerated and laid before the House. On a moderate calculation, this will take to the 10th of June; and said Mr. B., I ask whether we will delay our adjournment till that day on this account, or whether we shall not rather adjourn at an otherwise convenient season? If I thought, that, to await the arrival of Mr. Edwards, was of any importance to the country, or to the distinguished officer whose conduct is implicated by the charges, I would remain here at any sacrifice. But I am not of that opinion. When Mr. Edwards presented his charges to this House, he referred for the foundation and support of them to documentary testimony, and to that alone. That testimony, with the charges, is in the possession of as able and impartial a committee as was ever raised in any public body. I am persuaded that the committee is, or can be in one or two days, ready to report upon that testimony. Now, I ask, how can the Secretary of the Treasury be implicated by an adjournment, without waiting for Mr. Edwards? The proofs are here; the committee is diligently engaged in the examination of them, and are ready (or can be in a short time) to make their report; and I protest against the idea of the House having committed itself, or pledged itself in any way, to wait for Mr. Edwards.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, said he was as little disposed as his friend from Delaware to adopt a course calculated to preclude any decision on this subject, that was due to the character of the House, or properly subservient to the ends of justice. But, believing that the views which he had taken of this subject were erroneous, he could not but believe, if the House came to the decision which he recommended, it would not subserve the purpose of justice, but only vexatiously prolong the session. He begged leave to call the attention of the House more directly to the subject involved in this question. What is it? said he. An officer who has received an appointment within the gift of the Executive of this country, has made a charge against an officer in the Cabinet of the Executive. Instead of directing this charge to his proper chief, the Executive, the accusing party has improperly, and I regret it, thrown it into this House. Under the excitement of the moment, which I also regret, this charge took what I conceive an improper direction in this House. It has been put into the possession of a committee, acknowledged on all hands to be exceedingly well qualified to investigate it. But, in reference to the course which the House ought now to take, Mr. H. said, it is very proper that the grounds of the accuser himself should be taken into consideration. In support of his charges, to what does he refer us? To his own testimony hereafter to be delivered? To oral proof of any description whatsoever? To any evidence beyond the walls of the Capitol? No; but to documents already in the possession of the House. Under a belief that this individual may have done wrong to the character of the officer to whom his charges relate, a messenger has been despatched by this House to summon him here. That was supererogatory, for the Executive had anticipated this act of the House, and, with great propriety, because that is the branch of the Government to which he is at present amenable, transmitted to him instructions to await the proceedings of this House. His presence here, however, Mr. H. said, was not in the slightest degree material to the decision of the case before the House. Now, if the individual preferring these accusations could have any just ground of complaint against the House for not awaiting his arrival, he admitted it would be proper that they should do so. But could he, under all the circumstances, have any cause of complaint on that score? Mr. H. conceived not.

Mr. MEROER, of Virginia, said, if he was unwilling to fix the time of adjournment at present, it was not from regard to the accuser, whose charges had, from the choice of the individual himself, been made from a point distant from the Capitol, when he might have made them here, had he supposed it due to himself to be present at their investigation. Certainly, after delaying the mission to Mexico for eighteen months, the Executive would have had no difficulty in granting the Minister five or six days more for that purpose. With regard to the interests of the accused, and of the country, one thing it was highly important to know, viz: whether the testimony of this individual was considered by the Committee of Investigation to be material or not. This House had no agency in sending for him. The warrant was issued antecedent to any proceeding on the part of this House upon the subject. We are to infer, from the fact that the committee sent for him, that Mr. Edwards is deemed a material witness. The committee had no right to send for him unless his testimony was considered important. We have, therefore, a right to suppose that his testimony is material, because otherwise he would not have been sent for. If his testimony is material, and we adjourn before his arrival, the public opinion will be, that we have arrested the investigation of his charges. If that be the only question to be decided, my mind, said Mr. M., is made up.

Mr. MANGUM, of North Carolina, said he was as anxious as any member of the House could be, to leave this wretched place, and return home, if, contrary to his opinion of the matter, a sense of duty would allow of an adjournment as early as was proposed. It had been said that the act of calling for Mr. Edwards was not the act of this House, and, further, that the presence of the accuser is not necessary—and that he himself has shown that it is not. But, said Mr. M., we have committed the investigation of this matter to a committee composed of gentlemen esteemed on all sides of the House for their superior intelligence and unquestionable integrity. That committee, in its wisdom, has decided, and, I believe, with perfect unanimity, that Mr. Edwards should be brought before them. It is to be presumed there are some matters of fact which he is expected to disclose, which make his presence necessary; and, until I hear to the contrary from that committee, I shall oppose my humble opinion and voice against an adjournment before Mr. Edwards's arrival. And this view of the case appeals most strongly, not to the friends of the distinguished person who stands accused before us, and in so delicate a relation to this House and to the nation, but to the friends of Mr. Edwards. What will be the consequence if, after the solemn decision of our committee, that it is necessary Mr. Edwards should be brought before this House, we should say his presence is entirely unnecessary, and that a reference to documentary testimony only is necessary? If such be the fact, why is it not announced to the House from the proper source, the committee which sent for him? It is not announced, and I, therefore, presume that the opinion still exists that Mr. Edwards ought to be here. And, whilst this is the fact, we shall treat the just claims of this high officer (the Secretary of the Treasury) with worse than scorn and contumely, if, after having sent for his accuser, we adjourn before he comes, and deprive the accused of the opportunity of a full and fair investigation of these charges. On the other hand, what have you done? Have you not, to a certain extent, endorsed these charges? That which never could have stuck to the character of the Secretary, have you not fixed there, by a solemn act, in recognizing the claim of these charges to investigation? And will you abandon the investigation, and, as far as you can, suffer the obloquy to remain?

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, of Virginia, then rose, and said, that he should vote for adjourning on the 31st of the present month. He considered the House bound to allow a reasonable time for the arrival of the person whose attendance it had required. Public opinion, with what justice he should not say, would set down every individual of this House, on one side or the other, in this affair, and would attribute every part of their conduct to partiality and design. It was the duty of the House, as much as possible, to avoid giving occasion for such reflections. It had been objected that the sending for Mr. Edwards was only the act of a committee. True: but that committee received its authority to send for him, from this House; they have reported their proceedings, in sending for him to this House, and this House has transmitted those proceedings to the President of the United States; and thereby given to the act of sending for him every sanction which the circumstances would admit. The accuser had made a variety of statements in relation to the officer accused; it was proper that he should be put upon his oath, and cross-examined. On the whole, considering the public interest, the dignity of this House, and the character and public station of both the individuals concerned, he could not consent to vote for an earlier day than the 31st instant.

Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, said, he entirely concurred in the opinion that, granting all sufficient time for the arrival and examination of Mr. Edwards, the House might be able to adjourn by the 7th day of June, and he proposed that day accordingly. It was due to the character of this House that it should remain here till that time, even at great expense, and great personal sacrifice. He adverted to the necessity of acting on this case with precision and on mature reflection, that improper conclusions may not be drawn, as to the motives which govern the House in its course, by the people of the United States. This memorial of Mr. Edwards, said Mr. F., bears date the 6th of April, and, by due course of the mail, should have arrived here on the 10th day of that month. The first information which the House had of the existence of this packet, was on the 19th of April; and, by a singular coincidence, that was the very day when the Senate fixed upon a day for the adjournment of the two Houses. The House of Representatives, with a feeling which a sense of justice was calculated to inspire, instituted a committee to investigate the subject, and clothed it with power to send for persons and papers. On the 21st, a resolution was submitted by me, which was not agreed to, to communicate the fact to the Executive. On another day, a nearly similar resolution was offered by another gentleman. On the 22d, the committee reported a part of their proceedings, and advised this House that they had ordered the messenger of the House to pursue Mr. Edwards, for the purpose of calling him before them. This messenger left the city of Washington on the 24th. To make the greater speed, he passed by Baltimore, under the absurd pretext that he was liable to be interrupted in his journey by the usage of the stage office giving preference to other passengers, as if it were possible for any stage-coach usage to arrest the messenger of this House. He went down the river from Wheeling, and arrived at Louisville on the 3d; and we are now informed that it is impossible he can arrive here before the 4th of next month. In what situation, sir, shall we be placed if this investigation be suspended; if the House adjourns without waiting for this individual? What was the object of the address in which the charges have been preferred? To defend the reputation of the late Senator from Illinois? To defend himself? How? By accusation of another? It is not worth while to mince matters in a case of this kind. It is impossible for any individual—

Mr. TREMBLE, of Kentucky, here rose, with permission of Mr. FOSYTH, to explain, that the messenger of the House, in going by Baltimore, had acted by the advice of others who knew, by experience, that it was the surest route, with a view to expedition.

Mr. FOSYTH disclaimed any intention to blame the messenger, having no doubt he had acted upon advice and information of others—there certainly was a day lost by his taking that route. Mr. F. resumed his argument. It is impossible, said he, for any member of the House to read this address, to believe that the object of the person making the charges was to punish the individual charged, through the agency of the powers of this House. My own impressions are, that the individual expected that his address would be printed, under the sanction of this House, and that no further notice would be taken of it; and that it would be the foundation for assailing the reputation of the individual whom he accuses, through the ensuing summer—for what purpose, everybody can understand. This object has been disappointed, by the investigation which the House had ordered. In justice to the individual whose conduct is assailed—I speak not of him as an officer; not of the purity of his character, and the integrity of his conduct, which I believe to be, in truth, his only reproach—but of his pretensions to the first office in the gift of the people—this investigation should be fully prosecuted, unless this House means to make itself a party in the projects of the individual who has addressed it. A portion of the charges contained in his address have been rung through the country these twelve months past, or more, without effect. A part of them have been investigated in this Hall, to the utter confusion of the assailants of the Secretary. What is the object of the address which now embodies them? Unquestionably, to give to them an artificial importance, to put a stamp of credit on what had been already condemned by the people. And by whom is this investigation carried on? I mean to excite no unpleasant feeling in the mind of any gentleman in this Hall; but it is proper, in coming to the determination which we are to make on the question now before us, that all things should be considered, which bear upon it. It is known that there were, at the commencement of this session, five individuals presented to this House as candidates for their favor and that of the people, for the Presidential office. It is known that a majority of this House is favorable to the claims of the four other candidates in opposition to the claims of the remaining one. It is by this House, thus disposed, that this investigation has been instituted. What will be the inference, if these charges are left in suspense, by the adjournment of this House? I ask gentlemen to consider, what will be the effect of such a course? I am sure, sir, that there is no member of this House who is desirous to do injustice to the individual in question; but I put it to every member of this House, whether he does not at least leave a “loop to hang a doubt upon,” if he agrees by his vote to an adjournment before Mr. Edwards arrives. All that is wanted is, that the individual sent for should be brought here, and questioned—“What have you more to say? What are these defensive accusations which you talk about as having in reserve?” A single hour, after his arrival, will suffice for his answers to these simple interrogatories. It is due to the nature of the subject, that we should wait for the arrival of Mr. Edwards. As it is stated, that there is reason to believe he may be here by the 30th of the month, and seven days will be sufficient for every possible allowance of time for his examination, and a report by the committee, and decision by the House upon it, I am in favor of fixing on the 7th June as the day of adjournment.

Mr. COOK said, it must be painful, it could not but be painful, to a dignified and enlightened body, whose duty it was most solemnly to decide upon the merits of the matter before the committee of investigation, to see, upon an incidental discussion of this description, the motives of individuals misrepresented, and erroneous statements made, either from improper views, or because the facts were not correctly understood. The honorable gentleman from Georgia, said he, has stated his belief as to the motive of the individual who lately transmitted an address to this House, which he has ascribed to motives, at which, if true, every honorable mind ought to revolt. He stated, that the memorial was presented, not with the hope of bringing on an investigation, but to have it printed without being investigated. If I have misunderstood the gentleman, he will correct me—[Mr. FOSYTH said, the gentleman understands me correctly.] I am not now, nor at any other time, if I can avoid it, about to give any opinion as to the merits of this controversy—but let the language of the memorial speak for itself. In the 18th page of it, the memorialist states that, under calls for information respecting the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States, information called for by the House had been withheld, and says, in making the statement, "I challenge investigation." And, at the conclusion of his memorial, he says, that, if his charges are made in malice or in falsehood, it is a misdemeanor that would prove him unworthy of the office he holds, and expressly invites the Secretary, or his friends, to make the charge against him. Language like this, said Mr. C., is in direct repugnance to the idea that he wishes to shrink from an investigation of his charges, and that he merely wished to afford food for the newspapers during the recess of Congress. Whether it be true or not, I ask whether it is proper for a member of this House, who is to pass upon this case before God and man, to express so decided an opinion, which would go to stamp infamy upon one of the parties in this controversy. I ask whether this is consistent with the dignified attitude which we ought to occupy. The honorable gentleman had better wait for his opinions until the report from the committee be made, for that committee, able and honest as he believed them to be, would present nothing but the truth in their report. Then is the time to express such an opinion, if the facts shall warrant it; and, sorely as I shall regret it, on account of the particular relation in which I stand to that individual, let the power of truth be brought upon him—if it be sufficient to crush him, if due to justice, and the character of the country, let it be so. I will not undertake to express an opinion, as to the merits of the Secretary—I will wait until the facts shall come in solemn form before us—in that form which shall justify us in expressing an opinion thereupon, before this House and the nation. If malice be proved, let the seal of reprobation be stamped upon the author of the address. Sincerely as I should lament it, my duty to myself and to my country would oblige me to express the truth upon the evidence before us.

Mr. FOSYTH said, the gentleman from Illinois was not well acquainted with the address, or he would not have put upon it the construction which he had: for the author of it expressly says, after making various charges against the Secretary of the Treasury, "I do not ask for an investigation of his conduct;" and yet, with this staring us in the face, the gentleman tells us that the object of the address was an investigation! Whether the opinion I have formed of the motives of the addresser be just or not, is for the House and the country to judge. It has been formed from a fair and simple view of the facts. The conclusion appears to my mind, and must be to every prejudiced mind, irresistible. Whether I am disqualified by this opinion, forced upon me by facts universally known, from passing upon this case, it is not for the gentleman from Illinois to undertake to determine.

The question was then taken on fixing on the 7th day of June, and decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the first day of June, and decided in the negative, 95 to 75.

The resolution was then made blank.

Mr. SAUNDERS, of North Carolina, declared that he had voted for the latest day, and for the 1st June; but as the House appeared to be determined not to allow time for Mr. Edwards to arrive, he should now vote for the earliest day proposed.

After a few observations from Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, who proposed and advocated an adjournment on the 22d, and from Mr. ROSE, in favor of the 27th instant, the question was taken on filling the blank with that day, and agreed to, 101 votes to 73.

Thus amended, the resolution was passed, and returned to the Senate, who agreed to the amendment.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 19.

Piracy in the West Indies.

Mr. POINSETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to "piracies, by which our commerce in the neighborhood of the island of Cuba has been afflicted," and to the "depredations which have been committed on the lawful commerce of the United States, under other pretences, and other color, in the neighboring island of Porto Rico," made a report thereon; which was read, and laid upon the table. The report is as follows:

That the prompt and energetic measures adopted by Congress, at the commencement of their last session, seconded by the zeal and enterprise of the officers intrusted with the command of the light squadron destined to suppress piracy in the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico, have succeeded in putting a stop to the piracies by which our commerce had been afflicted in the neighborhood of the island of Cuba, as far as a foreign force, unaided by the public authorities of the island, could succeed in accomplishing this object.

These piracies had been continued for years, under the immediate observation of the Government of the island of Cuba, which, as well as the Spanish Government, has been repeatedly and ineffectually required to suppress them. Many of them have been committed by boats, which remained concealed in the harbors and under the headland, until they discovered their prey, which they captured, plundered, and destroyed upon the shores of the island. When pursued by a superior force, the pirates have escaped to the shore; and our commanders have been refused permission to land in pursuit of them, even on the desert and uninhabited parts of the island.

It appears, from the most respectable testimony, that these atrocious robberies were committed by persons well known in Havana and in Regla, where they were organized into a band; and that the traffic in their plunder was carried on openly; and that they were sometimes committed by vessels equipped at Havana and at Regla; and that they cautiously avoided molesting Spanish vessels, but attacked, without discrimination, the defenceless vessels of all other nations.

The present Captain General of the island of Cuba has acted with great courtesy towards our commander and officers engaged on this service, and has co-operated with them, by arresting the pirates who had escaped to the shore, nor has he complained when our officers have found it necessary to pursue them, and to break up their haunts on the desert and unfrequented keys that surround the island. In no case, however, within our knowledge, where pirates have been seized by the authorities of the island, have they been brought to that punishment their crimes merited; and those who are well known to have fitted out piratical cruisers, and to have sold their plunder with the utmost notoriety, are suffered to remain in Havana and Regla, in the unmolested enjoyment of the fruits of their crimes. Under these circumstances, the British and American squadrons in those seas may repress piracy, so long as they continue cruising in the neighborhood of the island; but there is reason to apprehend, that, on their removal, similar outrages on our commerce will be renewed. In the opinion of your committee, piracy can only be effectually suppressed by the Government of Spain, and by the authorities of the island taking the necessary measures to prevent piratical vessels or boats from being equipped or sailing from any part of the island, and to apprehend and punish every description of outlaws, as well those who actually commit acts of piracy, as those who receive and traffic in goods plundered on the high seas.

The commerce of the United States with the island of Cuba, superior to that with Spain and all its other dependencies, and fully equal to that with France, claims in a peculiar manner the protection of Government. The safety of that commerce requires that the Government of Spain should be urged to adopt prompt and vigorous measures, effectually to suppress piracy in the neighborhood of the island, and to co-operate with the maritime powers most interested in effecting this object; and your committee are of opinion, that, for the protection of this important commerce, and of the persons and property of our fellow-citizens, when in the ports of the island, the residence of consuls, or authorized commercial agents of the United States, at these places, is absolutely necessary, and ought to be insisted upon.

Privateers, distinguished from pirates only by commissions of most equivocal character, from Spanish officers whose authority to issue them has never been shown, have been equipped in the island of Porto Rico, and have committed outrages and depredations upon the persons and property of the citizens of the United States; outrages, which no commission could divest of their piratical character. With no other naval force than a frigate, a brig, and a schooner, they presumed to declare a blockade of more than twelve hundred miles of coast. To this violation of all the rights of neutrality, they added the absurd pretension of interdicting the peaceable commerce of other nations with all the ports of the Spanish Main, upon the pretence, that it had heretofore been forbidden by the Spanish colonial laws; and, on the strength of these two inadmissible principles, they issued commissions in the island of Porto Rico, to a swarm of privateers, which have committed extensive and ruinous depredations upon the lawful commerce of the United States. Frequent remonstrances have been made, both to Spain and to the authorities of the island, by the Executive, without producing any effect. During the last summer, a special agent was sent to Porto Rico, to obtain the restitution of American vessels captured by the privateers of that island, and to collect documentary evidence of the trials and condemnation of others. To the first demand, the political chief referred the agent to the Government of Spain, declaring that he could not, without an open infraction of fundamental laws, take cognizance of causes legally determined; that the officers of that province could not proceed, but by the express orders of the Supreme Government, and to that, the United States, after the example of Great Britain, must have recourse.

It appears by the testimony collected by this gentleman, that it had been the practice of these privateers, not to send in their prizes to the large and frequented ports, where impartial judges could determine on the validity of the capture, and where the captured could have the means of fairly defending their rights; but to send them into distant and obscure seaports, where the courts are notoriously corrupt, and where the captains and owners were deprived of the means of making even statements of their cases. There are many instances of vessels condemned most unjustly; and, even where they have had the rare good fortune to escape condemnation, their owners have been subjected to ruinous costs and charges; and, in some cases, before the vessels have reached the port, the cargoes and property have been plundered, and the officers and crew treated in a cruel and barbarous manner.

In San Juan, the principal town of the island of Porto Rico, attempts have been made to assassinate the commercial agent of the United States, and the master of a merchant vessel, in order, as they believe, to prevent them from taking legal measures to recover property unlawfully captured. Your committee deem it unnecessary to enumerate the vessels that have been captured and condemned without the color of justice, or to recapitulate each particular case of barbarous outrage committed upon the persons and property of the citizens of the United States, by privateers fitted out in the ports of Porto Rico; outrages, which, in their opinion, would justify reprisals and a rigorous blockade of the ports of that island. Your committee forbear to recommend the immediate adoption of those measures, only because the Minister of the United States at Madrid has been instructed to remonstrate with His Catholic Majesty on the culpable neglect of the Spanish authorities in the island of Porto Rico, and to require indemnity for the losses sustained by the citizens of the United States, from the lawless conduct of the commanders of privateers, bearing His Majesty's commission. That this remonstrance and demand was not made earlier, arose from circumstances beyond the control of Government. The former Minister had left Madrid before his instructions on this subject reached that place, and the subsequent invasion of Spain by France, and the conduct of the French commander of the blockading squadron off Cadiz, retarded the arrival of our present Minister. While the committee advise, that Government wait the result of the negotiation now pending at Madrid, or, at all events, the answer to the remonstrance of our Minister at that Court, before a resort is had to reprisals and blockade; they earnestly recommend, that two or more small cruisers should be constantly kept off the ports of San Juan, and in the Moro Passage, so as to protect our commerce, and intercept at the entrance of San Juan, Aguadilla, Mazaguez, Cape Roco, and Ponce, American vessels unlawfully captured by Spanish privateers; and, that the commanders of the United States vessels of war be instructed to capture, and send into a port of the United States for trial, any privateer that commits an outrage on the persons, or plunders the property, of citizens of the United States, on the high seas, whenever good and sufficient testimony of such piratical act can be obtained.

On motion of Mr. CONWAY, the bill "concerning pre-emption rights in the Territory of Arkansas," was taken up, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. COOKE, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BRENT in the chair,) on the bill from the Senate, "making appropriation to enable the President of the United States to hold treaties with certain Indian tribes; and, being reported without amendment, was ordered to a third reading."

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BURTON in the chair,) on the bill from the Senate, "for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt," and "for the relief of Alexander McNair, of Missouri."

French Spoliations.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which have been referred during the present session sundry petitions and memorials from insurance companies, and from merchants, and other citizens of the United States, upon the subject of spoliations committed on their commerce, on the high seas as well as in certain ports, under the orders or decrees of the Government of France, subsequent to the year 1806, made a report thereon, which was laid upon the table. The report is as follows:

The Committee of Foreign Relations on the several petitions of Archibald Gracie, Ezra Davis, Matthew, Thomas S., and Levinus Clarkson, William Gray, and others, of the Merchants' and Insurance Companies of Philadelphia, of the merchants and underwriters of Baltimore, referred to them by the House, report: That the petitioners ask the intervention of Congress for the recovery of their just claims against France, for spoliations committed, and property seized or destroyed, under different pretexts, since the year 1806. These claims are alluded to by the President, in his Message, at the opening of the present session of Congress, as resting upon the same principle with other claims which have been admitted by the French Government, and are the subject of the correspondence of the Minister of the United States with the French Government, communicated to the House of Representatives on the 5th of February last. To this correspondence the attention of the House is invited, for a full and fair understanding of the claims of the present petitioners, and of the other citizens of the United States, having similar demands against France, but who have not joined in this application for redress.

The committee have seen, with surprise, that, although the attention of the present Government of France was especially invited to this subject in 1816, and has been repeatedly recalled to it, since that time, that France has not yet thought proper to enter upon the discussion of it. No other answers have yet been given to various official communications of the Minister of the United States, than those required by the mere obligations of international courtesy.

The committee are of opinion that measures ought to be taken to impress upon France the necessity of an early and definite adjustment of this subject; and they would offer such measures to the consideration of the House, if the hope was not entertained that the Government of France would be found, during the ensuing Summer, prepared to investigate it.

The committee are confident that a fair examination, entered into with a disposition to do full justice, will be followed by an arrangement satisfactory to all parties.

The claims of our citizens may be divided into four classes:

1. For property sequestered.
2. For property condemned, regularly, under the Berlin and Milan decrees.
3. For property irregularly condemned under the same decrees, including that condemned by imperial mandate, without the intervention of any judicial tribunal.
4. For property burned or destroyed at sea; a portion of it after the decrees authorizing such destruction had been repealed.

The first class includes, in addition to other property not acted upon by the judicial tribunals, the seizures at Antwerp in 1807, at St. Sebastian in 1809-'10, in Holland in 1810, under a secret article of the treaty incorporating Holland with France. The right of the claimants to an immediate and full indemnity for all property sequestered and never condemned, cannot be plausibly contested. It was put under sequestration by an imperial decree, on suspicion that it was English property, merely to give time to ascertain whether it was English or not. That it was not English, is now well known to the Government of France. Had it been English, it must have been given up or paid for, under the fourth article of the additional articles of the treaty of the 30th May, 1814, between that power and Great Britain. By that article, the parties stipulate to release all property put under sequestration since 1792. If the property of our citizens seized at Antwerp, St. Sebastian, and in Holland, had been what it was, without the shadow of reason, alleged to be, payment would be due for it to English owners. A singular spectacle will be exhibited, if payment is denied when the motive for the seizure is shown to have been false, or should any doctrine of France place the property of a neutral in a worse situation than if it had belonged, as was suspected, to an enemy. Such doctrine cannot be advanced by France, unless she intends to instruct other powers, that, in all future wars in which she may be engaged with a formidable rival, it will be more prudent to be her enemy than her friend. Nor can the committee anticipate any grounds upon which a decision unfavorable to the other claims embraced in the other three enumerated classes, can be justly made, resting as they obviously do upon the immutable bases of justice and national law.

A due regard to those relations of amity that have ever united this Government with France, to the stipulations of her treaty with us, to her character for liberal justice to foreign claimants, will doubtless induce the Government of that country to adjust those claims whenever they are fairly considered.

Under the hope and expectation that attention will be given to this interesting subject by France, prior to the next session of Congress, the committee, without asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the several petitions referred to them, recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the House, at the next session, as early as the public interest will permit, the correspondence which may be held with the Government of France, prior to that time, on the subject of injuries sustained by citizens of the United States since the year 1806.

Trade with Mexican Provinces.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, viz:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 18th instant, requesting the President to communicate any information he may possess, in relation to the intercourse and trade now carried on between the people of the United States (and, particularly, the people of the State of Missouri) and the Mexican provinces; how and by what route that trade or intercourse is carried on; in what it consists, the distances, &c.; the nations of Indians through which it passes; their dispositions, whether pacific or otherwise; the advantages resulting, or likely to result from that trade or intercourse; I herewith transmit a communication from the Department of State, which contains all the information which has yet been collected in relation to those subjects.

JAMES MONROE.

MAY 24, 1824.

The said Message was read, and laid upon the table. The communication is as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, April 27, 1824.

SIR: Permit me, through you, to communicate to his Excellency the President of the United States, the following ideas; from which, if circumstances would allow of their going into operation, much good might, perhaps, result to the young and enterprising of the West, as well as to the nation generally. I mean the interposition of the General Government, for the protection of an intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of the Northern and Eastern parts of Mexico. This intercourse has been, on a small scale, attempted by a few brave and enterprising men from the State of Missouri, but with much risk of lives and property. The latter, they have frequently been robbed of by the Indians. These evils can only be prevented by means of a negotiation, to be opened by the General Government, with the Indians, through which the route would pass, from a favorable point on the Missouri River to Santa Fe. The Indians should be made responsible for depredations committed on citizens of the United States, as on citizens of the Republic of Mexico visiting the United States.

The benefits which would result from a safe intercourse between the United States and those parts of Mexico, it might be considered presumption in me to comment on. Its many important advantages will be obvious to the judgment of those much more capable of doing justice to the subject than myself. I will therefore submit it with the following few remarks:

1st. A safe intercourse between the citizens of this Government and the Northern and Eastern parts of the Mexican dominions, will awaken the inhabitants of the latter to the blessings of a republican system of Government; blessings which the American people wish all nations to enjoy, and the value of which will be more deeply impressed on the minds of strangers by an experimental knowledge of our enjoyments.

2dly. Many advantages will flow from the commerce to which the establishment of a safe intercourse will naturally lead; and many of the productions and manufactures of our country will be exchanged for silver, mules, horses, and other articles, in demand with us.

3dly. The establishment and protection of safe intercourse would not only essentially benefit the people of the two Governments, but would be attended with a beneficial result as it relates to the Indian nations, through which the communication would pass, and those bordering on them. Some of these nations yet know little of the American character. The most effectual mode of maintaining friendship with the Indians, is to impress them with a deep sense of your superiority. This, when judiciously attended to, does not require a great expense; and the saving of much blood will unquestionably result from a timely interposition on the part of the Government.

4thly. A portion of the Western people have been in the habit of hunting and trapping for a living; should the privilege be denied them of following their pursuits in the Indian country, they will seek other employments. All cannot be engaged in the Indian trade, and some will extend their enterprises into the Mexican dominions. These, if not protected by Government, they will hazard at their own risk; difficulties with the Indians will inevitably follow; and a train of mischievous consequences can alone be prevented by laying of the foundation, on the part of the General Government, of a proper understanding with them.

5thly. The city of Mexico is situated at so great a distance from the Northern and Eastern limits of the Republic, that a safe and harmonious intercourse cannot be opened and maintained without the establishment of an agency at Santa Fe, in strict subordination to the Government at Washington, and the American Minister at Mexico.

Such an agent would have much in his power towards producing and maintaining the proper friendly understanding between the American people and the citizens of Mexico, as well as with the numerous Indian nations. This agent would be extremely useful to the Government, in keeping a constant communication of the state of affairs in that section of the country with the Government at home, as well as with the American Minister at the city of Mexico. Such an agent ought to have the charge, in a certain degree, of the Indians bordering on the Mexican Republic.

8thly. The route in contemplation would pass through a healthy country, and would be attended with many facilities, too numerous at present to detail. Those who would not have the means of visiting Mexico in a more expensive mode, could pursue this route with little comparative cost.

The establishment, the encouragement, and the protection of this intercourse will be, I have no doubt, cheerfully met on the part of the Mexican Government; and, with the means thus afforded them, the day will rapidly approach when the people of that country will become genuine, orderly, and patriotic Republicans.

Respectfully, I have the honor to be, &c.

A. McNAIR.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Report on the Address of Ninian Edwards.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the committee appointed on the 19th of April ultimo, on an address or memorial of Ninian Edwards, preferring certain charges against the Secretary of the Treasury, made a report; which was read.

[The report is in great detail, covering every point presented in the "Address," and concluding with a separate answer to each of the six accusations presented. This conclusion is as follows:]

Referring to what has been said in the introduction to this report, and repeating that Mr. Edwards has not had an opportunity of supporting his charges, by his presence and testimony, the result of the facts which have appeared to the committee, thus far, in this investigation, and of their deductions from them, when applied to the recapitulation of charges, as stated at the end of the Address, is—

First. That the evidence referred to, and examined, does not support the charge of having mismanaged the public funds.

Second. That the uncurrent notes, mentioned in the second charge, appear, by evidence satisfactory to the committee, to have been received and deposited by the public receivers, at a time when they were receivable under the resolution of Congress of 1816. That, in the principal case, that of the Bank of Missouri, the bank did not make itself responsible for such notes as cash, and therefore the Secretary was bound to receive them from the bank; that, although the banks of Tombigbee and Edwardsville were liable to account for such deposits as cash, if the construction which the committee gives to their contracts be correct, yet, that both the Secretary and the banks expressed a different opinion as to the meaning of those contracts, and that the Secretary, in receiving fifteen thousand dollars from the one, and twenty thousand dollars from the other, of those banks, appears to have acted according to what he supposed to be the rights of the parties, and with a proper regard to the interest of the United States, under the circumstances which then existed.

Third. That no intentional misstatement has been made to the House, of the amount of uncurrent bills received from the banks; although a sum of two hundred and eighty dollars of such bills was omitted through mistake.

Fourth. That, although the Secretary may have misconstrued the effect of some of the contracts with the banks to the extent before mentioned, the committee find no grounds for the charge that he has misrepresented them, inasmuch as the contracts themselves were submitted, with his report, to the House.

Fifth. That the Secretary did omit to communicate to Congress the reasons which led him to direct the deposit of public moneys in the three local banks of Chillicothe, Cincinnati, and Louisville, where the Bank of the United States had branches, but there is no reason for supposing that any concealment was intended, or that the omission was occasioned by design.

Sixth. That in some instances, papers called for by resolutions of the House, have not been communicated with other papers sent in answer to such calls, but that these omissions have happened either from accident, or from a belief that the papers so omitted were immaterial or not called for; and that there is no evidence that any document or information has been withheld from improper motives.

Having already expressed the opinion that this investigation ought not to be terminated, until the person preferring the charges shall have been examined, and regretting the circumstances which render such an examination impracticable during the present session of Congress, and thinking that Mr. Edwards may be expected at Washington within a few days, the committee feel it their duty to recommend to the House that they be required to sit after the adjournment, for the purpose of taking his examination, if an opportunity shall be presented.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved that the report be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. FORSYTH hoped that a copy would be sent, by order of the House, to the President of the United States.

The question was divided, and being first put on laying the report on the table, it was carried.

Mr. COOK expressed an intention to address the House, should the report be called up for consideration, and hoped it would be printed in time.

The question on printing was then put, and carried.

Mr. LIVINGSTON then offered, by direction of the committee, the following:

"Ordered, That the committee, to which was referred the Address of Ninian Edwards, be required to sit after the adjournment of the House, for such time as shall be necessary, in their judgment, for further examination; that any additional report which may be made by them, be filed in the office of the Clerk of the House; and that any three members of the committee be a quorum for the transaction of business."

Mr. WILLIAMS wished that the resolution should be suffered to lie on the table for one day.

Western Boundary of the Territory of Arkansas.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. TAYLOR hoped that the House was prepared to act on the resolution without delay.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to lay it on the table; and, the question being put, it was carried—ayes 92.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved that a copy of this report be transmitted by the Clerk of this House to the President of the United States. He observed, that the same courtesy which had dictated the former communication, when the memorial was presented, and the committee had sent for Mr. Edwards, was proper on the present occasion.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that, with great deference to the honorable gentleman from Georgia, it appeared to him that, when the resolution proposed in the report of the committee should be adopted, it would then be proper to make such communication, but not in the present stage of proceeding.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved to lay the resolution he offered on the table, till the determination of the House with respect to that reported by the committee should be known.—Agreed to.

Western Boundary of the Territory of Arkansas.

On motion of Mr. CONWAY, the House, in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SHARPE in the chair,) considered the bill to fix the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas.

On this bill an animated debate of considerable extent arose, in which Mr. RANKIN opposed the extension of the present boundary of that Territory, as violating the provision of Indian treaties, as giving an improper size to the future State into which this Territory will soon be formed. He denied the right of the settlers to the lands they occupied, and contended that that Territory ought to afford a resting-place to the Indians from the eastern side of the Mississippi, &c.

Mr. CONWAY remonstrated with warmth against forty thousand Choctaw Indians turned in among the settlements of Arkansas, to turn out those who had subdued the wilderness, and were surrounded with improvements, the fruit of their own labor, fields, mills, cotton factories, distilleries, &c. He contended that the limits of the Territory should be removed farther to the west, to allow room for these Indians having a separate home from the whites, &c., and to give strength to Arkansas as a future frontier State.

Mr. Wood made some remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CONWAY explained.

Mr. OLAY advocated the passage of the bill—represented the hardships of the circumstances of the settlers—considered the new Territories as younger daughters in the common federative family, and, as such, entitled to an indulgent policy—denied that the size of the Territory must necessarily govern the size of the future State to be formed out of it, and even if it did, he urged the policy of making Arkansas a strong frontier State. The bill only asks the Indians to consent to remove the line farther west, and does not violate any treaty. It had received the deliberate consideration of the Senate, and he hoped it would pass this House.

Mr. RANKIN rejoined. If this extension of the limits be allowed, the whole must be received as a State, or a small section of its western part must remain (probably forever) a Territory, or else the Indians must be driven still farther west.

Mr. OLAY responded. If Louisiana, was not as large as the gentleman could wish, it was an argument rather for than against this bill. He (Mr. O.) had opposed the treaty by which Texas was ceded, and Louisiana consequently reduced in extent. If Louisiana was comparatively weak, the greater need that the adjoining frontier State should be a strong one.

The debate was further continued by Mr. WOOD, Mr. F. JOHNSON, and Mr. ISAACS, when the committee rose, and reported the bill to the House; and, the question being put on its final passage, it was decided in the negative—ayes 52, noes 56.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 26.

Western Boundary of the Territory of Arkansas.

A motion was made, by Mr. ROSS, that the House do reconsider the vote, taken yesterday, on the question, "Shall the bill from the Senate, entitled 'An act to fix the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes,' be read a third time?" and on the question, "Will the House reconsider the said vote?" it passed in the affirmative.

The question was again put, "Shall the bill be read a third time?" and passed in the affirmative. To-day was then assigned for the third reading of the said bill. The bill was, accordingly, read a third time. And, on the question, "Shall it pass?" it passed in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 58, as follows:

Case of Ninian Edwards.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved for the consideration of the resolution reported yesterday by the Committee of Investigation in the case of Ninian Edwards. Carried—ayes 88, noes 26.

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, the resolve was amended so as to direct that the Clerk cause the final report of the committee to be printed, and transmit a copy to each member of the House.

The question then recurring on the resolution as amended—

Farther debate took place. In the course of it, Mr. A. SMYTH moved to lay the resolve on the table; which motion was negatived—ayes 49, noes 58.

The question being put on the resolution as amended, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 74.

So the resolve was agreed to.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

Mr. McDUFFIE offered the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to avail himself of all the means in his power, to ascertain whether any farther evidence can be obtained in relation to the claim of the heirs of Baron de Beaumarchais; and that, if any such evidence shall be obtained, that he communicate the same to this House, at an early period in the next session.”

Mr. McDUFFIE stated the reasons in favor of the above resolution; the principal of which was, a wish to show the French Government that this country is disposed to do justice in the case of the Beaumarchais claim.

Mr. FORSYTH stated that it formed a part of the instructions of our Minister to France, to negotiate on all just claims of citizens of the two nations against each other's Government, which included this case, and that this proposition was therefore unnecessary.

Mr. McDUFFIE thought, that, though this was true, yet it was expedient to adopt the resolution, to prevent mistaken impressions, which might be produced by the late vote of this House on that claim.

THURSDAY, May 27.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

Mr. TAYLOR then rose, and said, that it had yesterday been decided that three members of the Committee of Investigation, in the case of Mr. Ninian Edwards, should not be a quorum of that committee. He had understood that one of the members of that committee had left the United States, and that another was gone home to his residence in Alabama. It was very desirable that the committee should be filled up; and, with a view to that object, he moved that two members be added to the committee, to supply the place of the two members absent?

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the Clerk, on the order of the chairman of the committee, pay witnesses who may attend the Committee of Investigation, the usual allowance per diem for their attendance. Agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the following:

“That a committee be appointed on the part of this House, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that unless he may have other communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.”

After a short time,

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Joint Committee, appointed to wait on the President, reported that they had performed that duty, and that the President had informed them that he had no farther communication to make to Congress.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House, having completed the business before them, are ready to close the present session of Congress by an adjournment on their part, and that the Clerk go with the said message.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, the House was then adjourned by the SPEAKER till the first Monday of December next.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION.

The select committee, (of the House of Representatives,) to whom was referred the memorial, or address, of Ninian Edwards, having, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 26th of May, continued to hold its sittings, after the adjournment of the House, until the 21st day of June, have agreed on the following report:

[The report shows that the whole case had been gone over again in the presence of Mr. Edwards, and a full hearing had of all that his testimony presented, or that he himself chose to submit in writing; and then concludes with the unanimous reiteration of the point arrived at in the first report. The following is this conclusion:]

The committee do not deem it necessary to extend their report, by protracted observations on the various parts of the evidence, as the whole is submitted to the House. They content themselves with saying, that, in their opinion, nothing has been proved to impeach the integrity of the Secretary, or to bring into doubt the general correctness and ability of his administration of the public finances. To this point, as the main object of the inquiry, the chief attention of the committee has been directed; and they have come to the result, which has now been stated, with the unanimous concurrence of the members present. Other points there are, of less importance, but which may, nevertheless, be supposed not to have escaped consideration by the committee. These, however, under all the circumstances, they have thought it proper to leave, without observation, in the light in which they are placed by the evidence.

EVIDENCE.

[The committee reported the whole of the testimony taken, among the rest, that of Senator NOBLE of Indiana; of which the following is a part:]

Q. Have you had any conversation with Governor Edwards concerning Mr. Crawford's management of the Western banks, and concerning his authorship of the A. B. letters?

A. I have; and it was introduced by himself.

Q. State that conversation, with the time and circumstances.

A. The precise day I cannot recollect; it was pending his nomination made by the President of the United States to the Senate, as Minister to Mexico; and it was after the 21st or 22d of February last. I make this statement from the fact, that on the 21st or 22d of February, I went to Mrs. Queen's to board, where Governor Edwards resided, and this conversation was after I went there. He stated that he was about to be attacked in the Senate of the United States for the purpose of defeating his nomination; that party and political spirit was now high: that he understood that charges would be exhibited against him, and that it had been so declared in the Senate Chamber. I remarked to Governor Edwards that he well knew, according to the rules of that body, while on Executive business, secrecy was required; that I was not at liberty to mention any occurrence, or the remark of a single member, excepting so far as related to myself; that I was not governed by party or political feelings or motives; that I adhered to the expression made use of by Jefferson—and the only inquiry with me was, is he capable, and is he honest? Governor Edwards then remarked, that, although secrecy was required in that body, yet he was informed almost every day of the transactions and remarks of individuals when his nomination was called up; and he added, "Noble, I shall not forget you." I then replied, that I did not understand his meaning. He said it was unimportant—he was satisfied I was not governed by the party feelings which were then prevailing. It was on the day, in the evening of which this conversation took place, that I had moved to take up his nomination in the Senate. This must have been his meaning, when he said he would not forget me; for he explained it the next day, and said he had heard that I had done so. Mr. E. farther remarked, that he knew me to be the decisive friend of William H. Crawford; and, said he, I am considered as being his bitter enemy—and I am charged with being the author of the numbers signed A. B.; but, (raising his hand,) I pledge you my honor, I am not the author, nor do I know who the author was. Crawford and I, said Mr. Edwards, have had a little difference, but I have always considered him a high-minded, honorable and vigilant officer of the Government; he has been abused about the Western banks and the unavailable funds; (leaning forward and extending his hand) he added, now don't it, you know we both live in States where there are many poor debtors to the Government for lands, together with a deranged currency. The notes on various banks being depreciated, after the effect and operation of the war in that portion of the Union, and the banks, by attempting to call in their paper, having exhausted their specie, the notes that were then in circulation became of little or no value. Many men of influence in that country, said he, have united to induce the Secretary of the Treasury to select certain banks as banks of deposit, and to take the notes of certain banks in payment for public lands. Had he not done so, (meaning Mr. Crawford,) many of our inhabitants would have been turned out of doors, and lost their lands; and the people of that country would have had as universal disgust against Mr. Crawford; and I will venture to say, said Mr. Edwards, notwithstanding I am considered his enemy, that no man in this Government could have conducted the fiscal and financial concerns of the Government with more integrity and propriety than Mr. Crawford did. I farther remarked to Governor Edwards, in speaking of his nomination, that, inasmuch as he was nominated by the President, unless some charge was brought against him, I had already evinced in the Senate my disposition to vote for the confirmation of his nomination, without any previous consultation with him; but added, if I had the power of making the nomination, I would not have nominated him; and, as an evidence of it, I had written a letter to Mr. Monroe, urging the nomination of William Henry Harrison, and with that letter I had enclosed the unanimous recommendation of the members of the Legislature of Indiana in favor of General Harrison.

[The following extracts from the testimony of three other witnesses are also given:]

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Have you ever had a conversation with Mr. Edwards about the authorship of the A. B. publications? If yes, relate it.

Answer. Yes. I have had a conversation with him on that subject in December or January last, at his lodgings, at Mrs. Queen's. Mr. E. said he was not the author of the A. B. plot, that he did not know any thing about it.

Q. In what manner was this denial made, and in what words, so far as you can recollect?

A. The manner appeared to be solemn; the expressions were—"He would be damned if he knew any thing about that damned A. B. plot."

Q. How came he to say any thing about the A. B. plot?

A. I called upon Mr. Edwards for the purpose of procuring recommendations to the different Secretaries of the Departments with a view to obtaining for myself a clerkship. He stated that he was intimately acquainted with all of them, and could give letters to all of them, except Mr. Crawford, and a letter to him would do no good, for, (to use his own expressions,) that he and Mr. Crawford "did not set horses together;" that Mr. Crawford was under a belief that he was the author of the damned A. B. plot, the authorship of which he disavowed; and he concluded by saying that he considered Mr. Crawford a very clever and honorable man.

Q. by Mr. Cook. Are you certain that Mr. Edwards, in speaking of an A. B. plot, did not say that he knew nothing of any plot?

A. I have correctly stated the conversation as it occurred.

Jeremiah Elkins sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Q. Had you a conversation with Mr. Edwards about the A. B. publications?

A. I have heard him allude to those publications, and mention his being charged with the authorship of them.

Q. State what took place.

A. I think it was an article in the Richmond Enquirer which led to the remark I heard him make, in which article it was stated that "Mr. Edwards, of A. B. plot memory," or words to that effect, had been nominated by the President as Minister to Mexico. Mr. Edwards observed that he was not the author of those publications; or, as I think the expression was, that he was no more the author than the editor of the Enquirer himself.

William W. Seaton sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Did you ever have a conversation with Mr. Edwards, relative to the authorship of the A. B. publications?

Answer. Mr. Edwards spoke of those papers to me, incidentally. He came to our office to have, as he said, a free and frank conversation. It was the first time he had been there, to my knowledge, for a year. It was during the pendency of his nomination before the Senate as Minister to Mexico, and some time before Mr. Crawford's report was made to Congress. He wished to know, he said, if we would publish his defence. I asked him what defence—a defence against whom? He replied, that he expected to be attacked, and whenever he turned upon his enemies, he generally got the better of them, (or words to that effect.) He further said, (and this I remember distinctly, for he twice or thrice repeated it,) that when he commenced, he never stopped at the line of just retribution. I answered him, that, if he was attacked in our paper, he should have the free use of it to defend himself; that if he was attacked anywhere else, he should have the same rights extended to him as were extended to all other citizens; but he could have no positive promise of publication, until we had read the matter which he wished published. Passing then from that subject, Governor Edwards said he knew that we had thought him for some time hostile to us, on account of that foolish business of last session, (or that A. B. affair of last session—I do not recollect which phrase he used,) but he had nothing to do with it. Mr. Gales was present during the greater part, if not the whole of this conversation. It was on the authority of this conversation alone, that we expressed in the paper our belief that Mr. Edwards was not the author of the A. B. publications.

[In consequence of these two reports of the Committee of Investigation, and the accompanying testimony, Mr. Edwards was required by President Monroe to resign his appointment of Minister to Mexico, and also to refund the outfit and quarter's salary which he had received.]

EIGHTEENTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 6, 1824.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, December 6.

This being the day fixed for the opening of the Second Session of the Eighteenth Congress, Mr. GAILLARD, president pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice President, took the chair; and the roll being called over, it appeared that a quorum of members was present, and a committee was appointed, jointly with such committee as the House of Representatives might appoint, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses were assembled, and ready to receive any communication he might have to make, &c.

TUESDAY, December 7.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the Senate concurred in the resolution from the other House, respecting the reception of General LAFAYETTE.

A written Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. EVERETT, as follows:

President's Message.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The view which I have now to present to you, of our affairs, Foreign and Domestic, realizes the most sanguine anticipations which have been entertained of the public prosperity. If we look to the whole, our growth, as a Nation, continues to be rapid, beyond example; if to the States which compose it, the same gratifying spectacle is exhibited. Our expansion over the vast territory within our limits, has been great, without indicating any decline in those sections from which the emigration has been most conspicuous. We have daily gained strength by a native population in every quarter—a population devoted to our happy system of Government, and cherishing the bond of union with fraternal affection. Experience has already shown, that the difference of climate, and of industry, proceeding from that cause, inseparable from such vast domains, and which, under other systems, might have a repulsive tendency, cannot fail to produce, with us, under wise regulations, the opposite effect. What one portion wants, the other may supply, and this will be most sensibly felt by the parts most distant from each other, forming, thereby, a domestic market, and an active intercourse between the extremes and throughout every portion of our Union. Thus, by a happy distribution of power between the National and State Governments, governments which rest exclusively on the sovereignty of the people, and are fully adequate to the great purposes for which they were respectively instituted, causes which might otherwise lead to dismemberment, operate powerfully to draw us closer together. In every other circumstance, a correct view of the actual state of our Union must be equally gratifying to our constituents. Our relations with foreign powers are of a friendly character, although certain interesting differences remain unsettled with some. Our revenue, under the mild system of impost and tonnage, continues to be adequate to all the purposes of the Government. Our agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and navigation, flourish. Our fortifications are advancing in the degree authorized by existing appropriations, to maturity, and due progress is made in the augmentation of the navy, to the limit prescribed for it by law. For these blessings, we owe to Almighty God, from whom we derive them, and with profound reverence, our most grateful and unceasing acknowledgments.

In adverting to our relations with foreign powers, which are always an object of the highest importance, I have to remark, that, of the subjects which have been brought into discussion with them during the present administration, some have been satisfactorily terminated; others have been suspended, to be resumed hereafter, under circumstances more favorable to success; and others are still in negotiation, with the hope that they may be adjusted, with mutual accommodation to the interests, and to the satisfaction, of the respective parties. It has been the invariable object of this Government, to cherish the most friendly relations with every power, and on principles and conditions which might make them permanent. A systematic effort has been made to place our commerce with each power on a footing of perfect reciprocity; to settle with each, in a spirit of candor and liberality, all existing differences, and to anticipate and remove, so far as it might be practicable, all causes of future variance.

It having been stipulated by the seventh article of the convention of navigation and commerce, which was concluded on the twenty-fourth of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, between the United States and France, that the said convention should continue in force for two years, from the first of October of that year, and for an indefinite term afterwards, unless one of the parties should declare its intention to renounce it, in which event it should cease to operate at the end of six months from such declaration; and no such intention having been announced, the convention having been found advantageous to both parties, it has since remained, and still remains, in force. At the time when that convention was concluded, many interesting subjects were left unsettled, and particularly our claim to indemnity for spoils which were committed on our commerce in the late wars. For these interests and claims, it was in the contemplation of the parties, to make provision at a subsequent day, by a more comprehensive and definitive treaty. The object has been duly attended to since by the Executive; but, as yet, it has not been accomplished. It is hoped that a favorable opportunity will present itself for opening a negotiation, which may embrace and arrange all existing differences, and every other concern in which they have a common interest, upon the accession of the present king of France, an event which has occurred since the close of the last session of Congress.

With Great Britain our commercial intercourse rests on the same footing that it did at the last session. By the convention of one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, the commerce between the United States and the British dominions in Europe and the East Indies, was arranged on a principle of reciprocity. That convention was confirmed and continued in force, with slight exceptions, by a subsequent treaty, for the term of ten years, from the twentieth of October, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, the date of the latter. The trade with the British colonies in the West Indies, has not, as yet, been arranged by treaty, or otherwise, to our satisfaction. An approach to that result has been made by legislative acts, whereby many serious impediments, which had been raised by the parties in defence of their respective claims, were removed. An earnest desire exists, and has been manifested on the part of this Government, to place the commerce with the colonies, likewise, on a footing of reciprocal advantage; and it is hoped that the British Government, seeing the justice of the proposal, and its importance to the colonies, will, ere long, accede to it.

The Commissioners who were appointed for the adjustment of the boundary, between the territories of the United States and those of Great Britain, specified in the fifth article of the Treaty of Ghent, having disagreed in their decision, and both governments having agreed to establish that boundary by amicable negotiation between them, it is hoped that it may be satisfactorily adjusted in that mode. The boundary specified by the sixth article has been established by the decision of the commissioners. From the progress made in that provided for by the seventh, according to a report recently received, there is good cause to presume that it will be settled in the course of the ensuing year.

It is a cause of serious regret that no arrangement has yet been finally concluded between the two Governments, to secure, by joint co-operation, the suppression of the slave trade. It was the object of the British Government, in the early stages of the negotiation, to adopt a plan for the suppression, which should include the concession of the mutual right of search by the ships of war of each party, of the vessels of the other, for suspected offenders. This was objected to by this government on the principle, that, as the right of search was a right of war of a belligerent towards a neutral power, it might have an ill effect to extend it by treaty to an offence, which had been made comparatively mild to a time of peace. Anxious, however, for the suppression of this trade, it was thought advisable, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, founded on an act of Congress, to propose to the British Government an expedient which should be free from that objection, and more effectual for the object, by making it piratical. In that mode the enormity of the crime would place the offenders out of the protection of their Government, and involve no question of search, or other question between the parties, touching their respective rights. It was believed, also, that it would completely suppress the trade in the vessels of both parties, and by their respective citizens and subjects in those of other powers, with whom it was hoped that the odium which would thereby be attached to it, would produce a corresponding arrangement, and, by means thereof, its entire extirpation forever. A convention to this effect was concluded and signed in London on the 18th day of March, by Plenipotentiaries duly authorized by both Governments, to the ratification of which certain obstacles have arisen which are not yet entirely removed. The difference between the parties still remaining, has been reduced to a point, not of sufficient magnitude, as is presumed, to be permitted to defeat an object so near to the heart of both nations, and so desirable to the friends of humanity throughout the world. As objections, however, to the principle recommended by the House of Representatives, or at least to the consequences inseparable from it, and which are understood to apply to the law, have been raised, which may deserve a reconsideration of the whole subject, I have thought it proper to suspend the conclusion of a new convention until the definitive sentiments of Congress may be ascertained. The documents relating to the negotiation, are, with that intent, submitted to your consideration.

Our commerce with Sweden has been placed on a footing of perfect reciprocity by treaty, and, with Russia, the Netherlands, Prussia, the free Hanseatic cities, the Dukedom of Oldenburgh, and Sardinia, by internal regulations on each side, founded on mutual agreement between the respective Governments.

The principles upon which the commercial policy of the United States is founded, are to be traced to an early period. They are essentially connected with those upon which their independence was declared, and owe their origin to the enlightened men who took the lead in our affairs at that important epoch. They are developed in their first treaty of commerce with France of sixth February, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, and by a formal commission, which was instituted immediately after the conclusion of their Revolutionary struggle, for the purpose of negotiating treaties of commerce with every European power. The first treaty of the United States with Prussia, which was negotiated by that commission, affords a signal illustration of those principles. The act of Congress of the third March, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, adopted immediately after the return of a general peace, was a new overture to foreign nations to establish our commercial relations with them on the basis of free and equal reciprocity. That principle has pervaded all the acts of Congress, and all the negotiations of the Executive on the subject since.

President's Message.

A convention for the settlement of important questions in relation to the northwest coast of this continent, and its adjoining seas, was concluded and signed at St. Petersburg on the fifth day of April last, by the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, and Plenipotentiaries of the Imperial Government of Russia. It will immediately be laid before the Senate for the exercise of the constitutional authority of that body, with reference to its ratification. It is proper to add, that the manner in which this negotiation was invited and conducted on the part of the Emperor, has been very satisfactory.

The great and extraordinary changes which have happened in the Governments of Spain and Portugal, within the last two years, without seriously affecting the friendly relations which, under all of them, have been maintained with those powers by the United States, have been obstacles to the adjustment of the particular subjects of discussion which have arisen with each. A resolution of the Senate, adopted at their last session, called for information as to the effect produced upon our relations with Spain, by the recognition, on the part of the United States, of the Independent South American Governments. The papers containing that information are now communicated to Congress.

A Chargé d'Affaires has been received from the Independent Government of Brazil. That country, heretofore a colonial possession of Portugal, had, some years since, been proclaimed by the Sovereign of Portugal himself, an independent kingdom. Since his return to Lisbon a revolution in Brazil has established a new Government there, with an imperial title, at the head of which is placed the prince in whom the regency had been vested by the king, at the time of his departure. There is reason to expect that, by amicable negotiation, the independence of Brazil will, ere long, be recognized by Portugal herself.

With the remaining powers of Europe, with those on the coast of Barbary, and with all the new South American States, our relations are of a friendly character. We have Ministers Plenipotentiary residing with the Republics of Colombia and Chili, and have received Ministers, of the same rank, from Colombia, Guatemala, Buenos Ayres, and Mexico. Our commercial relations with all those States are mutually beneficial and increasing. With the Republic of Colombia a treaty of commerce has been formed, of which a copy is received, and the original daily expected. A negotiation for a like treaty would have been commenced with Buenos Ayres, had it not been prevented by the indisposition and lamented decease of Mr. Rodney, our Minister there, and to whose memory the most respectful attention has been shown by the Government of that Republic. An advantageous alteration in our treaty with Tunis has been obtained by our consular agent residing there, the official document of which, when received, will be laid before the Senate.

The attention of the Government has been drawn with great solicitude to other subjects, and particularly to that relating to a state of maritime war, involving the relative rights of neutral and belligerent in such wars. Most of the difficulties which we have experienced, and of the losses which we have sustained, since the establishment of our independence, have proceeded from the unsettled state of those rights, and the extent to which the belligerent claim has been carried against the neutral party. It is impossible to look back on the occurrences of the late wars in Europe, and to behold the disregard which was paid to our rights as a neutral power, and the waste which was made of our commerce by the parties to those wars, by various acts of their respective Governments, and under the pretext, by each, that the other had set the example, without great mortification, and a fixed purpose never to submit to the like in future. An attempt to remove those causes of possible variance by friendly negotiation, and on just principles, which should be applicable to all parties, could, it was presumed, be viewed by none other than as a proof of an earnest desire to preserve those relations with every power. In the late war between France and Spain, a crisis occurred, in which it seemed probable that all the controvertible principles, involved in such wars, might be brought into discussion, and settled to the satisfaction of all parties. Propositions, having this object in view, have been made to the Governments of Great Britain, France, Russia, and of other powers, which have been received in a friendly manner by all, but as yet no treaty has been formed with either for its accomplishment. The policy will, it is presumed, be persevered in, and in the hope that it may be successful.

It will always be recollected that with one of the parties to those wars, and from whom we received those injuries, we sought redress by war. From the other, by whose then reigning Government our vessels were seized in port as well as at sea, and their cargoes confiscated, indemnity has been expected, but has not yet been rendered. It was under the influence of the latter that our vessels were likewise seized by the Governments of Spain, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Naples, and from whom indemnity has been claimed and is still expected, with the exception of Spain, by whom it has been rendered. With both parties we had abundant cause of war, but we had no alternative but to resist that which was most powerful at sea, and pressed us nearest at home. With this, all differences were settled by a treaty founded on conditions fair and honorable to both, and which has been so far executed with perfect good faith. It has been earnestly hoped that the other would, of its own accord, and from a sentiment of justice and conciliation, make to our citizens the indemnity to which they are entitled, and thereby remove from our relations any just cause of discontent on our side.

It is estimated that the receipts into the Treasury during the current year, exclusive of loans, will exceed eighteen million five hundred thousand dollars, which, with the sum remaining in the Treasury at the end of the last year, amounting to nine million, four hundred and sixty-three thousand, nine hundred and twenty-two dollars, eighty-one cents, will, after discharging the current disbursements of the year, the interest on the public debt, and eleven million six hundred and thirty-three thousand dollars fifty-two cents of the principal, leave a balance of more than three million dollars in the Treasury on the first day of January next.

A larger amount of the debt contracted during the late war, bearing an interest of six per cent., becoming redeemable in the course of the ensuing year, than could be discharged by the ordinary revenue, the act of the twenty-sixth of May authorized a loan of five million dollars, at four and a half per cent., to meet the same. By this arrangement an annual saving will accrue to the public of seventy-five thousand dollars.

Under the act of the twenty-fourth of May last, a loan of five million dollars was authorized, in order to meet the awards, under the Florida Treaty, which was negotiated at par, with the Bank of the United States, at four and a half per cent., the limit of interest fixed by the act. By this provision the claims of our citizens, who had sustained so great a loss by spoliation, and from whom indemnity had been so long withheld, were promptly paid. For these advances the public will be amply repaid, at no distant day, by the sale of the lands in Florida. Of the great advantages resulting from the acquisition of the Territory in other respects, too high an estimate cannot be formed.

It is estimated that the receipts into the Treasury, during the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, will be sufficient to meet the disbursements of the year, including the sum of ten million dollars, which is annually appropriated by the act, constituting the Sinking Fund, to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt.

The whole amount of the public debt on the first of January next, may be estimated at eighty-six million dollars, inclusive of two million five hundred thousand dollars of the loan authorized by the act of the twenty-sixth of May last. In this estimate is included a stock of seven million dollars, issued for the purchase of that amount of the capital stock of the Bank of the United States; and which, as the stock of the Bank, still held by the Government, will at least be fully equal to its reimbursement, ought not to be considered as constituting a part of the public debt. Estimating, then, the whole amount of the public debt at seventy-nine million dollars, and regarding the annual receipts and expenditures of the Government, a well-founded hope may be entertained, that, should no unexpected event occur, the whole of the public debt may be discharged in the course of ten years, and the Government be left at liberty thereafter to apply such portion of the revenue as may not be necessary for current expenses, to such other objects as may be most conducive to the public security and welfare. That the sum applicable to these objects will be very considerable may be fairly concluded, when it is recollected that a large amount of the public revenue has been applied, since the late war, to the construction of the public buildings in this city; to the erection of fortifications along the coast, and of arsenals in different parts of the Union; to the augmentation of the navy; to the extinguishment of the Indian title to large tracts of fertile territory; to the acquisition of Florida; to pensions to Revolutionary officers and soldiers, and to invalids of the late war. On many of these objects the expense will annually diminish, and cease at no distant period on most or all. On the first of January, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, the public debt amounted to one hundred and twenty-three million, four hundred and ninety-one thousand, nine hundred and sixty-five dollars and sixteen cents; and notwithstanding the large sums which have been applied to these objects, it has been reduced since that period, thirty-seven million, four hundred and forty-six thousand, nine hundred and sixty-one dollars and seventy eight cents. The last portion of the public debt will be redeemable on the first of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five; and while there is the best reason to believe that the resources of the Government will be continually adequate to such portions of it as may become due in the interval, it is recommended to Congress to seize every opportunity which may present itself to reduce the rate of interest on every part thereof. The high state of the public credit, and the great abundance of money, are at this time very favorable to such a result. It must be very gratifying to our fellow-citizens to witness this flourishing state of the public finances, when it is recollected that no burthen whatever has been imposed upon them.

The Military Establishment, in all its branches, in the performance of the various duties assigned to each, justifies the favorable view which was presented, of the efficiency of its organization, at the last session. All the appropriations have been regularly applied to the objects intended by Congress; and, so far as the disbursements have been made, the accounts have been rendered and settled, without loss to the public. The condition of the Army itself, as relates to the officers and men, in science and discipline, is highly respectable. The Military Academy, on which the Army essentially rests, and to which it is much indebted for this state of improvement, has attained, in comparison with any other institution of a like kind, a high degree of perfection. Experience, however, has shown, that the dispersed condition of the Corps of Artillery is unfavorable to the discipline of that important branch of the Military Establishment. To remedy this inconvenience, eleven companies have been assembled at the fortification erected at Old Point Comfort, as a school for Artillery instruction, with intention, as they shall be perfected in the various duties of that service, to order them to other posts, and to supply their places with other companies, for instruction in like manner. In this mode, a complete knowledge of the science and duties of this arm, will be extended throughout the whole Corps of Artillery. But, to carry this object fully into effect, will require the aid of Congress; to obtain which, the subject is now submitted to your consideration.

Of the progress which has been made in the construction of Fortifications, for the permanent defence of our maritime frontier, according to the plan decided on, and to the extent of the existing appropriations, the Report of the Secretary of War, which is herewith communicated, will give a detailed account. Their final completion cannot fail to give great additional security to that frontier, and to diminish, proportionably, the expense of defending it in the event of war.

The provisions in the several acts of Congress, of the last session, for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and the Ohio, of the Harbor of Presqu'isle, on Lake Erie, and the repair of the Plymouth Beach, are in a course of regular execution; and, there is reason to believe, that the appropriation, in each instance, will be adequate to the object. To carry these improvements fully into effect, the superintendence of them has been assigned to officers of the Corps of Engineers.

Under the act of 30th April last, authorizing the President to cause a survey to be made, with the necessary plans and estimates, of such roads and canals, as he might deem of national importance, in a commercial or military point of view, or for the transportation of the mail, a Board has been instituted, consisting of two distinguished officers of the Corps of Engineers, and a distinguished Civil Engineer, with assistants, who have been actively employed in carrying into effect the object of the act. They have carefully examined the route between the Potomac and the Ohio Rivers; between the latter and Lake Erie: between the Alleghany and the Susquehanna; and the routes between the Delaware and the Rariton, Barnstable and Buzzard's Bay, and between Boston Harbor and Narraganset Bay. Such portion of the corps of Topographical Engineers as could be spared from the survey of the coast, has been employed in surveying the very important route between the Potomac and the Ohio. Considerable progress has been made in it, but the survey cannot be completed until the next season. It is gratifying to add, from the view already taken, that there is good cause to believe, that this great national object may be fully accomplished.

It is contemplated to commence early in the next season, the execution of the other branch of the act, that which relates to roads, and with the survey of a route from this city, through the Southern States, to New Orleans, the importance of which cannot be too highly estimated. All the officers of both the corps of Engineers, who could be spared from other services, have been employed in exploring and surveying the routes for canals. To digest a plan for both objects, for the great purposes specified, will require a thorough knowledge of every part of our Union, and of the relation of each part to the others, and of all to the seat of the General Government. For such a digest it will be necessary that the information be full, minute, and precise. With a view to these important objects, I submit to the consideration of Congress the propriety of enlarging both the corps of Engineers, the military and topographical. It need scarcely be remarked that the more extensively these corps are engaged in the improvement of their country, in the execution of the powers of Congress, and in aid of the States in such improvements as lie beyond that limit, when such aid is desired, the happier the effect will be in many views of which the subject is susceptible. By profiting of their science, the work will always be well executed; and by giving to the officers such employment, our Union will derive all the advantage in peace as well as in war, from their talents and services, which they can afford. In this mode, also, the military will be incorporated with the civil, and unfounded and injurious distinctions and prejudices, of every kind, be done away. To the corps themselves, this service cannot fail to be equally useful, since, by the knowledge they would thus acquire, they would be eminently better qualified, in the event of war, for the great purposes for which they were instituted.

Our relations with the Indian tribes within our limits, have not been materially changed during the year. The hostile disposition evinced by certain tribes on the Missouri during the last year, still continues and has extended, in some degree, to those on the Upper Mississippi and the upper Lakes. Several parties of our citizens have been plundered and murdered by those tribes. In order to establish relations of friendship with them, Congress, at the last session, made an appropriation for treaties with them, and for the employment of a suitable military escort to accompany and attend the Commissioners at the places appointed for the negotiations. This object has not been effected. The season was too far advanced when the appropriation was made, and the distance too great to permit it, but measures have been taken, and all the preparations will be completed, to accomplish it at an early period in the next season.

Believing that the hostility of the tribes, particularly on the upper Mississippi, and the Lakes, is in no small degree owing to the wars which are carried on between the tribes residing in that quarter, measures have been taken to bring about a general peace among them, which, if successful, will not only tend to the security of our citizens, but be of great advantage to the Indians themselves.

With the exception of the tribes referred to, our relations with all the others are on the same friendly footing, and it affords me great satisfaction to add, that they are making steady advances in civilization, and the improvement of their condition. Many of the tribes have already made great progress in the arts of civilized life. This desirable result has been brought about by the humane and persevering policy of the Government, and particularly by means of the appropriation for the civilization of the Indians. There have been established, under the provisions of this act, thirty-two schools, containing nine hundred and sixteen scholars, who are well instructed in several branches of literature, and likewise in agriculture, and the ordinary arts of life.

Under the appropriation to authorize treaties with the Creeks, and Quapaw Indians, Commissioners have been appointed, and negotiations are now pending, but the result is not yet known.

For more full information respecting the principle which has been adopted for carrying into effect the act of Congress authorizing surveys, with plans and estimates, for canals and roads, and on every other branch of duty incident to the Department of War, I refer you to the Report of the Secretary.

The squadron in the Mediterranean has been maintained in the extent which was proposed in the Report of the Secretary of the Navy of the last year, and has afforded to our commerce the necessary protection in that sea. Apprehending, however, that the unfriendly relations which have existed between Algiers and some of the powers of Europe, might be extended to us, it has been thought expedient to augment the force there, and, in consequence, the "North Carolina," a ship of the line, has been prepared, and will sail in a few days to join it.

The force employed in the Gulf of Mexico, and in the neighboring seas, for the suppression of piracy, has likewise been preserved essentially in the state in which it was during the last year. A persevering effort has been made for the accomplishment of that object, and much protection has thereby been afforded to our commerce, but still the practice is far from being suppressed. From every view which has been taken of the subject, it is thought that it will be necessary rather to augment than to diminish our force in that quarter. There is reason to believe that the piracies now complained of, are committed by bands of robbers who inhabit the land, and who, by preserving good intelligence with the towns, and seizing favorable opportunities, rush forth and fall on unprotected merchant vessels, of which they make an easy prey. The pillage thus taken, they carry to their lurking places, and dispose of afterwards, at prices tending to seduce the neighboring population. This combination is understood to be of great extent; and is the more to be deprecated, because the crime of piracy is often attended with the murder of the crews, these robbers knowing, if any survived, their lurking places would be exposed, and they be caught and punished. That this atrocious practice should be carried to such extent, is cause of equal surprise and regret. It is presumed that it must be attributed to the relaxed and feeble state of the local Governments, since it is not doubted, from the high character of the Governor of Cuba, who is well known and much respected here, that if he had the power, he would promptly suppress it. Whether those robbers should be pursued on the land, the local authorities be made responsible for these atrocities, or any other measure be resorted to, to suppress them, is submitted to the consideration of Congress.

In execution of the laws for the suppression of the slave trade, a vessel has been occasionally sent from that squadron to the coast of Africa, with orders to return thence by the usual track of the slave ships, and to seize any of our vessels which might be engaged in that trade. None have been found, and, it is believed, that none are thus employed. It is well known, however, that the trade still exists under other flags.

The health of our squadron while at Thompson's Island, has been much better during the present, than it was the last season. Some improvements have been made, and others are contemplated there, which, it is believed, will have a very salutary effect.

On the Pacific, our commerce has much increased, and on that coast, as well as on that sea, the United States have many important interests which require attention and protection. It is thought that all the considerations which suggested the expediency of placing a squadron on that sea, operate with augmented force, for maintaining it there at least in an equal extent.

For detailed information respecting the state of our maritime force, on each sea, the improvement necessary to be made on either, in the organization of the Naval Establishment, generally, and of the laws for its better government, I refer you to the Report of the Secretary of the Navy, which is herewith communicated.

The revenue of the Post Office Department has received a considerable augmentation in the present year. The current receipts will exceed the expenditures, although the transportation of the mail, within the year, has been much increased. A Report of the Postmaster General, which is transmitted, will furnish, in detail, the necessary information respecting the administration and present state of this Department.

In conformity with a resolution of Congress, of the last Session, an invitation was given to General Lafayette to visit the United States, with an assurance that a ship of war should attend at any port of France which he might designate, to receive and convey him across the Atlantic, whenever it might be convenient for him to sail. He declined the offer of the public ship, from motives of delicacy, but assured me that he had long intended, and would certainly visit our Union, in the course of the present year. In August last he arrived at New York, where he was received with the warmth of affection and gratitude to which his very important and disinterested services and sacrifices, in our Revolutionary struggle, so eminently entitled him. A corresponding sentiment has since been manifested, in his favor, throughout every portion of our Union, and affectionate invitations have been given him to extend his visits to them. To these he has yielded all the accommodation in his power. At every designated point of rendezvous, the whole population of the neighboring country has been assembled to greet him, among whom it has excited, in a peculiar manner, the sensibility of all, to behold the surviving members of our Revolutionary contest, civil and military, who had shared with him in the toils and dangers of the war, many of them in a decrepit state. A more interesting spectacle, it is believed, was never witnessed, because none could be founded on purer principles—none proceed from higher or more disinterested motives. That the feelings of those who had fought and bled with him, in a common cause, should have been much excited, was natural. There are, however, circumstances attending these interviews which pervaded the whole community, and touched the breasts of every age, even the youngest among us. There was not an individual present who had not some relative who had not partaken in those scenes, nor an infant who had not heard the relation of them. But the circumstance which was most sensibly felt, and which his presence brought forcibly to the recollection of all, was the great cause in which we were engaged, and the blessings which we have derived from our success in it. The struggle was for independence and liberty, public and personal, and in this we succeeded. The meeting with one who had borne so distinguished a part in that great struggle, and from such lofty and disinterested motives, could not fail to affect, profoundly, every individual, and of every age. It is natural that we should all take a deep interest in his future welfare, as we do. His high claims on our Union are felt, and the sentiment universal, that they should be met in a generous spirit. Under these impressions, I invite your attention to the subject, with a view that, regarding his very important services, losses, and sacrifices, a provision may be made, and tendered to him, which shall correspond with the sentiments, and be worthy the character, of the American people.

In turning our attention to the condition of the civilized world, in which the United States have always taken a deep interest, it is gratifying to see how large a portion of it is blessed with peace. The only wars which now exist within that limit, are those between Turkey and Greece, in Europe, and between Spain and the new Governments, our neighbors, in this hemisphere. In both these wars, the cause of independence, of liberty, and humanity, continues to prevail. The success of Greece, when the relative population of the contending parties is considered, commands our admiration and applause, and that it has had a similar effect with the neighboring powers, is obvious. The feeling of the whole civilized world is excited, in a high degree, in their favor. May we not hope that these sentiments, winning on the hearts of their respective Governments, may lead to a more decisive result? that they may produce an accord among them, to replace Greece on the ground which she formerly held, and to which her heroic exertions, at this day, so eminently entitle her?

President's Message.

[SENATE.]

With respect to the contest, to which our neighbors are a party, it is evident that Spain, as a power, is scarcely felt in it. These new States had completely achieved their independence, before it was acknowledged by the United States, and they have since maintained it, with little foreign pressure. The disturbances which have appeared in certain portions of that vast territory, have proceeded from internal causes, which had their origin in their former governments, and have not yet been thoroughly removed. It is manifest that these causes are daily losing their effect, and that these new States are settling down under governments elective and representative in every branch, similar to our own. In this course we ardently wish them to persevere, under a firm conviction that it will promote their happiness. In this their career, however, we have not interfered, believing that every people have a right to institute for themselves the government, which, in their judgment, may suit them best. Our example is before them, of the good effect of which, being our neighbors, they are competent judges, and to their judgment we leave it, in the expectation that other powers will pursue the same policy. The deep interest which we take in their independence, which we have acknowledged, and in their enjoyment of all the rights incident thereto, especially in the very important one of instituting their own governments, has been declared and is known to the world. Separated as we are from Europe by the great Atlantic Ocean, we can have no concern in the wars of the European Governments, nor in the causes which produce them. The balance of power between them, into whichever scale it may turn in its various vibrations, cannot affect us. It is the interest of the United States to preserve the most friendly relations with every power, and on conditions fair, equal, and applicable to all. But, in regard to our neighbors our situation is different. It is impossible for the European Governments to interfere in their concerns, especially in those alluded to, which are vital, without affecting us; indeed, the motive which might induce such interference in the present state of the war between the parties, if a war it may be called, would appear to be equally applicable to us. It is gratifying to know that some of the powers with whom we enjoy a very friendly intercourse, and to whom these views have been communicated, have appeared to acquiesce in them.

The augmentation of our population, with the expansion of our Union, and increased number of States, have produced effects in certain branches of our system, which merit the attention of Congress. Some of our arrangements, and particularly the Judiciary Establishment, were made with a view to the original thirteen States only. Since then the United States have acquired a vast extent of territory; eleven new States have been admitted into the Union, and territories have been laid off for three others, which will likewise be admitted at no distant day. An organization of the Supreme Court, which assigns to the judges any portion of the duties which belong to the inferior, requiring their passage over so vast a space, under any distribution of the States that may now be made, if not impracticable in the execution, must render it impossible for them to discharge the duties of either branch with advantage to the Union. The duties of the Supreme Court would be of great importance, if its decisions were confined to the ordinary limits of other tribunals; but when it is considered that this court decides, and in the last resort, on all the great questions which arise under our constitution, involving those between the United States, individually, between the States and the United States, and between the latter and foreign powers, too high an estimate of their importance cannot be formed. The great interests of the nation seem to require, that the Judges of the Supreme Court should be exempted from every other duty, than those which are incident to that high trust. The organization of the inferior courts would, of course, be adapted to circumstances. It is presumed that such a one might be formed, as would secure an able and faithful discharge of their duties, and without any material augmentation of expense.

The condition of the Aborigines within our limits, and especially those who are within the limits of any of the States, merits likewise particular attention. Experience has shown, that, unless the tribes be civilized, they can never be incorporated into our system, in any form whatever. It has likewise shown, that, in the regular augmentation of our population, with the extension of our settlements, their situation will become deplorable, if their extinction is not menaced. Some well-digested plan, which will rescue them from such calamities, is due to their rights, to the rights of humanity, and to the honor of the nation. Their civilization is indispensable to their safety; and this can be accomplished only by degrees. The process must commence with the infant State, through whom some effect may be wrought on the parental. Difficulties of the most serious character present themselves to the attainment of this very desirable result, on the territory on which they now reside. To remove them from it by force, even with a view to their own security and happiness, would be revolting to humanity, and utterly unjustifiable. Between the limits of our present States and territories, and the Rocky Mountain and Mexico, there is a vast territory, to which they might be invited, with inducements which might be successful. It is thought if that territory should be divided into Districts, by previous agreement with the tribes now resident there, and civil governments be established in each, with schools, for every branch of instruction in literature, and the arts of civilized life, that all the tribes now within our limits might gradually be drawn there. The execution of this plan would necessarily be attended with expense, and that not inconsiderable, but it is doubted whether any other can be devised which would be less liable to that objection, or more likely to succeed.

In looking to the interests which the United States have on the Pacific Ocean, and on the western coast of this Continent, the propriety of establishing a military post at the mouth of Columbia River, or at some other point in that quarter, within our acknowledged limits, is submitted to the consideration of Congress. Our commerce and fisheries on that sea, and along the coast, have much increased, and are increasing. It is thought that a military post, to which our ships of war might resort, would afford protection to every interest, and have a tendency to conciliate the tribes to the north-west, with whom our trade is extensive. It is thought, also, that, by the establishment of such a post, the intercourse between our Western States and territories, and the Pacific, and our trade with the tribes residing in the interior, on each side of the Rocky Mountain, would be essentially promoted. To carry this object into effect, the appropriation of an adequate sum to authorize the employment of a frigate, with an officer of the corps of engineers, to explore the mouth of the Columbia River, and the coast contiguous thereto, to enable the Executive to make such establishment at the most suitable point, is recommended to Congress.

It is thought that attention is also due to the improvement of this city. The communication between the public buildings, and in various other parts, and the grounds around those buildings, require it. It is presumed also, that the completion of the canal, from the Tiber to the Eastern Branch, would have a very salutary effect. Great exertions have been made, and expenses incurred, by the citizens, in improvements of various kinds; but those which are suggested, belong exclusively to the Government, or are of a nature to require expenditures beyond their resources. The public lots which are still for sale, would, it is not doubted, be more than adequate to these purposes.

From the view above presented, it is manifest, that the situation of the United States is, in the highest degree, prosperous and happy. There is no object which, as a people, we can desire, which we do not possess, or which is not within our reach. Blessed with governments the happiest which the world ever knew, with no distinct orders in society, or divided interests in the vast territory over which their dominion extends, we have every motive to cling together, which can animate a virtuous and enlightened people. The great object is to preserve those blessings, and to hand them down to the latest posterity. Our experience ought to satisfy us, that our progress, under the most correct and provident policy, will not be exempt from danger. Our institutions form an important epoch in the history of the civilized world. On their preservation, and in their utmost purity, every thing will depend. Extending, as our interests do, to every part of the inhabited globe, and to every sea, to which our citizens are carried by their industry and enterprise, to which they are invited by the wants of others, and have a right to go, we must either protect them in the enjoyment of their rights, or abandon them, in certain events, to waste and desolation. Our attitude is highly interesting as relates to other powers, and particularly to our Southern neighbors. We have duties to perform with respect to all, to which we must be faithful. To every kind of danger we should pay the most vigilant and unceasing attention; remove the cause when practicable: and be prepared to meet it when inevitable.

Against foreign danger, the policy of the Government seems to be already settled. The events of the late war admonished us to make our maritime frontier impregnable, by a well-digested chain of fortifications, and to give efficient protection to our commerce, by augmenting our Navy to a certain extent; which has been steadily pursued, and which it is incumbent upon us to complete, as soon as circumstances will permit. In the event of war, it is on the maritime frontier that we shall be assailed. It is in that quarter, therefore, that we should be prepared to meet the attack. It is there that our whole force will be called into action, to prevent the destruction of our towns, and the desolation and pillage of the interior. To give full effect to this policy, great improvements will be indispensable. Access to those works, by every practicable communication, should be made easy, and in every direction. The intercourse, also, between every part of our Union, should also be promoted, and facilitated by the exercise of those powers, which may comport with a faithful regard to the great principles of our constitution. With respect to internal causes, those great principles point out, with equal certainty, the policy to be pursued. Resting on the people, as our governments do, State and National, with well-defined powers, it is of the highest importance that they, severally, keep within the limits prescribed to them. Fulfilling that sacred duty, it is of equal importance, the movement between them be harmonious; and in case of any disagreement, should such occur, that a calm appeal be made to the people; and that their voice be heard, and promptly obeyed. Both Governments being instituted for the common good, they cannot fail to prosper, while those who made them are attentive to the conduct of their representatives, and control their measures. In the pursuit of these great objects, let a generous spirit, and national views and feelings be indulged; and let every part recollect, that, by cherishing that spirit, and improving the condition of the others, in what relates to their welfare, the general interest will not only be promoted, but the local advantage reciprocated, by all.

I cannot conclude this communication, the last of the kind which I shall have to make, without recollecting, with great sensibility and heartfelt gratitude, the many instances of the public confidence, and the generous support which I have received from my fellow-citizens in the various trusts with which I have been honored. Having commenced my service in early youth, and continued it since with few and short intervals, I have witnessed the great difficulties to which our Union has been exposed, and admired the virtue and courage with which they were surmounted. From the present prosperous and happy state, I derive a gratification which I cannot express. That these blessings may be preserved and perpetuated, will be the object of my fervent and unceasing prayers to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe. JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, December 7, 1824.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, it was Ordered, That three thousand copies of the Message be printed for the use of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, it was Ordered, That fifteen hundred copies of the documents accompanying said Message be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, December 8.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Joint Committee appointed to consider and report what respectful mode it may be proper for Congress to adopt to receive General LAFAYETTE, made the following report:

DECEMBER, 1824.]

Gratitude to Lafayette.

[SENATE.]

"The Joint Committee propose that each House adopt its own manner of receiving General LAFAYETTE.

"The Committee on the part of the Senate recommend that the President of the Senate invite General LAFAYETTE to take a seat, such as he shall designate, in the Senate Chamber: that the committee deliver the invitation to the General, and introduce him into the Senate, and the members receive the General standing."

In delivering this report, Mr. BARBOUR stated that the Joint Committee, entertaining every wish to make the reception of General LAFAYETTE as complimentary as possible, yet found difficulties in the way of any arrangement for a joint proceeding, which were not easily removable; and it was therefore thought by the committee best for each House to adopt its own arrangements, and its own form, in the reception of that distinguished individual.

It was resolved, unanimously, That the Senate do concur in the report.

THURSDAY, December 9.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the committee appointed to perform that duty, reported that they had waited on General LAFAYETTE, with the invitation of the Senate, and that he had informed them he would wait on the Senate this day at one o'clock.

At one o'clock, General LAFAYETTE entered the Chamber of the Senate, accompanied by the committee of that body. On entering the bar, Mr. BARBOUR, chairman of the committee, announced the presence of the General, in the following words: "We introduce General LAFAYETTE to the Senate of the United States;" whereupon, the President of the Senate and the Senators rose from their seats, and the General, advancing towards the Chair of the Senate, was invited by the President to take a seat, prepared for him on the right of the Chair.

Soon after the General was seated,

Mr. BARBOUR moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LLOYD, of Mass., concurred in the wish for the Senate to adjourn, to afford the members an opportunity of paying their individual respects to Gen. LAFAYETTE.

The Senate then adjourned, and the Senators, individually, beginning with the President of the Senate, tendered him their respects, which were cordially and feelingly reciprocated.

TUESDAY, December 14.

Inland Trade between Missouri and Santa Fe, of New Mexico.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of the state of Missouri, on the subject of a trade and intercourse between that State and the internal Provinces of Mexico.

[This petition recited, that a beneficial trade had been carried on for some years between the inhabitants of the two countries, in which domestic cottons and other articles had been carried out from the United States, and gold, silver, furs, and mules, brought back in return; that the intervening tribes of Indians presented the only obstacle to the successful prosecution of the trade upon a large scale; that the merchandise had to be carried through a tract of country inhabited by different tribes, to enter whose territory, without a license, was penal under the laws of the United States, and dangerous, unless the consent of the tribes was previously obtained: that some outrages to persons, and repeated depredations on property, had already been committed; and that a total interruption to the commercial and social intercourse, so happily begun in that quarter between the citizens of the two Republics, might be apprehended, unless the Government of the United States interposed for its protection. The petition, therefore, prayed—

1. That the right of an unmolested passage, for persons and property, upon a designated route, between the frontiers of Missouri and the internal provinces of Mexico, might be obtained by treaty stipulations from the Indians referred to.

2. That a military post and an Indian agency might be established on the Arkansas River, at the point of the intersection of that river by the proposed route.]

The petition, upon the motion of Mr. BENTON, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MONDAY, December 20.

General Lafayette.

Mr. HAYNE, from the committee to whom for was referred the subject of making provision Gen. LAFAYETTE, reported the following bill:

"A BILL making provision for General Lafayette.

"Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of two hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, granted to Major General Lafayette, in compensation for his important services and expenditures during the American Revolution, and that, for this purpose, a stock to that amount be issued in his favor, dated the 4th of July, 1824, bearing an annual interest of six per cent., payable quarter yearly, and redeemable on the 31st December, 1834.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That one complete and entire Township of Land be, and the same is hereby, granted to the said Major General Lafayette, and that the President of the United States be authorized to cause the said Township to be located on any of the Public Lands which remain unsold, and that patents be issued to General Lafayette for the same.

The bill was twice read, by general consent, and Mr. HAYNE gave notice that he should move its third reading to-morrow.

TUESDAY, December 21.

Gratitude to Lafayette.

The Senate then, according to the order of the day, took up the bill making provision for General LAFAYETTE; and, no amendment being proposed thereto, the question was about to be put on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. MAÇON rose. It was with painful reluctance, he said, that he felt himself obliged to oppose his voice to the passage of this bill. He admitted, to the full extent claimed for them, the great and meritorious services of General Lafayette, and he did not object to the precise sum which this bill proposed to award him; but he objected to the bill on this ground: he considered General Lafayette, to all intents and purposes, as having been, during our Revolution, a son, adopted into the family, taken into the household, and placed, in every respect, on the same footing with the other sons of the same family. To treat him as others were treated, was all, in this view of his relation to us, that could be required, and this had been done. That General Lafayette made great sacrifices and spent much of his money in the service of this country, said Mr. M., I as firmly believe as I do any other thing under the sun; I have no doubt that every faculty of his mind and body were exerted in the Revolutionary war, in defence of this country; but this was equally the case with all the sons of the family. Many native Americans spent their all, made great sacrifices, and devoted their lives in the same cause. This was the ground of his objection to this bill, which, he repeated, it was as disagreeable to him to state as it could be to the Senate to hear. He did not mean to take up the time of the Senate in debate upon the principle of the bill, or to move any amendment to it. He admitted that, when such things were done, they should be done with a free hand. It was to the principle of the bill, therefore, and not to the sum proposed to be given by it, that he objected. With regard to the details of the bill, however, he was rather of the opinion that it would have been better to have given so much money, which we have in the treasury, than to have given stock to the amount.

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, said that this bill purported to give a compensation to General Lafayette for services rendered. He should like to know what evidence had induced the committee to suppose that the amount proposed was the proper amount of compensation. He should like to know how far the proposed appropriation was grounded on claims for services or for expenditure. He should, indeed, like to see the phraseology of the bill changed. He should like to have the bill recommitted, also, for another and a peculiar season. As it proposed to raise money by a loan, he doubted whether that provision of the bill was not invading the peculiar privilege of the House of Representatives. Under the influence of these considerations, he moved to recommit the bill.

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, said he had entertained the hope that this bill would have given rise to no discussion; and if no other objection had been made to it than that of his friend, (Mr. MAÇON,) who was opposed, upon principle, to making an appropriation in any case, or under any circumstances, by way of compensation for losses and services in the public cause, he did not know that he should now have risen. But the objection of the gentleman from Ohio, made it his duty to submit, as briefly as possible, his views of this question. He trusted, he said, that he should be able to satisfy the Senate, and to satisfy even the scruples of the gentleman himself, that there was no occasion at this time to recommit the bill. The objection of his friend on his right (Mr. MAÇON) went to the root of the bill; for, Mr. H. said, he understood that gentleman to say that, though an individual might have spent his substance in the service of his country, and put his hand into his pocket and paid out money for its use, that money should not be refunded to him by the Government. All this, said Mr. H., I shall be able to show that General Lafayette has done, and that the adoption of the measure now proposed will be not only an act of justice to him, but a duty which we owe to ourselves. Mr. H. said he held in his hands documents which he had not intended to submit to the Senate, because he had already submitted them very generally to the private inspection of the members; but, called upon, as he now was, he felt it to be his duty, to present them publicly to the Senate. Mr. H. then submitted a statement, founded on a document which had been received from France by a member of the Senate, from which it appeared that, when General Lafayette embarked for America, in 1777, he possessed an income of 146,000 francs, about $28,700—an income which, it is well known, had been reduced by his losses and sacrifices in the cause of liberty throughout the world, to a very small sum.

It also appeared, from the same document, that, during six years, from 1777 to 1783, the General had expended in the American service, 700,000 francs, equal to 140,000 dollars. Mr. H. adverted to further sacrifices which the General had made in the cause of liberty, as established by this document; but the only fact in it to which he wished particularly to draw the attention of the Senate, was, that he sacrificed, more than forty years ago, one hundred and forty thousand dollars of his private fortune in the service of this country. And how was this sacrifice made? Under what circumstances? Was he one of our own citizens,—one of those whose lives and fortunes were necessarily exposed during the vicissitudes of a contest for the right of self-government? No, sir, said Mr. H., no such thing. If he had been a native American, and had lost his whole estate by the war, he would have incurred a misfortune to which all his fellow-citizens were liable in common with himself. But he was in the enjoyment of rank and fortune in his own country, cheered by the smiles of his sovereign, and rich in the treasures of domestic joy. And yet he tore himself away from his country and his home, to fight the battles of freedom in a foreign land, and to make common cause with a people to whom he owed no duty—a people then engaged in a contest considered almost hopeless. Nor was he satisfied with the devotion of his personal services. He equipped and armed a regiment at his own proper charge, and came here with a vessel freighted with arms and munitions of war, which he distributed gratuitously among your people. And it is a matter of record on the pages of your history, that he put shoes on the feet of your barefoot and suffering soldiery. For these services he asked no recompense—he received none. He spent his fortune for you; he shed his blood for you; and without acquiring any thing but a claim upon your gratitude, he impoverished himself. And what, in recompense, has this Government done for him? It was not until the year 1794, that they gave to him the full pay, without interest, which he was entitled to have received twelve or fourteen years before. Did they then attempt to remunerate him for the service, other than military, which the gallant General had rendered to the country? No, sir. But, if an American citizen had put his hand into his pocket, equipped a regiment for the service of his country, clothed its nakedness, and put shoes upon their bleeding feet, would he not have been entitled to compensation for such expenditure? Sir, if we were to resort to a calculation of pounds, shillings, and pence; if we were to draw up an account-current with General Lafayette, the balance in his favor would far exceed the amount which by this bill it is proposed to appropriate. But this, Mr. H. said, was not the ground on which he was disposed to rest the measure. He would appeal to higher and more generous considerations. It is not that an account is to be settled, but a debt of gratitude is to be acknowledged—a debt which can never be discharged.

Gratitude to Lafayette.

Mr. H. stated that there was an incident in the life of General Lafayette, which was explained by the documents which he held in his hand, and which presented his conduct in such a delightful point of view, that he could not refrain from bringing it to the view of the Senate, though he should not found upon it any claim for remuneration for the sacrifices which the General had incurred on the occasion alluded to. It would be recollected that, in March, 1803, Congress made a grant of 11,520 acres of land to Gen. Lafayette. In the year following, he was authorized to locate his warrant on any vacant land in the territory of Orleans; and, on the 7th April, 1806, his agent in this country did locate a tract of 1,000 acres vacant land adjoining the city of New Orleans. On the 2d March, 1807, Congress, without advertent to this location in behalf of the General, and, indeed, wholly unconscious of the fact that it had been made, granted to the Corporation of the city of New Orleans a space of six hundred yards around the fortifications of the city, including a valuable portion of the very land which had been previously entered by the General. He was immediately informed of the fact; it was stated to him that his right to this land was unquestionable; and Mr. H. held in his hand a statement made by an eminent lawyer and jurist, now a member of the other House, showing that a legal opinion was forwarded, assuring the General that, in a contest with the city of New Orleans, he must succeed. Another document which Mr. Hayne had obtained from a different source, stated that the value of the land had even then been discovered, and that $50,000 could have been obtained for the General's title to it. And what was the conduct of Lafayette on being informed of these facts? He promptly, and without hesitation, communicated to his agent "that he would not consent even to inquire into the validity of his title; that he could not think of entering into litigation with any public body in the United States; that the property had been gratuitously bestowed upon him by the United States, and it was with them to say what had been given;" and he accompanied these declarations by a positive direction to his agent to relinquish his entry, and to make a location elsewhere. This has been done, and the certificate from the Land Office proves, that the land substituted for that which has been lost, is of very inconsiderable value. General Lafayette, however, did not stop here. He had been induced to dispose of a part of his interest in this land to an Irish baronet, Sir Josiah Coghill. His contract with this gentleman created, of course, much embarrassment to him, but the General only considered that it might also embarrass the Government of the United States. He made an appeal to that gentleman, who, with a liberality worthy of all praise, agreed to relinquish his claims to the land in question, and accepted a claim on other lands in satisfaction for them. Lafayette stopped not even here; he was not satisfied while any thing remained to be done. I have myself, said Mr. H., seen and examined on file, in the Land Office, this deed of relinquishment, deposited there by General Lafayette, himself, to secure the Government from all future difficulty. It only remains for me, said Mr. H., to add, that on a portion of the land thus generously relinquished, now stands a valuable part of the city of New Orleans, valued by gentlemen well acquainted with it, (according to estimates now before him,) at from four to five hundred thousand dollars.

It is perfectly immaterial, said Mr. H., to inquire, whether some legal difficulty might not have existed in establishing the General's title. Nothing but a judicial investigation could have settled the rights of the parties; and, as the General has relinquished his claim, and has never, at any time, claimed indemnity, that investigation would now be useless. But, the point on which he delighted to dwell, was the magnanimity, the refinement of feeling, the noble delicacy of sentiment, which prompted the General at once to abandon his claims, to refuse even to inquire into them, and, wholly regardless of his own interests, to look only to the interests of our country.

But there are still grounds almost as strong as its equity and justice, said Mr. H., upon which this claim may be placed. According even to precedent, if precedents were consulted in such a case, the Government would be bound to recompense the services of Lafayette. Do gentlemen doubt upon this point, I could refer to numerous instances of legislation upon the same principles on which this bill depends. Mr. H. here referred to several: to the act making compensation for the "sacrifices and services" of Baron Steuben; to that which appropriates, in the language of this bill, "an entire township of land" for a recompense to Arnold Henry Dohrman, for similar services; to the act making provision for the daughters of Count de Grasse; and to that providing for the widow of Alexander Hamilton.

But, Mr. H. said, he would not rely upon precedent for a justification of this measure. When the government of a nation consults the dictates of justice, and obeys the impulse of noble sentiments, it does what contributes to the glory and interest of the people. Neither was there any danger to be apprehended on the score of precedent, from the passage of this bill. Can this bill, said he, ever be drawn into precedent? Can such a case as Lafayette's ever again occur? Can the nation be born again? Can it assume a second childhood? Can it ever be reduced to a state of such poverty as to require similar services? And, if this nation could be shorn of its power; be reduced to extreme distress by a second struggle for its independence; and, in the winter of its fortunes should be anxiously looking for succor, in arms, in men, and in money; and, at such a crisis, a foreign nobleman, bound by no ties to us, should make a crusade in our behalf; embark himself and his fortunes in our cause; pour forth his treasures, shed his blood in our defence; and, whilst the scale of our destiny is in equipoise, throw himself into the balance; would you consider the example which you would set by this bill, as one which you ought not, in such a case, to follow? No, sir; the case before us is one of its own kind; it can never happen again; and if it could, the possibility of such a recurrence ought to constitute no objection to the proposed measure.

As to the objection which had been urged by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, on the details of the bill, Mr. H. would only observe, that it was impossible, in a measure of this nature, to meet the views of every gentleman. The committee had found that, while great unanimity prevailed among the members as to the thing to be done, much difference of opinion existed as to the best manner of doing it. He could only conjure gentlemen, therefore, who concurred in the principle, to come prepared to surrender their peculiar views in relation to the details. Some gentlemen prefer a grant of money; others stock; and others land. The committee had taken great pains to give to their propositions a form which should be, as far as possible, acceptable to all. Stock was preferred to money, because, while it was equal in value, and was always convertible into money, even at a premium, it would furnish a secure and certain income, which would render the veteran comfortable in the evening of his days, and smooth his path to the grave; and, being the last of our debts to be redeemed, would remain upon record as a standing monument of the gratitude of a free people. The donation of land had been introduced, partly from a hope that it might induce the settlement of the beloved family in our country. It would be a rich provision for the grandchildren of Lafayette. It was thought, moreover, it would add to the grace of the measure. Without being over much disposed to consult the opinions of Europe, it was important, as to its aspect abroad, that Congress should act upon this subject not only liberally, but gracefully. A thing of this sort, he might be allowed to add, to be well done, should be promptly done, and with unanimity. He entreated of gentlemen, therefore, who were favorable to the principle of the bill, to yield up the objections which they might feel to any part of the details, assuring them that much pains had been taken to adapt them to the prevailing sentiment of the members.

There is still another consideration, which had influence on the minds of the committee, and which Mr. HAYNE considered as not the least important connected with this subject. It is, that the provision to be made should not only be worthy of the distinguished person for whom it is intended, but that it should be worthy of the character of the nation—worthy of the American people. National character is national wealth; it gives a tone to the public sentiment and feeling, which add strength and energy to the country. Mr. H. was certainly not disposed to look abroad for a rule of conduct. He would not consult the mistaken opinion of foreign nations, when we had any great duty to perform. And yet it was highly desirable that we should always so act as to command the respect of the world. Now, what would be thought of us in Europe, if, after all that has passed, we should fail to make a generous and liberal provision for our venerable guest? We have, under circumstances calculated to give to the event great éclat, invited him to our shores. We have received him with the utmost enthusiasm. The people have everywhere greeted him in the warmest terms of gratitude and affection. The attention of the civilized world has been drawn to the event, as one even of national importance. It is unfortunately too well known that the object of our affectionate attachment has spent his fortune in the service of mankind, and that we ourselves have received a large portion of the wealth which he has never hesitated freely to surrender in the holy cause of freedom. Now what will be thought of us in Europe, and, what is much more important, how will we deserve to be thought of, if we send back our venerable guest without any more substantial proof of our gratitude, than vague expressions of regard? We will be accused (and he knew not how it could be said unjustly) of pretending to sentiments which we did not feel, and with paying substantial services with unmeaning professions of esteem. By bringing Lafayette to the United States, we place him in a new and extraordinary situation in society. We have connected him with our history. You have made him a spectacle for the world to gaze on. He cannot go back to France and become the private citizen he was when he left it. You have, by the universal homage of your hearts and tongues, made his house a shrine, to which every pilgrim of liberty, from every quarter of the world, will repair. At least, let him not, after this, want the means of giving welcome to the Americans who, whenever they visit the shores of France, will repair, in crowds, to his hospitable mansion, to testify their veneration to the illustrious compatriot of their fathers. Lafayette will be a connecting link between the old world and the new. By your voluntary act you have placed him in this extraordinary situation; and if, after all that has been done and said, we permit him to return home, without passing the bill on your table, we must suffer a loss of reputation at home and abroad, which time cannot repair. Mr. HAYNE concluded, by regretting that he had been compelled to say even thus much on the subject. He knew that in this House, as in the nation, there existed but one feeling of gratitude and affection for Lafayette. He knew that the bill would pass with more than usual unanimity, but he considered gentlemen, who had scruples on the score of precedent, or who objected to the details of the plan, as entitled to the explanations which he had attempted to give, of the views and opinions of the committee.

Mr. MACON rose to disclaim the belief that Gen. Lafayette had ever furnished any document, or made to any person any intimation whatever, on the subject of the measure now before the Senate. As for himself, Mr. M. said, he wished it to be understood that, in opposing this bill, he discharged what was to him a painful duty. His objection was not to the details, but to the principle of the bill, and the arguments of the gentleman had not satisfied him that the objection was not well-founded. Not that he had any doubt of the truth of the statements which had been made by the gentleman from South Carolina. With respect to Europe, Mr. M. said that he had no doubt that all the respect which had been shown to General Lafayette here, was unpleasant to the rulers of that country. On this side of the water, all were glad to see him; even the Tories who were yet living would be glad to see him. Among a nation of strangers to his person, General Lafayette could go nowhere in this country without meeting with friends. No hand, in any part of this country, touches his, but he may feel the heart's blood beat in its fingers. Mr. M. said he should regret it, if the South, when he goes there, should be behind any other part of the Union in their demonstrations of regard for this distinguished man. He did not believe they would be. Wherever he moves, among the mountains, or on the plains, he receives a heartfelt welcome. This, Mr. M. said, would sufficiently satisfy Europe, if any doubt remained on that point, what is the opinion which this country entertains of the services of Lafayette.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, entirely according in the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina, that whatever was done on this subject, if done, ought to be done quickly, moved that the bill should have its third reading this day.

The engrossed bill making provision for General Lafayette was accordingly read a third time: and the question being stated on its passage—

The yeas and nays were ordered, and were taken as follows:

YEAS. — Messrs. Barbour, Bouigny, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Dickerson, Eaton, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lloyd of Maryland, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Lowrie, McLean, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, Williams.

NAYS. — Messrs. Barton, Bell, Brown, Cobb, Macon, Noble, Ruggles.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 28.

General Lafayette.

The bill passed by the House of Representatives, "concerning General LAFAYETTE," was brought to the Senate for concurrence.

The bill was read the first time, and ordered to be read a second time; it was then, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, read a second time, without objection, and taken up in Committee of the Whole. No amendment or objection being made to the bill in Committee of the Whole, it was reported to the Senate, and, on the question of ordering the bill to a third reading, it was carried with but one audible dissenting voice.

The bill was then, on motion of Mr. SMITH, and by unanimous consent, read the third time, PASSED, nemine contradicente, and returned to the other House, with a message acquainting that House therewith.

THURSDAY, December 30.

Communication to Lafayette.

The resolution was received from the House of Representatives proposing a Joint Committee to wait on General Lafayette, and announce to him the passage of the act in his favor, and requesting his acceptance of the provision therein made for him.

The resolution was agreed to nem. con., and Messrs. SMITH, HAYNE, and BOULIGNY, were appointed by the Chair, the committee on the part of the Senate.

MONDAY, January 8, 1825.

Inland Trade between Missouri and Mexico.

Mr. BENTON rose, and stated to the Senate that he had received a paper which he took the liberty of presenting. It was a statement of facts in relation to the origin, present state and future prospects, of trade and intercourse between the valley of the Mississippi and the internal provinces of Mexico. Intending, for a year past, to bring this subject before the Senate, and to claim for it a share of the national protection, Mr. B. said that he had felt the necessity of resting his demand upon a solid foundation of facts. With this view, he had addressed himself, during the last summer, to many inhabitants of Missouri, who had been personally engaged in the trade; among others, to Mr. Augustus Storrs, late of New Hampshire, a gentleman of character and intelligence, every way capable of relating things as he saw them, and incapable of relating them otherwise. This gentleman had been one of a caravan of eighty persons, one hundred and fifty-six horses, and twenty-three wagons and carriages, which had made the expedition from Missouri to Santa Fé, (of New Mexico,) in the months of May and June last. His account was full of interest and novelty. It sounded like romance to hear of caravans of men, horses, and wagons, traversing with their merchandise the vast plain which lies between the Mississippi and the Rio del Norte. The story seemed better adapted to Asia than to North America. But, romantic as it might seem, the reality had already exceeded the visions of the wildest imagination. The journey to New Mexico, but lately deemed a chimerical project, had become an affair of ordinary occurrence. Santa Fé, but lately the Ultima Thule of American enterprise, was now considered as a stage only in the progress, or rather, a new point of departure to our invincible citizens. Instead of turning back from that point, the caravans broke up there, and the subdivisions branched off in different directions in search of new theatres for their enterprise. Some proceeded down the river to the Paso del Norte; some to the mines of Chihuahua and Durango, in the province of New Biscay; some to Sonora and Sinaloa, on the Gulf of California; and some, seeking new lines of communication with the Pacific, had undertaken to descend the western slope of our continent, through the unexplored regions of the Multnomah and Buenaventura. The fruit of these enterprises, for the present year, amounted to $190,000 in gold and silver bullion and coin, and precious furs; a sum considerable, in itself, in the commerce of an infant State, but chiefly deserving a statesman's notice as an earnest of what might be expected from a regulated and protected trade. The principal article given in exchange, is that of which we have the greatest abundance, and which has the peculiar advantage of making the circuit of the Union before it departs from the territories of the republic—cotton—which grows in the South, is manufactured in the North, and exported from the West. Mr. B. said that the attention of the Senate had already been drawn to this subject, and the Committee on Indian Affairs stood charged with an inquiry into the expediency of treating with the Indian tribes between Missouri and Mexico, for the right of a safe passage through their countries. The paper presented contained information essential to that committee. It contained precise information upon the route to be pursued, and the tribes to be conciliated. It contained, besides, authentic details upon the extent and value of the trade, and suggestions for its protection. It had been drawn up at his particular request, and in answer to queries proposed by him. He deemed it the fairest, safest, and most satisfactory manner of conveying to the Senate the body of facts on which he should rely, when the question of extending protection to this trade shall be called up for decision. He therefore moved, that the statement of Mr. Storrs might be printed for the use of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

General Lafayette.

Mr. SMITH, from the Joint Committee appointed to announce to General Lafayette the passage of the act in his favor, and to request his acceptance of the provision made for him, reported to the Senate the following copy of an address of the committee to the General, and his reply.

From the Joint Committee to General Lafayette.

GENERAL: We are a Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, charged with the office of informing you of the passage of an act, a copy of which we now present. You will perceive from this act, sir, that the two Houses of Congress, aware of the large pecuniary as well as other sacrifices which your long and arduous devotion to the cause of freedom has cost you, have deemed it their privilege to reimburse a portion of them, as having been incurred in part on account of the United States. The principles that have marked your character will not permit you to oppose any objection to the discharge of so much of the national obligation to you as admits of it. We are directed to express to you the confidence, as well as the request, of the two Houses, that you will, by an ac-

GENERAL LAFAYETTE'S REPLY.

Gentlemen of the Committee of both Houses of Congress:

The immense and unexpected gift, which, in addition to former and considerable bounties, it has pleased Congress to confer upon me, calls for the warmest acknowledgments of an old American soldier and adopted son of the United States—two titles dearer to my heart than all the treasures of the world.

However proud I am of every sort of obligation received from the people of the United States and their Representatives in Congress, the large extent of this benefaction might have created in my mind feelings of hesitation, not inconsistent, I hope, with those of the most grateful reverence. But the so very kind resolution of both Houses, delivered by you, gentlemen, in terms of equal kindness, precludes all other sentiments but those of the lively and profound gratitude of which, in respectfully accepting the munificent favor, I have the honor to beg you will be the organ.

Permit me, also, gentlemen, to join a tender of my affectionate personal thanks to the expression of the highest respect, with which I have the honor to be,

Your obedient servant,

LAFAYETTE.

Imprisonment for Debt.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill "to abolish imprisonment for debt,"

The first part of the first section of the bill being as follows:—"That no bail or security for the appearance of any defendant or defendants shall hereafter be required upon the service of the original, or meane process, issuing out of the Courts of the United States, in any action or suit whatever, founded on contract, express or implied, which shall be made or entered into after the 4th of July next, unless the plaintiff, or some other person, shall make oath or affirmation, before the clerk or officer attesting the said process, who is hereby empowered to administer the same, or before some other person authorized by law to administer oaths, that the defendant or defendants named in the process, are justly indebted to the plaintiff or plaintiffs in the sum claimed by him or them, and shall further make oath or affirmation, that he or they have reason to believe that the said defendant or defendants intend to remove from the State or Territory, or intend to leave the United States:"

Mr. TAZEWELL moved, for reasons which he assigned in some detail, to strike out the clause printed above in italics.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, deeming this proposition to affect, in a considerable degree, the principle of the bill, opposed it with much earnestness. Mr. VAN BUREN also opposed the amendment at some length.

Mr. TAZEWELL and Mr. MILLS severally supported the amendment at considerable length, as expedient and necessary, without any intention to impair the principle of the bill, or limit its scope more than the rights of creditors, as well as debtors, required.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, delivered at large his sentiments in support of the bill and against the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. TAZEWELL, it was decided as follows, by yeas and nays.

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Brown, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards, Elliott, Gaillard, Hayne, King of N. Y., Lloyd of Md., McIlvaine, Mills, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, and Tazewell—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Bouligny, Branch, Eaton, Findlay, Holmes of Me., Holmes of Miss., Jackson, Johnson of Ken., Johnston of Lou., Kelly, King of Ala., Lanman, Lloyd of Mass., Lowrie, McLean, Macon, Smith, Talbot, Thomas, Van Buren, and Williams—22.

The Senate being equally divided on the question, the motion to amend was of course lost.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and was agreed to, without a division.

Suppression of Piracy.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the several petitions on the subject of piracies were referred, made the following report, which was ordered to be printed:

"That our commerce for years has been harassed, and the lives of our citizens destroyed, by pirates issuing from the colonies of Spain, in the West Indies, is a fact derived not only from the message of the President, but is of universal notoriety. These outrages have been so long and so often repeated, and marked with such atrocious circumstances, that a detail of the particular cases would be as impracticable as unnecessary. Our Government, with a view to protect our citizens, has resorted to the means within their power, by stationing a naval force near the places where the pirates resort; a measure also pursued by other powers. Every effort, heretofore, has been unavailing, to put an end to these atrocities. These desperadoes, acquiring confidence from impunity, becoming more ferocious from habit, and multiplying by recruits from the most abandoned of other nations, threaten the most disastrous mischiefs, justly alarming to that highly valuable and most respectable portion of our fellow-citizens whose pursuits are on the high seas. It is manifest, as well from facts derived from other sources, as from the message of the President, that the continuance of this evil is ascribable to the asylum afforded the banditti in the colonies of Spain. The Government of the United States, cherishing the most amicable disposition towards Spain, has presented the subject with great earnestness to the Spanish Government, demanding reparation for the past, and security for the future. To these reiterated remonstrances, no answer was returned till very recently, and to this day, all that has been obtained is a promise of a satisfactory answer to the applications of the Government of the United States: although Spain has been solemnly warned, that, if she did not promptly acquit herself of her obligations to us on this subject, our Government would be constrained, from the nature of the outrages, to become its own avenger, and, availing itself of its own resources, protect the commerce and lives of the American citizens from destruction. In the same spirit of conciliation, an appeal has been made to the local authorities, accompanied with a request, that if, from weakness, they were unable to exterminate the hordes of banditti who took shelter from pursuit within their territories, that permission might be given our forces to pursue them on land. This has been denied, on the vain punctilio of national dignity. The posture in which Spain now stands is that of connivance in these injuries, or incapacity to prevent them. "A sovereign who refuses to cause reparation to be made of the damage caused by his subject, or to punish the guilty, or, in short, to deliver him up, renders himself an accomplice in the injury, and becomes responsible for it." If the committee were of opinion that the refusal, on the part of Spain, was wilful, and not the result of inability, they would, with a full view of all the consequences which the measure involves, at once recommend an appeal to the last resort of nations, against Spain, and all her dependencies. But, believing, as they do, that courtesy requires that her refusal to do us justice should be placed on the ground of inability—an inability resulting from causes which the committee intentionally forbear to enumerate, they content themselves with recommending only such measures as are believed to be indispensable effectually to reach the mischief. And hence, they beg leave to present a bill with suitable provisions for the end designed."

The bill was twice read, and, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, made the order of the day for Thursday next.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, (the same as that received in the other House on Friday,) respecting his accounts with, and disbursements for, the Government.

Mr. HAYNE moved that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. SMITH said, that this request of the President was with a view to collect all the information necessary to be acted on hereafter. He supposed that a committee would be appointed in the other House, and, as it was not to be acted on during the present session, he suggested the propriety of laying it on the table, to be taken up for disposition at a future day.

Mr. KELLY thought that, if a joint committee of the two Houses were arranged, it would be more fitting the subject; each House organizing a committee on the subject would be merely obstructing each other.

Mr. HAYNE said, that it was a parliamentary rule that one House could not know what the other was acting on, and that each House should act for itself, except in matters of great national importance, when they might invite a joint committee. Yet, he had no objection to the latter course. His object was in substance a joint committee—it was to investigate facts, to ascertain what was doing in the other House, and present the facts to this House. This object would be attained by referring the Message to a select committee of this House, and they would not be acting superfluously in collecting and arranging the facts. If the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. KELLY) wished for a joint committee, let it be so; but he thought that the Senate ought to act for itself—it was a peculiar case which would require great attention, and the facts elicited would be very important.

Mr. BARBOUR observed, that a subject of this kind was one which would require mature consideration, before it could be acted on. It was obvious, that, at present, some difference of opinion existed, which, at a future period, would, probably, not be the case. He, therefore, to give time for reflection, moved that the Message lay on the table, to be taken up hereafter.

This motion was agreed to.

THURSDAY, January 18.

Suppression of Piracy.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. Everett:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with two resolutions of the Senate, the first of the 21st and the second of the 23d December last, requesting information respecting the injuries which have been sustained by our citizens, by piratical depredations, and other details connected therewith, and requesting also information of the measures which have been adopted for the suppression of piracy, and whether, in the opinion of the Executive, it will not be necessary to adopt other means for the accomplishment of the object; and, in that event, what other means it will be most advisable to recur to, I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of State, and likewise a report from the Secretary of the Navy, with the documents referred to in each.

On the very important questions submitted to the Executive, as to the necessity of recurring to other more effectual means for the suppression of a practice so destructive of the lives and property of our citizens, I have to observe, that three expedients occur: one, by the pursuit of the offenders to the settled as well as the unsettled parts of the land and from whence they issue; another, by reprisal on the property of the inhabitants; and a third, by the blockade of the ports of those islands. It will be obvious that neither of these measures can be resorted to, in a spirit of amity with Spain, otherwise than in a firm belief that neither the Government of Spain, nor the government of either of the islands, has the power to suppress that atrocious practice, and that the United States interpose their aid for the accomplishment of an object which is of equal importance to them as well as to us. Acting on this principle, the facts which justify this proceeding being universally known and felt, by all engaged in commerce in that sea, it may fairly be presumed, that neither will the Government of Spain, nor the government of either of these islands, complain of a resort to either of those measures, or to all of them, should such resort be necessary. It is, therefore, suggested, that a power commensurate with either resource be granted to the Executive, to be exercised according to his discretion, and as circumstances may imperiously require. It is hoped that the manifestation of a policy so decisive will produce the happiest results; that it will rid these seas and this hemisphere of this practice. This hope is strengthened by the belief, that the Government of Spain, and the government of the islands, particularly of Cuba, whose chief is known here, will faithfully co-operate in such measures as may be necessary for the accomplishment of this very important object. To secure such co-operation, will be the earnest desire, and, of course, the zealous and persevering effort of the Executive.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, 13th January, 1825.

The Message was read, and, with the documents accompanying it, ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, January 17.

Imprisonment for Debt.

The engrossed bill "to abolish imprisonment for debt," was again read; and, on the question, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. VAN DYKE, of Delaware, rose, and addressed the Senate as follows: Having been a member of the committee charged with the consideration of this bill, I have candidly lent my aid to remove objections which applied to it, as introduced by the gentleman who has been its zealous advocate. The project now presented is preferable to that which received the sanction of this honorable body at the last session; but it still presents difficulties that are, in my judgment, insuperable. To abolish imprisonment for debt, is the declared object of this bill; and to effect it, we are urged to adopt and put in motion all the new machinery of this new system. New oaths, new trials, new proofs, and a strange commixture of law and equity, are the means to be used to accomplish this object. From the best consideration that I have been able to give the subject, I cannot assent to such an experiment. The administration of justice between creditor and debtor, as now practised, is plain and familiar; where this innovation may lead us, it may be difficult to state; but one thing is not to be disguised; the creditor will be met with new difficulties and accumulated expense in prosecuting a claim for a just debt. And whence do you obtain satisfactory evidence that it is necessary for the good of the nation, that such a system should be adopted? From what quarter of the country have you received a memorial suggesting such a plan as that proposed by this bill? I have heard of none; and my own observation and experience, within the limited circle of a few States, induces a belief that the dreadful picture of oppression which has been drawn, in vivid colors, by the advocates of the measure, is a creature of the imagination, and has no existence in real life. I boldly say, the original is not found in the Middle States, and gentlemen, in whom I place confidence, assure me that it will be sought in vain in other States. As a legislator, I do not perceive the necessity for this measure. I apprehend serious difficulties in executing the plan, and therefore feel constrained to vote against it. I ask the yeas and nays, that I may record my vote in opposition to the bill.

Mr. TAZEWELL said, his objection to the bill was, that its object was not to abolish imprisonment for debt in all, but only in certain particular cases therein described; that the cases to which the bill was not intended to apply, were those of contract, in the suits for the enforcement of which contracts bail had been originally required. In all such cases, the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum might still issue, even if this bill became a law. Now, said Mr. T., very many cases of contract broken, might, and must, be prosecuted, in courts of chancery only; and, according to the rules of proceeding in these courts, bail could not be required in any case therein instituted. The effect of the second section of the bill was, however, to prohibit the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, and all other process under which the body of the debtor might be taken in all cases of contract in which bail had not been originally required. The provisions of the bill, therefore, were inconsistent with its object. The case of a lost bond was referred to as fully illustrative of this position. There could be no reason assigned why the debtor by bond which was not lost, might be imprisoned to satisfy the judgment of a court of law rendered for the amount of his bond; and that the debtor, where bond was accidentally destroyed, should not be imprisoned to satisfy the decree of a court of equity for a like sum. In either case, the obligation upon the debtor, and the rights of the creditor, after the judgment at law, or the decree in equity, were the same, and the same means of enforcing these rights, and the performance of these duties, ought to be allowed in both. But, under this bill, a difference, said Mr. T., is created, for which I can see no good reason.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that he was called upon, in consequence of the objections made to the passage of the bill, by the two gentlemen from Delaware and Virginia, to vindicate the measure under consideration. It had been said, that we had not brought forward any cases of hardship which proved the necessity of this measure. Is it necessary to detain the Senate with the search after, and the reading of the jail records of the different States, or of the United States, to prove that he who has power in this respect will abuse it? Human nature was too well known to require him to illustrate the principle, that equal and just laws were required to exorcise the increase of inordinate passions. The jail records of several States, at the last session, had been adduced and relied upon to prove the necessity of this measure. The fact was established, and the fact can be established, that there are unreasonable and unjust creditors, as well as fraudulent debtors; the bill was intended to restrain the one and to detect the other. The case of the debtor recorded in Holy Writ, who was forgiven his whole debt, and the next moment put violent hands on his debtor, and cast him into prison, was recorded to illustrate the disposition of man, and to show what he has done and what he will always do, when vested with power. If the gentleman from Delaware had the patience of Job, that patience could be exhausted by a recital of cases in which the same cruel and unfeeling disposition was manifested, and by which the misery of thousands had been increased, without any corresponding benefit resulting from such a course.

Mr. VAN DYKE replied: It was not my intention, sir, said he, to enter at large into the discussion of the merits of this subject; nor shall I now do so. The few remarks which I submitted, were designed merely as an apology for requesting the yeas and nays on the final question, about to be taken. But, sir, it now becomes proper for me to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky. That gentleman, with his usual zeal, has argued as if the rejection of this bill by the Senate gave the creditor a power to imprison, at his will and pleasure, an honest but unfortunate debtor. If that were the question, there would probably be no voice lifted up within these walls against the bill. No man would be more willing than myself to abolish imprisonment for debt, on such conditions, and under such provisions, as should oblige the debtor to make a full disclosure and surrender of his property for the use of his creditors. Such a provision prevails in most of the States, and relieves debtors under State Court process. Humanity would bind the creditor; honesty and justice would constrain the debtor to assent to this proposition. I am not one of those who would expect a poor man to pay his debts by going to prison; but I have seen enough of man to believe that, with many, who have the means, it requires something beyond persuasion to make them pay their debts. If, then, I am asked whether it is just that a creditor should confine the person of his debtor, who has committed no fraud, and is unable to pay? I answer, No; such conduct would violate the common principles of humanity, and would justly fix a stigma on the character of him who should evince so merciless a disposition. But, if I am asked whether, under the idea of relieving an honest debtor, I am willing to adopt this system, by which a creditor who has loaned his money to a dishonest man, who, disregarding his promise, refused to restore it, though he has ample means to repay—shall be embarrassed in prosecuting his claim—be put to unnecessary expense, and be involved in endless litigation with such debtor? I answer, No. Those moral rules and precepts to which allusion has just been made, have no application to such a case; nor would I lend to such a debtor any facility to baffle his just creditor. But what does this bill require of every creditor against every debtor, before the debtor shall be put to the small inconvenience of giving bail, or, in plain language, entering into security, not for payment of the debt, but simply to appear and abide the judgment of the court? Read the first section—two oaths, in the first instance, must be taken by the creditor—first, he must swear to the amount of his debt; 2dly, that he has reason to believe the defendant intends to remove, &c. The first may generally be in the power of the plaintiff to do, satisfactorily; but the second is too indefinite, in my opinion, to be made the subject-matter of a solemn oath.

Sir, I have a repugnance to the multiplication of oaths unnecessarily, in the administration of justice. They are traps for men's consciences, and have a tendency to lessen the reverence which ought everywhere to prevail, for that all-important and solemn obligation. What man, regarding his reputation, and possessing the delicate feelings of an honorable mind, would feel at liberty to take that oath, under the penalty which must immediately follow? Read the following lines: "on the return of the writ, the defendant may contest the allegations of the oath, in such form as the court may prescribe," &c. The tables are now turned, and the plaintiff is immediately to be arraigned before the court by his debtor, for swearing to what the debtor says is untrue, and this issue is to be gravely tried before the court; and the plaintiff must then make out, by proof, that he had reason to believe, &c. If he fail to do so, the defendant triumphs in his discharge. Sir, it is mocking a creditor to invite him to enter the lists with a cunning, fraudulent debtor, on these terms. However strong the belief of the creditor, he would be unwilling to engage in such a contest; and the consequence would be, that the fraudulent debtor would escape from the suit without bail, and, at the end of it, laugh at the vexation of his creditor. This is the operation of a part of the machinery to be put in motion by the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt. Unless my optics deceive me, every part of the system will be found to operate against the just rights of creditors, and to involve them in litigation and expense. Thus, by the fourth section, even after judgment, if plaintiff shall make oath that he has ground to believe defendant has fraudulently concealed his property, another denial by defendant produces another trial; and if plaintiff fails to prove the allegation to the satisfaction of the jury, he must pay costs. These remarks on two sections of the bill, will, I trust, illustrate the proposition which I advanced, that the bill is calculated to embarrass creditors unnecessarily, and to involve them in new scenes of litigation with their debtors; and subject creditors to expense and cost, unprecedented in any court of justice in this happy country.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, said that he should oppose any bill that deprived any man in the United States of a right; but did not understand how this bill would have that effect. This bill would be well understood, and would be taken into consideration in all contracts made after the 4th of July next; therefore, he could not understand that any right was touched by the bill. The law gave notice, and all persons making contracts after the time fixed by the law, would do so with their eyes open. They would know the remedy they must apply, and, therefore, on this point, no difficulty could possibly occur. Everybody was agreed upon the abstract principle, that an honest man should not be imprisoned for debt, but objections were made to the details of this bill for its accomplishment. The real question, Mr. M. said, was, whether this bill was better than the existing system? The gentleman said that there were not many persecuting creditors; but if there were only ten in the nation, who thought they had a right to persecute, not to prosecute, he would endeavor to deprive them of that power. Creditors, somehow or other, generally contrived to find out the condition of debtors. There would be no more difficulty after this bill was passed, in ascertaining their condition, than there is now. No difficulty could, in his opinion, possibly arise. Mr. MACON concluded by saying, that he did not know what those, who were not professional men, were to do on this occasion, when the gentlemen of the bar differ in opinion on the subject of the details of the bill. For his part, approving of the principle of the bill, he should vote with those who were in its favor.

On the question, "Shall this bill pass?" the yeas and nays were then taken as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Bouigny, Branch, Eaton, Elliot, Findlay, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, Macon, Smith, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Van Buren—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Brown, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards, Gailard, Hayne, King of New York, Knight, Lloyd of Maryland, McLean, Mills, Noble, Palmer, Parrot, Ruggles, Seymour, Tazewell, Van Dyke—28.

So the bill was rejected.

TUESDAY, January 18.

Mr. FINDLAY presented the petition of William Brandt & Co., merchants of the town of Archangel, in Russia, owners of two vessels, and subjects of Russia, by S. Chew, of Philadelphia, their attorney in fact, praying that certain additional tonnage and discriminating duties paid into the custom-house, at New York, by their agent, on the said ships and their cargoes, may be refunded.

Mr. EATON objected to the petition being received, on the ground that the subject of another power was not permitted to approach Congress by petition. A foreigner who had any claim to bring forward against the United States, ought to apply to the Secretary of State, and if he believed that it was correct, but had no sufficient authority to act, then it should be brought before Congress; and this was the course the petitioner ought to have pursued.

Mr. FINDLAY, in answer, observed that, although the constitution only recognized the right of petitioning in citizens, yet there was nothing prohibiting receiving petitions from foreigners. There was at this time a bill on the table, granting the benefit of the patent laws to an alien; and, if petitions of one kind were received from aliens, and others rejected, he did not see how the distinction was to be made. Must a committee be formed for the purpose? This petitioner had been informed by the Secretary of the Treasury, there was no other remedy but to apply to Congress. A similar petition had been received last year, but had not been acted on for want of time—and why was it to be rejected this year?

Mr. KING, of New York, said that the Government of this country was for the people of this country; and if foreigners had any communication to make, the minister or consul of their nation, was the proper person from whom it was to come. With regard to the case mentioned, in which the patent law had been extended to an alien, that application might be made by any gentleman whatever. The intercourse between Russia and this country was through the Executive power. He wished to know if it was customary for Americans to go to England, and present petitions there? No. They could not be sustained for a moment there.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, recollected one such case, and a very recent one too. A citizen of the United States, General Boyd, applied to the British Parliament, by petition, for relief, for a certain cargo which had been confiscated at the Cape of Good Hope. Much discussion took place on the subject, but finally a bill passed Parliament for his relief, and he received a considerable sum of money. The General was not a British subject. He was an American citizen, and fought in the Revolutionary war. They often heard of petitions from foreigners; and if the statement of these petitioners was found correct, he did not see why they should not be relieved.

Mr. SMITH did not recollect any case directly in point. The Secretary of the Treasury might have given the advice mentioned by the petitioner, and he was not at all wrong in so doing. The money had been paid into the Treasury, and, if so, could not be returned to the petitioners by any authority of the President or officers of the Government. An act must be passed for the purpose. This memorial was not a memorial from the merchants in Russia, but came regularly before the House from a citizen, the agent of a foreigner, and ought to be received.

Mr. LANMAN was in favor of committing the petition, but not in consequence of the precedent of Gen. Boyd. It would be found that the General presented himself before the king in council, or Parliament—the petition was presented in the character of a British subject serving in a military capacity in India, claiming certain immunities granted him to export salt-petre. He thought the dignity of the Government, and their own dignity, sense of duty and self-respect, required that they should accept this petition. He was aware of many petitions having been received from foreigners, among others that of Col. Calava, of Florida.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, did not attach much importance to the precedent of Gen. Boyd, because he thought they were capable of judging for themselves. Gen. B. did come before Parliament as a petitioner, but it was in the character of a Mahratta chieftain—he could not have presented a petition as a citizen of the United States—he did not believe there was any law existing in the United States requiring that an alien should be naturalized before he acquired the right of petitioning. This petitioner had pursued the proper course, and ought to be heard.

Mr. TAZEWELL submitted somewhat at large his views of the proper course to be pursued by foreigners in seeking favors or redress from an alien Government; the true distinction to be made between citizens and aliens by Government in receiving their complaints; what was due to courtesy on the one hand, and to right on the other, &c. But Mr. T. was heard by the reporter too indistinctly to venture a more particular statement of his remarks.

The petition was received, 21 rising in favor to 12 against; and the petition referred to the Committee on Finance.

WEDNESDAY, January 19.

Yazoo Land Claims.

The Senate took up the report of the Judiciary Committee, unfavorable to the petition of Ebenezer Oliver and others, Directors of the New England Mississippi Land Company.

[The petitioners appeal from a decision of the Commissioners appointed to carry into effect the compromise between the United States and the holders of Yazoo lands, under the act of 1814. The report sets forth: That, before the Commissioners, the petitioners, as trustees of the New England Mississippi Land Company, claimed, as the persons entitled to the one million five hundred and fifty thousand dollars, directed to be issued to the Georgia Mississippi Land Company; their claim to indemnity for 957,600 acres, amounting to $180,425, was resisted in behalf of the Georgia Mississippi Company, on the ground that the consideration money for said lands had not been paid, and that, therefore, they were, in equity, entitled to the indemnity provided by the act of Congress. The Commissioners decided in favor of the Georgia Mississippi Company, and the 180,425 dollars were deducted from the amount awarded to the New England Mississippi Land Company, and distributed as follows: $50,608 48 to individual members of the Georgia Mississippi Company, who had released to the United States, under the act of 1814, to whom the same has accordingly been paid; $79,816 52 was reserved to the United States, as being the shares of those claimants, who, not having been paid the consideration money by the persons who had purchased of them, claimed to be still the legal and bona fide owners of said lands, and, as such, had availed themselves of the provision of the repealing act of the State of Georgia, and obtained the repayment of the consideration money by surrendering their titles to the State. The petitioners object to this decision as erroneous, and they ask to have the $182,425 paid to them by the United States, or their release to the extent of the 957,600 acres cancelled, so that they may assert their title to the lands in a court of law.]

The committee, for the reasons which they set forth, declare the prayer of the petition unreasonable, and that it ought not to be granted.

Mr. MILLS moved to reverse the decision of the committee, so as to declare the petition reasonable; and followed his motion with a speech of considerable length, and much earnestness, in support of it.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, (a member of the Judiciary Committee,) replied to Mr. MILLS at equal length and earnestness, in support of the report of the committee, and against the petition.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, followed, in support of the petition, and against the report.

Mr. TALBOT, (a member of the Judiciary Committee,) followed Mr. L. on the same side, and addressed the Senate more than half an hour, in support of the justice of the petition, and against the report.

The debate had continued between two and three hours, when Mr. TALBOT had concluded; and Mr. VAN BUREN, (chairman of the committee who made the report,) expressing a desire to submit his views in its support, asked to be indulged until to-morrow, as the hour was now late, and moved to lay the report on the table; which was agreed to.

Suppression of Piracy.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 20.

Massachusetts Militia Claims.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, stated that the Senators of Massachusetts had received certain resolves of the Legislature of Massachusetts, now in session, in reference to the claim of that Commonwealth for the services of the militia of that State, during the late war; praying the speedy adjustment and payment of that claim. And instructing the Senators of the United States from that State, to present the said resolutions to the Senate. In pursuance of which instructions, he asked leave, in behalf of the said Senators, to present the resolves accordingly; observing, that, as the subject to which they relate is now before the House of Representatives, after having undergone the investigation of an able committee, and would, he trusted, shortly come before the Senate in an acceptable shape, in the form of a bill for the payment thereof, he would propose, that the resolves should be received, read, and, for the present, lie on the table.

The following resolve was then handed to the Chair, read, and laid on the table, viz:

Commonwealth of Massachusetts,

Resolved, That the Senators of this Commonwealth, in Congress, be instructed, and the Representatives requested, to urge, at their present session, the adjustment of the claim of Massachusetts on the Government of the United States, for disbursements necessary in the Commonwealth's defence, during the late war; and that the admission of its justice and validity, so far as it has been expressed by the authorities of the National Government, is duly appreciated.

Attested by the President of the Senate of Massachusetts, the Speaker of the House, and the Governor of the State.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, and Mr. CHANDLER, respectively presented similar resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine, which were also read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Suppression of Piracy.

The Senate then, according to the order of the day, proceeded to the consideration of the bill, reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations, for the suppression of piracy. The bill having been read through—

Mr. BARBOUR (Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations) commenced his remarks by saying: In the discussion of this subject, I do not know the precise course that ought to be pursued; for, whilst I hear on one hand, in conversation, that the measures we have adopted are too strong, on the other I am told that we have not proceeded far enough. I presume to hope, on this occasion, the truth lies between the two, and that, on the whole, the committee have been fortunate in the means they have suggested to put an end to the atrocious practice of piracy. Fortunately, or perhaps I should say unfortunately, for the facts disclosed are of the most melancholy description, there is no room to doubt the statements that have been made. Our commerce has too long been spoliated by these brigands of the West Indies, and our citizens have suffered every species of outrage from them, not only in the destruction of their property, but they have been cruelly tortured and most barbarously murdered. It is equally true that the means which have been hitherto resorted to have been insufficient to put a stop to it. And I believe it is equally true that the continuance of the evil is to be ascribed to the fact, that these bandits find an asylum in the Spanish possessions in the West Indies. It is equally true, that the information we received from our commanding officer, in that quarter, stating that piracy was at an end, and a piratical sail was no longer to be seen, is incorrect. It has gone on, gaining strength from time—its horrors have increased, instead of being diminished, and the numbers of these enemies of the human race have been swelled by the most profligate wretches—the refuse of all nations. The nautical means employed are not sufficient to effect the desired end; and nothing short of the pursuit of these villains on shore, promises any thing like an adequate remedy. The pirates are not only to be found at sea, but the whole island of Cuba is infected with this moral leprosy, from head to foot—all have participated in the spoil thus villainously acquired, nor will it cease till the United States adopt some strong measures to make them feel the consequences of the measures which they have not only tolerated, but assisted in.

These are the facts of the case, and the inference drawn from them; and I presume there can be no difference of opinion on the subject in the Senate, that it is necessary that something should be done, and that it should be done speedily and efficaciously. The only difference that can possibly exist, may be, as to the means which ought to be employed; for, surely, there can be no doubts as to the expediency of stretching out the arm of the nation, with all its resources, if necessary, to put an end to piracy. The committee did not portray, in the dark colors of which the subject is susceptible, the outrages and atrocities committed by these brigands. They did not exhibit the American citizen suspended from his own yard-arm, or weltering in his blood on his own deck, invoking in vain the aid of that flag, as well the pledge of your protection as the emblem of your sovereignty. They did not do so, because they thought that the naked facts, with the atrocious circumstances connected with them, would be sufficient to excite the indignation and horror of every citizen. They, therefore, left the subject to the general conception of every member of this body, without wishing to bring out the whole of the dark disclosure. On this account, some may be induced to believe that, in the means we have recommended, we have proceeded too far, but in my estimation, we have not, nor do I believe we could have gone too far. These people, by a singular combination, unite two of the most atrocious crimes that infest society, the slave trade and piracy; and Sodom and Gomorrah can no longer claim the infamous pre-eminency in crime.

There are others who think we have not gone far enough; but if they had said we ought to have recommended extermination, I should not have thought it too strong. They are the common enemies of the human race. The whole island is participating in the most atrocious crimes that can be perpetrated by man, and against these, as enemies of the human race, extermination might with propriety be denounced. The committee had no desire to inflame the passions, nor have I; and I am confident that no labored coloring is necessary to make every member of this body feel as powerfully on this subject as I do.

Sir, I will now proceed to take up the bill, section by section, to satisfy the Senate as to the propriety of adopting the means proposed.

The first section proposes building a number of ships, not exceeding ten, of a particular force. In relation to this clause, I wish to remark, that it is the copy of a bill that passed last session for building these ships. It was a measure strongly recommended by the intelligent head of the Navy Department. These vessels were to answer two purposes: they were not only calculated for suppressing the existing evil, but they would be an addition to the navy, to be used whenever a force of this description could be of service, and as a means of keeping down this tremendous evil when it was once down. It was then argued, that it was more prudent to buy than build, and the most intelligent were of a contrary opinion, and experience warranted it. It is unnecessary to travel further on this ground, since nothing has since occurred to occasion a change of opinion on this subject, but, on the contrary, the duration and the increase of the evil has tended to confirm it. The House of Representatives had not time to consider it. It was passed over with many hundred other subjects, but there was never any thing unfriendly exhibited, as far as I am advised, to its passage.

The second section provides for the landing of our forces in fresh pursuit of pirates, in the territory.

I believe, as far as regards our right to adopt this measure, there is no question that it will be yielded, on all hands, that it is lawful to enter the territory of any power in which pirates have taken refuge. Where a neutral power permits the enemy of an established Government to enter its territory, it instantly creates a right, on the part of the opposing power, to pursue, because, in giving them refuge, they abandon their neutrality. Much more so, is the right unquestionable as regards pirates. They are the common enemies of the human race, towards whom there can be no neutrals; therefore, it is perfectly lawful to pursue them into any territory into which they may have taken refuge, and any nation, who should assert that their rights had been violated by such a pursuit, would make themselves parties in their crimes, and become obnoxious to all civilized Governments, for the refuge afforded to the enemies of mankind.

If there be any doubt, however, on any man's mind, I will avail myself of the opinion of one of the most distinguished jurists of this country, and when such authority is to be had, I prefer it to all other. This gentleman was at the head of the Navy Department when instructions were given to Commodore Porter, when he proceeded on his first cruise on that station, and who now occupies, with so much credit to himself and usefulness to his country, a seat on the supreme bench. After sanctioning the principle above advanced, as to entering the territory of neutrals by belligerents, he proceeds to state that, in the case of pirates, there is no neutral party; they being enemies of the human race, all nations are parties against them, and therefore the right of entry, into any and all territories, in pursuit of pirates, is a clear principle of international law. In addition to this, you have the message of the President of the United States, stating, that this course is necessary to reach the evil, so that there can be no doubt as to the expediency of the measure.

I cannot too often endeavor to impress on the minds of the Senate, that these brigands are not only formidable by sea, but they find abettors by land. Let humanity blush on the declaration of the fact; they find countenance not only amongst the refuse of the population of Cuba, but amongst the merchants, the planters, and, what is more humiliating, amongst the constituted authorities of the island. Every place throughout the island, we are credibly informed, is contaminated by this deadly sin. Sir, the idea of a constituted or local authority, lending his aid to obtain redress for the aggrieved, is idle. The testimony of Randall, which I think is unquestionable, is sufficient proof that the local authorities, instead of putting down this evil, receive their share of the wages of iniquity. We are told these brigands rarely venture out in large vessels, but hover round the shores and the country, which, from the number of creeks and inlets, is peculiarly adapted to the objects of these marauders; and, when they are pursued by the American squadron, they find refuge on shore; and, where is there a shadow of evidence to prove that they have been taken up and punished for their crimes, and for the sufferings they have caused? There is none. You must cause vengeance to reach them—you must teach them there is justice still on the earth; and, although their own Government connives at their iniquity, there is another country strong enough to seize them in their recesses, and drag them to condign punishment. If we travel further into the case, we shall see the depth of depravity to which human nature can be reduced. These wretches, instead of being detested, are publicly justified. Yes, sir, it is pronounced an honorable trade; and what are we to expect from beings who justify such deeds as these? There is another circumstance which is very strong indeed; even General Vives himself, whom we exempt from participation in these deeds of iniquity, is still afraid to execute the authority with which he is invested. These brigands are seen in the public streets, mixing with the most respectable people of the place—and why not? They are all engaged in the same abominable traffic; and although those who have been so fortunate as to escape the murderer's poniard, have been able to point out in the public streets a man, saying, "There is one of those who robbed me and murdered my companions," he is told to beware lest the poniard, still reeking with the blood of a brother, shall shed his own.

Sir, I have heard it stated that the territorial rights of Spain would be violated, were we to adopt the measure recommended in this section. That it is a terrible thing to violate the rights of a nation, and draw on war, and all its calamities. But Spain has obligations to perform as well as rights to assert. If Spain had acquitted herself of the obligations imposed on her by the laws of God and man, and brought to punishment those monsters who find refuge in her territory, and to which she has been so often urged by our Government in vain, I would admit, that any attempt to enter her territory, as it would be without necessity, so, also, it would be without right, and unjust. But, under existing circumstances, what can Spain do? The committee find that Spain is unable to fulfil her social duties, and they put this charitable construction on her neglect of them. If she is able to put a stop to those outrages, and yet still permits them, she makes herself a party in the crime, and no measures that the United States could adopt would be too strong. We must act on one of these facts—connivance or inability. To act on the latter, is for the benefit of Spain. And what can Spain complain of? The United States has thrown herself on her own resources to do that which Spain ought to do, but finds herself unable. Sir, let us bring this case to private life. Suppose the habitation of an individual to be intruded on by a ruffian, and he is without strength, and unable to resist him. A neighbor who had been annoyed by this same ruffian, seizes him and turns him out; can the weak man complain? The same principle applies here. It is a misfortune, but not a crime, in a nation, that it is incapable of doing itself justice. Spain cannot acquit itself of its obligation in driving out these bandits. They carry on war with all mankind, and all mankind ought to arise to relieve a neighbor that is unable to assist itself.

But, sir, I beg to observe that this clause is limited to a fresh pursuit. When these wild beasts are started from their lairs by the American squadron, and wish to conceal themselves, then making fresh pursuit, authority is given to the officers to pursue them, capture them, and bring them back, or leave them in the island, if assurance is given that they shall be brought to condign punishment. I am now alluding to the caution with which this power is given. It is not a general privilege to enter the country in pursuit of pirates, because the ultimate consequences of that might be mischievous. But if, in a fresh pursuit, it is necessary to apprehend them, then the authority is granted them. With this caution, no difficulty will be created; and, considering the exigency and extraordinary nature of the case, and the outrages committed, there cannot be any difference of opinion in the Senate as to this clause of the bill. Surely, those do not argue well, who say that a measure should not be adopted, because it may ultimately produce mischief. This objection lies against any and every measure. If power is pushed too far, there is authority sufficient in this country to punish those who should be guilty of a wanton abuse of power.

The third clause is that authorizing blockade, under particular circumstances.

This clause has been particularly objected to, more especially on the ground of right.

Sir, the committee, in their consideration, have assumed the ground that we have had ample cause for war against Spain, according to the law of nations. It is expressly laid down, that, if a nation refuses to repair an injury committed by its subjects or citizens, it becomes instantly obnoxious to the aggrieved party, and affords just ground for retaliation. On this principle, Spain stands obnoxious to the United States for every outrage committed on its citizens by her subjects. The injuries have been inflicted, and redress demanded in vain. If, then, this is true, unquestionably we have sufficient ground for war with Spain. A just occasion to declare war leaves to the injured party a right to modify, according to his pleasure, the application of his force so as to effect his end. Hence, there are various steps, having reparation for their object, short of war—steps dictated by reason and humanity, and which not unfrequently produce the desired result, without the calamities of war, such as an embargo, letters of marque and reprisal, and, I will add, a blockade: for I can see no reason applicable to the former, that will not apply with equal force to the latter. If either of these measures succeed, the cause of humanity is promoted. The argument that nothing shall be done which is not justified by precedent, is at war with the condition of human kind, the current of whose affairs is one continued vicissitude, every age presenting its own incidents. From whence have you derived the precedents forming the law of nations? They had their origin in the right common to us. They rest on the maxim equally inculcated by jurists and by reason, that right goes hand in hand with the necessity and the exigency of the case. In self-preservation, you have a right to resort to such measures as necessity dictates. On this principle our ancestors acted. Their actions became precedents, and precedents authority. And, give me leave to inquire, At what epoch was posterity disfranchised? At what point of time did they forfeit the privilege of employing means corresponding with a new and necessitous occasion? Selden, the English patriot, was asked, by what authority he justified opposition to tyranny? He replied, he was not aware that there was any statute upon the subject, but it was a usage in England. When our fathers, animated by the love of independence, and of liberty, rose, in their might, to break their colonial bondage, and to establish our free and happy institutions, had some admirer of precedent inquired on what ground they justified their measures, appealing from musty records and established precedents, they would have pointed to the original source of all human authority—the law of Nature, and which, when unpolluted, guarantees the self-preservation and happiness of man.

He, therefore, who refuses to proceed, if there be not a precedent on the files, separates himself from the mighty and resistless current of human affairs, and becomes partially barbarous. Reason and necessity compel us to yield to its endless changes. Although, therefore, no authority could be appealed to to justify this measure, yet, if it be obviously necessary, to save our property from destruction, our citizens from massacre, and to bring to condign punishment the most atrocious of mankind, enemies of the human race, that necessity would be a sufficient justification.

FRIDAY, January 21.

Suppression of Piracy.

The Senate again proceeded to the consideration of the bill "for the suppression of Piracy."

Mr. TAZEWELL rose, and moved to strike from the bill the third section thereof, which is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That, if any of the said pirates should escape from the fresh pursuit of the commanding officers and crews of any armed vessel of the United States, and find refuge in any of the cities or ports on the said island of Cuba, or other islands aforesaid, the President of the United States, on being informed of the fact in a manner satisfactory to him, of its authenticity, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to declare the said port or city to be in a state of blockade, and shall cause the same to be invested by the naval force of the United States, till the said pirates shall have been secured and punished by the authorities of the said island, or until satisfaction shall otherwise have been made, whereupon he shall deem it just and expedient to discontinue the said blockade."

In support of this motion Mr. T. said—

Mr. President: In proposing this measure, I do not by any means wish to be considered as being opposed to the great object of the bill. So far from opposing it, there is no member of the Senate, no member of the committee, not even my honorable friend and colleague, to whom so much is due for the zeal and ability he has displayed on this occasion, who is more favorable to the application of every proper means of obtaining the object than myself. Sir, it is precisely because I do not consider the means proposed by the third section of the bill, to be either proper or sufficient to obtain the end the bill has in view, that I have proposed to strike it out. It is unnecessary to recite again the phrases of this section. It is sufficient to observe, that its object is to authorize the President of the United States, under certain circumstances, to institute a blockade of certain Spanish ports.

The advocates of this measure, at the very moment they recommend its adoption to the Senate, acknowledge it is a war measure. They acknowledge, moreover, that the United States maintain, at this moment, the most cordial relations of amity, not only with this power, but with every nation upon the globe, and they declare that it is not their purpose to change, in any way, these relations of peace and amity, whilst they practise this measure of war. The argument my friend and colleague urges on this subject, is this: "We have just cause for war against Spain, and therefore, although at peace ourselves, we have a right to practise against her this war measure." It is not necessary, sir, for me, at this time, or in this place, to inquire whether the proposition, which asserts we have just ground of war against Spain, is correct or not: but I think I am authorized in saying, if the statement my friend and colleague made yesterday is well founded, that the existence of piracy within her dominions, is ascribable to the weakness and not to the will of Spain, it belongs not to a just or generous people to declare this weakness a just ground for war. Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbo, was the maxim the poet teaches as that which was inculcated by the wisdom of the dead upon the magnanimous enterprise of the living, in past times; and trust me, sir, whenever we depart from the course this advice recommended, we shall lose much of that moral force which constitutes the great power of the people of the United States at this moment, while we shall not add a single sprig of laurel to the garland which now adorns our brow. Suppose we allow there is just cause of war with Spain; does it follow that any obligation is thereby imposed on us to exercise the right thus acquired? Because a nation has a just cause of war, is it to be argued, that she must, of necessity, engage in it? She surely may waive the right of waging war, if she thinks proper so to do; and when she waives this right, it must be admitted its incidents and ~~more~~ consequences follow the right so waived, and she can no longer claim the shadow, after she has voluntarily waived and abandoned the substance which produced it.

If this be so, it is not correct to argue that, because we have just cause of war, we may, in times of peace, adopt a measure which belongs to war alone; and, least of all, does it result, that, while you are maintaining these relations of peace and amity with all nations, you are at liberty to put in practice measures of war, which will not fall on the offending party alone, but on the innocent and meritorious only. Here, then, exists the first and great difference between the advocates of this measure and myself. They say that the measure proposed is designed to act, and must act, "upon the guilty alone." In my view, it can only affect the innocent and meritorious; and, if this position be established to their satisfaction, I venture to hope the advocates of the bill themselves, when they find that this measure, instead of promoting the end they had in view, is calculated to produce an effect diametrically opposite, will unite with me in the effort to expunge this section.

I say, sir, that this measure, authorizing the Executive to institute a blockade, can operate on none but neutral states. A war measure practised in peace is an anomaly, such as history nowhere records, and where parallel even pre-science has never yet foretold. We have no standard, then, by which to try its character or ascertain its effects, and there is no reasoning that can be applied to this nondescript. I think, however, I shall approximate the truth in contending, that a blockade, in time of peace, can confer no more right, and impose no more duties, than a legitimate blockade exercised in war, by one of the belligerent parties. I assume this as a postulatam, then, that this war measure, practised in peace, places all parties in the predicament a similar measure practised in war would do. I know well, sir, what are the rights and duties given and imposed by a blockade declared in time of war, but, in relation to this peace measure, I am ignorant of its consequences, and can bring it to no other standard than that I have thus stated. I can reason on it in no other way than by supposing that this blockade, instituted in time of peace, gives to all the parties, on whom it may operate, just the same rights and no more, than a blockade in time of war would do.

If it be contended that it gives more, I call upon its advocates to show from whence they derive the excess. I might, perhaps, contend that it did not confer so many rights, but I am content to concede this, and to place the two measures on the selfsame footing.

Mr. President, wherever war exists, all the inhabitants of the world must occupy one of two relations: either they are belligerents, or they are not. In the former case, there can also exist but two relations: those claiming and practising the right of blockade, and those against whose ports the right of blockade is directed. This blockade, if it acts at all, must, therefore, operate on one of three parties: 1st. On the citizens or subjects of the nation declaring the blockade; 2dly. On the citizens or subjects of the power whose port is blockaded; 3dly. On any others, that is to say, on neutrals.

Let us now consider the case of citizens or subjects of the blockading nation. It has never been said, it has never been thought, it has never been even dreamt, I believe, by any, before this day, that a belligerent blockade ever did or ever could act upon these.

We have been told of a blockade by statute, but my honorable colleague is mistaken, I believe, when he traces the rights and duties it creates to this source. No, sir, the power to declare it is derived from no such paltry municipal spring; it flows directly from the great and pure fountain of the public law. And when so derived, its influence extends over all upon whom this high law acts, that is to say, over the whole civilized world.

Deriving its powers thus from the law of nations, how idle would it be for a Government to invoke the aid of such powers when it would act upon its own subjects! Sir, the relation which subsists between sovereignty and subjection, between a nation and its own people, is that which enjoins and requires all power on the one hand, and all subjection on the other; and the only doubt which ever has, or ever will exist, is, in what hands this unlimited sovereignty, demanding unlimited obedience, might most properly be confided. We say, (and, I think, say truly,) it can be trusted nowhere with propriety but to the people. But whether it resides with an Autocrat, with a King, Lords, and Commons in Parliament assembled, or in the People, wheresoever it is found, it is equal, and it is equal only because it is supreme.

The language of this sovereignty, addressed to its own subjects, must, therefore, ever be the language of command, "sic volo, sic jubeo; stet pro ratione voluntas." And this language we, the people of the United States, acting in our sovereign capacity, are as much authorized to address to our own citizens, as the most puissant sovereign on earth is authorized to employ it towards his vilest serfs. For our sovereign rights are not less than his: they are both supreme.

If, then, you wish to prevent your people going to the island of Cuba, pass an act to that effect—an act of Congress, with sufficient sanctions, will secure the object. Do they violate it? Enforce your municipal regulations by municipal means; nobody can complain of this, because they are your own people, and you may govern them as you think proper. But, it may be asked, what will you do with one of your people who should attempt to violate this blockade? Will you not capture him? Yes, and condemn him too—(I am speaking of a war blockade, with which this peace blockade must be compared)—we do not condemn him, however, for violating the blockade; with this he has nothing to do; we touch him on a spot far more delicate; we strike a chord that reaches to his very heart; we touch him on his allegiance, and say that he is a party holding intercourse with the enemy, and endeavors to give them aid and comfort. Your power over him is not then derived from the public law; the public law cannot operate on him; it is a mere municipal power derived from your own municipal code, directed against a traitor who eludes and violates the municipal authority.

Do you want further evidence of this? Do you want to be further satisfied, that the right of blockade is never exerted by a nation against its own citizens? You will find it in these considerations. Would you not capture him before the blockade began, or after it was raised, or even during its continuance, if he is found anywhere engaged in this purpose, although not seeking to violate it? Yes, and the principle is always the same; you always capture and condemn him as a traitor, holding intercourse with the enemies of his country, contrary to his allegiance, and never as a mere blockade breaker. As, then, the institution of a blockade produces no new effect upon the subjects of the nation declaring it, will it act upon the power whose ports are blockaded? This is a fallacy still greater than the other. In war, you capture and condemn your enemy, it is true, not because he is attempting to break the blockade, however, but because he is your enemy. You assign no other reason but that. You say he is your enemy; therefore, you have a right to seize his person as well as his property, wherever you find either out of the protection of a neutral state. This right existed before the blockade was instituted, and exists in equal force after it is taken off; and during its continuance, wherever you find your enemy beyond the limits of a neutral state, although not attempting to violate your blockade. If so, a blockade which bestows no right, and imposes no new disability, cannot be considered as acting in any manner directly upon him; your right of action on him is derived from public law; it was perfect the instant war existed between you, and it is a right entirely independent of blockade.

Now, Mr. President, if the blockade does not act on your own citizens, or on your enemy, on whom can it act? If it act at all, it must act upon none but neutrals. I know very well, sir, that, although the direct action of a blockade is upon the neutral, yet the consequences may be felt by the enemy, and perhaps by yourselves; but that is merely an incident, a mere consequence, of the direct action, and you entitle yourself to the chance of inflicting this indirect injury upon your enemy, by entitling yourself to the right of acting directly upon neutrals. If such be the operation of a blockade, instituted jure belli, as fixed and settled by the public law, and if a peace blockade can bestow no other rights, then, as it is a measure designed to act not against the United States and Spain, but upon all the other nations of the civilized world, the question is, Are we prepared thus to act upon them? The advocates of this measure seem to have looked only on one side of it; but this is not right. The effect of blockade is, to shut out all who are out, and keep in all who are in. It prevents egress as well as ingress. The neutral can no more go in than he can come out; and the only exception to this rule is, that he may, if he chooses, quit the port the moment he is notified of the blockade, provided he leaves it in the condition he was when that notice was received, in ballast or half loaded, if such was his situation at that time. And if he dares to put the smallest article on board after he is notified, he then acts as an enemy, by assisting the enemy in his commercial purposes, and subjects himself to confiscation thereby. Perhaps the advocates of this measure can explain why it is that neutrals are thus to be made to suffer, all of whom feel as we feel upon this subject, and some of whom have done their utmost to put down piracy, and whose efforts I grieve to be compelled to say, have been much more efficacious than our own.

I can imagine many arguments that might be suggested by ingenuity in favor of a blockade of ingress, but for a blockade of egress there can be none.

When you see your friend about to run into unknown ways, and press towards a precipice which, if overstepped, must bring him to destruction, you may, may it is your duty, to warn him of his peril, to advise, to entreat, perhaps, in some individual cases, to prevent him from rushing upon destruction. But surely you act not a friendly part towards him, when you find him suddenly and unexpectedly surrounded by appalling dangers, if you require and compel him to continue in this situation, from which he would and has the means to escape, if you would permit him to do so. But yet this is the very course you will pursue, if you adopt this bill in its present shape. You blockade the port into which you have pursued the pirate, and will suffer none to enter there, because it contains the monster; and while you do and say this, you prevent all from escaping thence, although it contains the very beast of prey whom you have thus hunted into these formerly peaceful recesses.

The Dominican friars of old, when they clothed their victim in the habit of San Benito, and led him to the auto-da-fe, while he writhed in the midst of the consuming flames, calmly told him it was for his own good. We seem disposed to act the same part, and arrogating to ourselves these inquisitorial rights, wish to clothe every neutral power in such garments, and leading them to the flames, tell them we do so for their good. But will they believe us? If it be true, as my honorable colleague yesterday asserted, that necessity and right go hand in hand, then their necessity will be as strong as ours; and while it gives us the right to enforce, equally bestows upon them the right to resist, our assumed functions. And if it be true, as my honorable friend yesterday contended, that we have the right to interpolate a new principle in the public law, they have, at least, as strong a claim to do so.

And what, sir, must be the inevitable effect of all these various readings, of the holy text, under which different and discordant rights are claimed? No one can doubt it must be war, horrid, interminable war, unless we are content to return to the fold from whence we shall be said to have strayed, to come again within the pale of civil society, and consent to be governed once more by the ancient rules which the necessities, not of one, but of all, produced, which the wisdom, not of one, but of all, digested, and for the preservation of which, unaltered by any, the peace of all requires the guarantee of each.

Mr. President, my colleague and myself differ very much in the idea we entertain respecting this right of instituting a blockade. He considers it as an independent, substantive right, "which may be exerted, (to use his own words,) per se." But is this so? Can it be so? The right of instituting blockades is not a substantive right, nor will its exercise be permitted per se. The right of instituting blockades is a mere incident, a consequence growing out of the exercise of the higher right of war, and can be exerted only by those placing themselves in a state of war.

If a nation has just cause of war, the question whether she will wage it or not, is one resting solely on its own discretion; and if, in the exercise of this discretion, it is found expedient to waive the right of waging war, then the moment it waives the right of waging war, it waives its right to the exercise of all the incidents, consequences, and accessorial rights of war. To urge the contrary, would be to argue that you had a right over the shadow, after having given up the substance. No, sir. Nations waive all the benefits when they avoid all the risks of war.

If, in the exercise of its discretion, a nation having just cause of war, sees fit to use its perfect right of waging war, the instant war exists, it requires no statute to give the right of blockade, and none can take it away. It is then derived from the high law which the wisdom and convenience of the whole world dictated, and which is consecrated by the holy hand of time. Let no audacious editor dare to pollute, by any blot, erasure, or interpolation, the sacred page. The common good of all mankind requires, that what the common wisdom of all dictated, and the common and long acquiescence of all has sanctioned, should neither be repealed nor abridged by any. If you choose to judge for yourselves, and blot one page, every nation will have a right to follow your example, and then indeed we shall behold the Prophet's scroll alluded to yesterday, written on the inside and out with nothing but lamentation and woe.

If, in the exercise of her discretion, having a just cause of war, a nation declares war, she thus immediately invests herself with the right of straitening her enemy by every means in her power. She may limit him exclusively to his own resources. She may diminish these as far as she can, and take care that they receive no augmentation from any other power: and all this she is allowed to do to attain the only legitimate end of war—a just and honorable peace. To secure the benefits of peace, the right of war is given, and war justifies the belligerents in employing all those means to accomplish this its great end.

Under this right of depriving him of his resources, is derived the right of taking his property wheresoever it is found beyond the protection of a neutral state. Under this right of preventing any augmentation of these resources, is derived the right of capturing even neutral property when found upon the high seas, destined for the enemy's port, and being contraband of war.

Under these rights of capturing the property of the enemy, and the contraband property of neutrals, destined for his ports, is derived the right of visitation and search. For it would be vain to allow such rights, unless the only means by which they could be enforced were also conceded.

And, under this right of limiting the enemy to his own resources, is derived the right of investing his cities by land, and his ports and harbors by sea, and so cutting off his intercourse with the rest of the world.

The right of visitation and search, and the right of blockade, are three twin sisters, born of the same mother—war. They come into being at the same moment with the existence of war; they continue during the same period while war continues; and, unlike the twins of the heathen mythology, they die at the same instant, when peace returns. Now, sir, if we are justified to exercise in peace one of these rights of war, we are justified in exercising the other; and if we claim the right of blockade in peace, we cannot deny to any nation the right of visitation and search in peace also. Is the Senate prepared to make this concession?

My honorable friend may say, perhaps, that the circumstance of the existence of piracy makes this case peculiar. He may contend, that this bill does not assert the right of blockade generally in times of peace, but only when piracy exists. This is certainly so: but are there not other pirates in the world besides those who infest the coast of Cuba? Have you not declared the slave trade piracy? and has not Great Britain, at your invitation, done the same? and is he not as much a pirate who deals in slaves, then, as he who takes a vessel off Cape Antonio?—and if the existence of piracy in Cuba justifies you in undertaking a blockade there, to suppress that piracy, can you deny to Britain, or any other nation, the right of visitation and search—to suppress the other piracy, the slave trade?

My honorable friend yesterday described, in language of true pathos, the horrid atrocities perpetrated by the monsters of Cuba. The picture was drawn by a master's hand, its colors were most vivid, and its similitude, I doubt not, most just. If, Mr. President, I dared to borrow his pencil for a moment, and to exhibit a more rapid sketch of the slave trade, I could present you a scene, over which philanthropy cannot but weep, at which the human heart sickens, and the bare representation of which rouses even calm justice, and makes her cry aloud for vengeance on the wrong-doer. Yes, sir, in the scale of moral beauty, the vilest wretch who haunts Cape Antonio, prowling for rapine, and delighting in blood, compared with the slave trader who traffics on the coast of Africa, is as Hyperion to a Satyr. He stands as a pure angel of light to the foulest demon of darkness—and every circumstance which can be urged to justify you in claiming the right of practising this measure of war in times of peace, in order to exterminate one pirate, may be urged “a fortiori,” to justify every other nation in using the other measure of war in order to exterminate the other pirate.

Mr. President: for half a century we have been struggling, sincerely, I know, and I hope successfully, to establish the reputation of being a just people—to acquire the character of doing unto others what we would be done to ourselves in similar circumstances. If we mean to preserve this character, we must take special care to act cautiously and consistently; for, if it is found in any one page of our history, that we are asserting for ourselves a privilege, which elsewhere we had denied to others, we forfeit this character of moral rectitude.

Now, sir, (all other considerations apart,) is it wise to do so? Of all the nations of the civilized world, the United States is that where physical, detached from its moral strength, is least. It ever has been so, it ever must be so, while this Government continues. Unite the two, and at home you may defy the world in arms against you, while abroad your influence will be felt far beyond the limit to which your physical force can ever enable you to reach, by the means of your example, that is, by your mere moral power. It is this at least, sir, that constitutes the material, out of which are formed the pillars of strength and beauty, the Jachin and the Boaz, standing before the vestibule of our temple. While these stand your edifice is secure; it will continue as now, fair to behold, and safe to inhabit. But, once corrode this material; once impair this moral power; and we sink into decrepitude before we have yet attained maturity. Ought we not then to beware how we depart from the right-lined course our predecessors have pursued; how we assert principles in relation to foreign States, now, which they disavowed formerly? Our moral strength, like chastity, once lost, can never more be regained. Now, sir, let us look back into our own history for parallel cases; let us find what where the principles we asserted then, and inquire whether our practice now will accord with them. If they are at variance, we should shun them as we would every thing that tends to evil. There are many members of the Senate who will all recollect the incidents that occurred in the interval between the years 1793 and 1798, and what was the doctrine we then asserted and practised? It was during the period of the French Revolution, when England and France were belligerents, and the United States was the neutral. In consequence of this neutral position, our ports and harbors were filled with our own vessels, as well as with the vessels of both the belligerents and of other powers, not only with their merchant vessels, but with their fleets. What was the practice then? The moment one of the belligerents found vessels of the other in these ports, no matter whether it was a vessel of war or a merchantman, they blockaded them, in fact, although not in name. Every harbor and bay of the United States was subject to this blockade. What was our language then towards these belligerents? You are at war with each other, and may, on the high seas, exercise the rights of war; but you have no right to come here and shut our ports as you have done. We are at peace with each of you, and with all the world besides. You cannot, therefore, claim the right of blockading us in name, and hence, ought not to exert the power of blockading us in fact. Exercise your right of visitation and search on the high seas, and when you there find the property of your enemy, or the contraband property of neutrals, destined for your enemy, take it and apply it to your own use. We do not complain of this. But you must not place yourself at our very door, in order to examine our visitors and friends. By so doing, you harass our lawful trade; you annoy our fair commerce; and you subject us, although at peace, to most of the inconveniences we should feel from flagrant war.

This reasoning was just, and at last prevailed; both parties became satisfied of the rectitude of our claims, and yielded to them.

Now, Mr. President, if the actual presence of an enemy's fleet, in a neutral port, in time of open war, cannot justify blockade, can the presence of a piratical vessel, in any port, justify it? If the French, finding an English fleet in the Chesapeake, ought not to blockade them there, surely you, a neutral, finding a fleet of pirates in the neutral port of Matanzas, cannot blockade it, and so do that which one belligerent power would not be justified in doing towards another.

Mr. President, if we really wish to preserve our good name and moral strength, by acting towards others as we would they might act towards us, we ought not only to refrain from doing any improper action, but even from doing that which, although permissible in itself, might yet fairly justify suspicion of our motives. Terrible would be the result, were we to act on a new principle, and yet leave a shadow of suspicion as to our motives for asserting it. Now, what are we about to do? Are we going to war with Spain, and so to acquire the right of blockade? No! we are going to blockade Spanish ports, and yet keep ourselves at peace. If we go to war with Spain, neutrals must submit to our blockades, and will do so willingly; for, your war, by imposing new disabilities upon yourself, must, in fact, impart new advantages to neutrals, which will abundantly compensate them for any inconvenience your belligerent rights create. But, if in peace you blockade, then, when by your blockade you have created necessities, the supply of which must yield inordinate profits, you may raise the blockade, and satisfying the wants which that produced, thus create for yourself great profit at the expense of others, and in which none will be allowed to participate with you. Suppose that, by the blockade of the Havana, you raise the price of flour to $50 per barrel, and then raise your blockade, who will enjoy the benefit of this high price? The merchants of the neighboring ports in the United States. Thus it will happen, then, that by your own power, you create wants which you will not suffer others to prevent, and, when they have attained their highest point, withdraw your measures of war, assume the attitude of peace, and so satisfy the necessity, and enjoy the profit your own act has occasioned. Neutral states will never submit to this, sir,—they will not suffer you thus to blow hot and cold through the same lips; but will tell you, that, if you choose to war with Spain, do so; for, when by war, you cut yourself off from all peaceful intercourse with her, the trade you give up becomes theirs, subject only to your belligerent rights. That they will be thus compensated for the inconvenience to which you subject them. But, if by the measures of war, you create wants, which, under the garb of peace, you yourself may satisfy, they, and they only, feel the evils of the war, while you, and you only, can enjoy the benefits of peace. They will say to you, that this Centaur form, half war, half peace, is a deformed monster, which the friends of humanity must extirpate; and more than one Nestor will be found at this feast of the Laphætes, ready and willing to essay the task.

Sir, it is a fraud on neutral rights, and it cannot be expected they will submit to it. If you go to war you enjoy its benefits, and take the consequences; but here you take the benefits to yourselves, and throw the hardships and annoyance on the innocent.

There is one more view of the subject to which I should wish to call the attention of the Senate, if it were not for the contempt with which my honorable colleague seems to consider every thing like detail. I cannot jump, however, at once to my conclusions, as he does—I must go step by step, and satisfy myself of its operation every way, before I can pronounce that any measure is good. It is my misfortune, sir, and you must pardon me, if, accustomed as I have been, through my whole life, to arrive at conclusions only by the slow process of reasoning, I still adhere to my old course; and, having no pretension myself to intuition, I am distrustful of its apparent effects upon others. I do not pretend, sir, to argue by conclusions—

I must plod on, and ask, at each step, not merely quara, but quo modo, also. In this instance I have done so, and I do not see my way clear. If we mean to institute blockades, I take it for granted we mean to enforce them when instituted. If so, we must presume, sir, that there will be cases of capture, and, of course, efforts at condemnation. But where is condemnation to be made? Will the committee tell me by what forum this question of condemnation will be tried, and what allegation they will prefer to attain it? If it had been a war measure, it would have been brought before a prize tribunal; but the bill has directed no prize tribunal to be instituted, and indeed it would have been strange if it had. A prize without war would be as great an anomaly as a blockade in peace.

Suppose a vessel is brought before a prize court, however, and you say she is an enemy, or that she has conducted herself quasi enemy, because she has violated your blockade—yes, sir, your blockade, declared by statute—what will your prize judge first ask? Does war exist? The answer may be given in the language of the advocates of this bill themselves, war does not exist, but we are merely practising a measure of war in time of peace, and therefore ask you to help us out by your decree. But what must that decree be? It must be this, and this only: Prize, the fruit of war, is not to be won by the acts of peace; he who asks it must have risked his life, his liberty, and his property, for its acquisition. You who have risked nothing, can take nothing, at least from this court, but must seek the boon which you ask elsewhere.

Suppose that you apply to some other than a prize tribunal, to some court of admiralty, or other forum, bound to administer the jus gentium, and there ask the confiscation of the property of a neutral captured on the high seas, for a breach of your statutory blockade—what will the judge there tell you? He will tell you, as he has often done, that municipal power is, in its very nature, territorial; it cannot reach beyond the bourne of the country where it is exerted, except over the persons or property of its own subjects, and that he cannot condemn the property of strangers for the breach of a law, in the enactment of which they had no share, and by the obligation of which they are not bound.

You must then be driven at last into a mere municipal tribunal, to some court of fiso, to ask the condemnation of the property of an alien, for some act done by one who never owed you obedience, and without your territory. Sir, those who ask this, are either not aware of its consequences, or cannot be serious in expecting their application to be granted.

Mr. President, I have chosen to exhibit the subject to you thus, through the medium of your own courts, rather than ask you to accompany me to London, or to St. Petersburg, to witness the scene that must take place there, when your representative undertakes to announce gravely to these sovereigns, that the Congress of the United States has passed an act confiscating their property, not jure belli, but for acts done under their authority, and out of your territory. This scene I leave to the imagination of those who may find mirth in it. To me it would give none.

How then, sir, I ask, is this blockade to be carried into effect? [Mr. BARBOUR said by force.] Sir, force is not right. It never did convey the property of one neutral into the possession of another, where the public law forbade it; and we know not yet on which side of the question the conclusion of this ultima ratio may apply.

The moment you announce this doctrine, you stand on the principle that force gives rights; and, when you interpolate it into the page of the public law that expressly denies it, you place yourself beyond the pale of civil society; the whole civilized world will rise against you, and declare you in a state of barbarism as well as blockade.

It is contended, sir, that, as we have a right, in peace, to lay embargoes, and to grant letters of reprisal, and as these are war measures, therefore we have a right to institute a blockade, which is not more a war measure. I have never understood that embargoes and reprisals were war measures, and should like to be informed from what authority such assertions are derived. Embargo is no more a measure of war than the infliction of the sanction of any other municipal law is a measure of war. Its operation is confined to your own territory, the same as in any other municipal law. A man commits a murder, and is hanged for it. This might as properly be called a measure of war as an embargo.

In themselves, they are measures of peace and tranquillity, a mere extension of the municipal powers of the state over those who ought to submit to such powers, and no one ever considers them as otherwise. Look back to the time of Washington. He laid an embargo for 60 days, and afterwards extended it to 90 days. Did any one consider it as a measure of war or force? Embargo may be resorted to as a means of preparing ourselves for war, and so may the construction of fortifications. You are building forts on Old Point Comfort and Hurl Gate; yet no one considers these as measures of force or war, because they may be useful in war. Nor can we say more of embargoes. Thus much for embargoes then.

As to letters of reprisal, they are always understood as measures of peace, designed to prevent war. I grant that they often lead to war; but, in themselves, they are as much measures of peace as an embargo, and their object always is certainly to prevent war.

But, as to blockade, the effect is very different. Letters of reprisal act on the guilty, and the guilty alone; and embargo acts on all alike, but it acts municipally on all within the territory; whereas blockade acts beyond the territory, and acts directly upon the innocent only. It now only remains to inquire into the only precedent that has been cited in support of this proceeding. I allude to the blockade of Cadiz by the French. I say that France was perfectly justifiable in declaring that blockade; but, in the course she pursued, there is nothing to justify the present measure. War then existed, and, as a consequence of war, blockade was adopted by France. It is said that France declared she was not at war with Spain. Sir, is not this the language which every ally, under similar circumstances, is compelled to use? When a part of a nation attempts to separate itself from the rest, or to establish a new sovereignty, the effort, while it is in progress, is declared, by the ancient sovereign of the whole, to be rebellion, and force is used to bring back the rebellious member to its duty. This force, when resisted, makes war exist; and such a war is distinguished, not as public, but as civil war. All but the belligerents give it this denomination, and the revolutionary party calls it by the same name; the ancient sovereign, and its allies, however, will never acknowledge it to be war at all—they say it is insurrection and rebellion; and there never has been an instance known of any nation, endeavoring to regain a revolted portion of her state, that had severed itself from her, calling the rebellious parties enemies. No, they style them rebels and traitors, and the moment they catch them, hang them. Were they once to acknowledge them as enemies, they could not thus punish them, because they would be entitled to the privileges granted by civilized warfare, which forbid us so to punish an enemy, or to exert over him our municipal means. We, ourselves, stand a memorable example of this: in the year '76 we declared ourselves independent—Britain declared us to be rebels, and used all her power to reduce us again to the slavery from which we were doing our utmost to free ourselves. She put forth all her physical means, and had she not been fearful of a dreadful retaliation, all the prisoners she took would, no doubt, have suffered as rebels and traitors, and not as enemies. She never could acknowledge us to be enemies until she admitted us to be independent.

France, some years since, by one of her arrears, declared St. Domingo in a state of blockade, and announced her purpose of executing any who should presume to enter it in violation of this law. None ever doubted the perfect right of France so to rule her own possessions if she thought proper; and, until either France or the United States should recognize the independence of this revolted colony, we were constrained to consider the ancient regime as still existing in St. Domingo, and to regard that island as a part of the French Empire, and, therefore, properly governed by its municipal decrees. None ever doubted either, that, to these rights of sovereignty, France might, at any time she thought proper, superadd the rights of war. And the whole question was, whether she had thought proper so to do. But France, to this hour, has never recognized the inhabitants of Hayti as her enemies, but merely as her revolted subjects.

Suppression of Piracy.

An intestine commotion existed some few years since in England, which wanted nothing but numbers to magnify it into rebellion, and success to make it revolution. But Thistlewood died the death, not of an enemy, but of an insurgent.

In short, sir, wherever revolt against existing authority (legitimate or not) can be found, neither the ancient sovereign nor any of his allies, can ever consider this (so far as the quondam subject is concerned) to be war, and so to constitute the insurgents enemies. As to those, it is rebellion merely; but as to all others, it is civil war, the existence of which adds the admitted rights of war, to the prior rights of sovereignty claimed by one of the parties.

As regards the blockade of Cadiz, France could not consider Spain as at war with part of her own people. France came as her ally to lend her assistance, and as Spain never acknowledged she was at war, neither ought her ally so to do: but civil war existed, and hence there was no impropriety in blockading Cadiz. This case, then, cannot be cited as a precedent in justification of the present measure.

I think, then, Mr. President, I have established the proposition, that, considering this contemplated blockade as a measure of peace, it is not justifiable, and, therefore, is one to which we have no right to resort. But supposing it were proper, will it be efficient? Under this bill, when you have met a pirate on the high seas, and chased him to his den, then a despatch is to be sent 1,800 miles to the President of the United States, to know what to do, and before the messenger can possibly return, there will be no further occasion to blockade most probably, for the beast will have escaped from his place of refuge.

You would not then institute a blockade, I presume; for it ought to be considered satisfactory that those who could not prevent his ingress have not opposed his regress, and if this be not satisfactory, it is just cause of war.

If, then, sir, you interpret this bill literally, it is nugatory; but no such interpretation will be given to it. If the Executive wish the adoption of this measure, you cannot believe that it is contemplated to launch such a mere brutum fulmen as the literal interpretation of its language would make it. No, sir, the means given, like all other means in this Government, will be adapted and made efficacious to the end, for the attainment of which the preamble or title announces they were to be employed. To make them so, however, the authority you delegate to him must, of necessity, be sub-delegated to some other present on the spot. Possibly to some one or more of the sixty-seven new officers you made a few days since, every one of whom will, ere long, become a commanding officer on that station, if the warfare is to be carried on in open boats, as it is suggested it must be. Now, sir, are you willing to place the rights of neutrals, and, consequently, the peace of this nation, in the hands of any such as these? Have you not already too many examples before you, examples furnished by the very document now in our hands, of the want of discretion in those of much higher grade, to confide any power, of this description, even upon them? But this will be the necessary effect of the bill, if it produces any; and, if it produces none, it is useless, because inefficient. Mr. President, I have great respect for many of our naval officers; but allow me to say, that you are never safe when you leave the power of plunging us in war with those whose interest and whose pride it will ever be to make war.

Sir, I began by stating that, although I was opposed to the means provided by this section of the bill, yet I was not opposed to the object of the bill. I am willing to go as far as any one in promoting the good end of putting down piracy in the West Indies, or any other part of the world. If the President wants ships for that purpose I will build them, as many as he desires—if he wants money, I will give it till he cries enough; and, when this power and these means are intrusted to the Executive, I shall hold the Executive responsible for the proper application of them. The end proposed is the suppression of piracy. All proper means I will grant; and if this end is not then effected, all the mischiefs that result must be laid at the door of him who misapplied the means. I have no doubt, sir, on this subject of fresh pursuit; a pirate is an outlaw, a beast of prey; wherever you find him, you have a right to pursue and slay him. For my part, I don't care whether the pursuit is fresh or not; I believe you may lawfully go anywhere where he unlawfully is. You may take him, condemn him, and after you have condemned him, I would not pardon him. If, in this pursuit, you find any one affording him refuge, giving him aid or comfort, you are at liberty to attack him also; he is an accessory both before and after the fact, a particeps criminis, and must take the consequences of his guilt.

This, sir, I know very well, may lead to war; nay, very probably, is war; but it is open war with guilty pirates and their guilty associates only, and not war in disguise, waged against innocent neutrals, under the new doctrine of practising the measures of war in times of peace.

Although I am willing to employ all proper means to effect this desirable end of suppressing piracy, I can never consent to blot the bright escutcheon of the United States, or jeopardize its moral force, or fix a stain on the character, which, with so much care, we have been endeavoring to establish for the last fifty years, by asserting the right of doing that which the public law forbids. Therefore, sir, I move to expunge the third section of the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR thought that he had acquitted himself of his share of duty in the exposition he had made yesterday of the views of the committee. Other members of the committee were charged with the defence of their measures against any attack that might be made upon them. But as his friend and colleague had moved against the most efficient branch of the bill, and no gentleman had risen in reply to his argument, unprepared as he was, he could not consent to permit the question to be taken without attempting the vindication of a measure recommended by the committee, and which had provoked such severe animadversion from his colleague. His regret at the necessity of being obliged again to trespass on the patience of the House, was heightened by the consideration that it was his misfortune to have to encounter his colleague. Success rarely attends a divided household. As heretofore he had had the good fortune, on all subjects of consequence generally, to be aided by his former colleagues, he hoped this would be the last case of division with his present. When to these circumstances was added the consideration that, on the subject before us, and all the results of prize questions and admiralty decisions, the principal objections urged by his friend, that he was laboring in his vocation, and perfectly familiar with all their technicalities, uniting the powers of a capacious mind with the lights of experience, the Senate would readily appreciate the unequal contest into which he was about to enter. Nothing but a consciousness of truth could sustain him in the conflict.

Mr. B. then proceeded to state the proposition contained in the third section of the bill.

The advocates of this section are bound, it is agreed, to make out, to the satisfaction of the Senate, 1st. That we have the power to adopt this measure of coercion, independently of war; and, 2dly. That the exercise of this power, at this time, is called for by the exigency of the occasion. In making out the first proposition, he had but little to add to his argument of yesterday. By what standard is the question of the existence of the power to be tested? My honorable friend contends that the laws of nations, as made known by jurists, was the only rule by which we could be governed. That to seek to add to, or in any way to interpolate on that code, was impious, and fraught with incalculable mischief. Indeed! How has it happened that, while all other sublimary things are imperfect, and, as it is hoped, in a progressive state of improvement, that this system, most complicated, and involving the deepest interest, should have already arrived at perfection? A system whose principles originated without deliberation, and which were frequently dictated by the powerful to the weak. But, however the principles may now be consecrated by acquiescence, and by time, they must have had their origin. They were established by the same power common to us—the employment of means deemed proper or convenient by those who used them. But the present is a case not anticipated, or one which had not occurred. The laws are silent—there is no precedent on the files. The necessity, as will be shown under the second proposition, exists for the employment of this mean to save the lives of our people from destruction. I ask, when did we forfeit the right of self-preservation? When was posterity disfranchised? At what epoch did the interdict issue—and by whom? No. This idolatrous reverence inculcated for the writers on international law, is at war with our reason. This servile deference for precedent is not adapted to the latitude of America. Our ancestors did not thus act when they gloriously rose above precedent and authority, and proclaimed our emancipation. Our own history of annual legislation shows the necessity of applying new rules to new and unprovided-for incidents which all changeable time is continually producing. All that is incumbent on those who exercise power, is to show that inevitable necessity—for that necessity is inevitable, when self-preservation is at stake—demands it. You are never to exceed the limits which that necessity points out, but you may safely advance to them. On this branch of the discussion, I alluded yesterday to the precedent established by France in the blockade of Cadiz. My colleague contends that France was right, and I pray to inquire how he makes it out? He will not admit that Spain was at war—no, not even civil war—because, in that event, Spain would have been, by the modern usages, deprived of the right of murdering her rebellious subjects. France, he says, as the ally of Spain, stood on the same footing as Spain, and therefore she was not at war, and this is what France herself did expressly announce to the world, and yet, what is his conclusion? Why, that France had all the privileges of a belligerent.

Although the great burden of his previous argument was to show that a blockade could not exist independently of, but was a consequence of war, yet, when he now labors to ascertain France was not at war, yet she was justifiable in thus blockading Cadiz—this course of reasoning is, to my mind, unintelligible, and a perfect contradiction. Whether this results from the fallacy of the gentleman's argument, or my incapacity to comprehend, I leave to the Senate. I shall content myself with these remarks on this branch of the subject, and by referring to my remarks of yesterday—that we have just cause of war against Spain; that humanity requires we should obtain our end short of war, if practicable; that the intermediary steps of embargo and letters of marque have been resorted to by nations acting on the suggestions of this humane principle, and that blockade is defensible, on every ground as these, save the influence of precedent; and that we have just the same power to establish precedent as our ancestors, and when called to establish one, dictated by self-preservation, and limited to the exigency, that we stand justified, and shall be justified by the common consent of mankind. Now, sir, as to the necessity of exercising this power. For years, hundreds of our fellow-citizens have been murdered by a desperate association of brigands. They elude our just vengeance by taking refuge in the colonies of Spain. They are not only protected by the inhabitants of those islands, but they are justified. Justified! The inhabitants share in their plunder! They hover around the ports, watch the departure of our vessels, and are enabled thereby to execute their fell purposes of robbery and murder. The whole island of Cuba, for example, all conditions of its people, are leagued in this diabolical crime. Our agent there, Mr. Randall, most respectable we learn from others, and very intelligent, as we know from his correspondence, assures us that, unless we can make the people on land feel our power, by blockading their ports, and depriving them of this dreadful source of gain, and cutting off their intercourse with the world, that all external efforts to arrest the evil are in vain; that you must produce a moral revolution on land, through their interests. In confirmation of this is the President's message of the 11th, who points out this measure as necessary to the suppression of piracy. What stronger evidence do you require of the necessity of exercising this power? I trust I have sustained both the propositions. I asserted the right and the necessity of exercising this power. Now, sir, what are the objections? That we shall be involved in war with the neutral powers, whose rights will be compromised by this measure? And it is triumphantly inquired, how is this measure to be enforced? The answer is, by a sufficient force to be placed at the point blockaded. Ah! what is to become of the prizes? Before what Court of Admiralty is the prize to be brought, and by what text is the prize question to be decided? The answer is, that it is not contemplated to make any, but, by actual force, to arrive at our object by excluding, not capturing the vessels; though, at the same time, if necessary, I have little question if the same necessity existed to carry the principles of blockade to this extent, as to establish the limited blockade, which the committee look to, we should have the authority to do so. But the gentleman charges me with an utter contempt for detail. If by this he means that I respect the substance rather than the shadow, that I hold the difficulties of a prize question before an Admiralty Court as insignificant, when compared with the fortunes and lives of my fellow-citizens, then I plead guilty to the charge. I do, indeed, feel but little interest "in the plumage of a dying bird." A measure is here presented, called for by the strongest of all earthly considerations, the salvation of our fellow-citizens. Shall we abandon them? Shall we give them up to the murderous assassin, who spares neither age nor sex? Shall these mighty mischiefs be held as unworthy our notice, because the ingenuity of counsel shall be able to suggest difficulties in one of the remote, indeed I may say impracticable results, what decision shall be pronounced on a prize question? My colleague says, and I do not question it, that he feels the same horror and detestation for this enormous mischief as myself or any member of the committee; and that he is willing to go all proper lengths for its suppression; that he would visit the island with our forces, and put not only all the pirates to death, but all who had given them aid or countenance. That he is willing to give ships and money, and then to hold the Executive responsible for their proper application. But this very Executive tells you that a blockade is necessary. At whose door will the responsibility rest, if you give not the power? But my colleague is willing to give what is necessary; but qualified with the condition that it must be proper in his estimation. Why talk of doing what is necessary, when you refuse that, without which every thing will be ineffectual. External means will not answer. The people of the islands must be made to feel. A blockade of their ports is indispensable; yet this you refuse. The lives of your people exposed to continued massacre; and yet this calamity is to be disregarded while we are fastidiously inquiring into the difficulty of a prize case. 'Tis the case of a physician, weeping over his dying patient, with the means of recovery in his hand, but who, from some fastidious delicacy, refuses the application, and to that delicacy offers him as a sacrifice. But this measure is to operate exclusively on foreigners, in the language of my friend. Directly the reverse. It acts only on the guilty. How are foreigners to be affected? Surely their interest is directly to be subserved. The extirpation of these demons is the common concern of mankind. The temporary exclusion of foreign ships from their den surely can form no just cause of complaint. But the gentleman foretells disastrous consequences. From what source he draws his prophetic inspirations I know not. I will content myself with a different prophecy: that such a measure, in such a cause, will obtain the applause of mankind. Who can complain? Spain? We are doing her a favor. England? She is engaged at this moment in the common cause of extirpating the pirates. France, independently of her equal concern in their destruction, will scarcely, after her act of blockade at Cadiz, have the confidence to complain. If she should, let her be told that, while she commands for the right of blockading a city, for the destruction of patriots, fighting for all that is dear to man, their altars, their firesides, their liberty, that surely they will not complain of an American blockade, directed against a horde of the most prostituted and ferocious of mankind, whose extirpation is the united wish of all mankind.

My colleague permits himself to find a parallel between this case and our own, during the war of revolutionary France, and urges that this assumption of ours may become a precedent which would shelter, in its retroaction, the enormous pretensions of those powers, when blockading our ports. But where are the circumstances of resemblance? On what ground did my colleague indulge the comparison? America—an independent Government, in a neutral position, performing her relative duties with good faith to the contending parties, surely has no trait of resemblance with desperate brigands, at war with all mankind—audaciously trampling under feet all laws, human and divine.

I heard, with equal surprise and regret, that, however he acquitted us of improper motives, that foreigners would suspect their purity. That we would blockade the Havana till the suffering of the inhabitants should carry flour to fifty dollars per barrel, when our blockade would be immediately lifted, and Boston or Norfolk would supply the demand. This is, indeed, a humiliating picture. Who could be wicked enough to indulge such an insinuation? After years of patient endurance and long-suffering; after our ships have been plundered and our citizens given up to torture and death; when, instead of rushing to vengeance, we have calmly addressed ourselves to the Spanish Government for redress, and have waited for her reply in vain; after our intelligent agent on the spot tells us this measure is indispensable; after the President of the United States has recommended its adoption, and the united wisdom of both branches of Congress shall have sanctioned it—to suppose it possible that any foreign nation will have the audacity to carry our measures to a counting-house motive, I repeat again, is a suggestion which I heard with surprise and regret. But the power is given in a way to render it futile. After these beasts of prey have been traced to their den, they are not instantly to be blockaded, but the President is to be advised of the circumstances before the blockade takes place, and when the fugitives will have escaped. Why does not my colleague employ the powers of his mind in amending? The truth is, that the check complained of was inserted in deference to the opinions of those who permit themselves to believe that they see danger in any measure of energy. It was to relieve ourselves from the fear suggested by my colleague, and which may be entertained by others, that our commanders are not trustworthy. This, bear it in mind, is not our opinion. We have confidence in the prudence of our officers, or, if they violate their duty, we have authority here to punish and atone for their injuries. If, therefore, the clause is not sufficiently energetic, I will go as far as any one in amending it. But, in its present shape, is it inoperative? Is there nothing in the knowledge of these people, that, though justice is, for the time, suspended, it will assuredly overtake them? On what other ground is the wickedness of individuals or nations prevented? The law exercises its silent influence to the utmost extremity of the nation. Not that the sword and the executioner are always present, but the conviction that they will finally smite the offender. So, also, will these people calculate; so, also, all nations must calculate. Believe me, then, the very existence of this power, lodged in the hands of the Executive, will have great influence, and may possibly supersede the necessity of its exercise. I have thus, without, as you know, a moment's preparation, endeavored to answer the objections of my colleague against the third section of the bill; and, as at present advised, I shall not trouble you again on this subject. The further discussion will be left to others. Believing, sir, that an awful responsibility hangs over us; that the lives of many of our fellow-citizens are involved in the result of our decision, I call for a record of my vote. In the day of urgency let every man stand on his own ground; if the measure be adopted, and ill consequences ensue, I am willing to meet the responsibility. If rejected, and thereby the blood of our people be spilled, let that blood be not laid at my door.

When the debate had progressed thus far, on motion, the further consideration of the bill was postponed to Monday next.

TUESDAY, January 25.

Drawback on Manufactured Hemp.

The Senate resumed the unfinished business of yesterday—the bill for allowing a drawback on the exportation of cordage manufactured from imported hemp.

Messrs. D'WOLF, and LLOYD of Mass., spoke in favor of the bill, which was opposed by Messrs. EDWARDS, and JOHNSON of Ken.

The question being taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, it was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Laman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Brown, Boulligny, Chandler, Dickerson, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, Lowrie, McIlvaine, McLean, Macon, Talbot, Taylor, Tazewell, Williams—25.

So the bill was rejected.

Internal Trade with Mexico.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill reported by Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, on the 11th inst., to authorize the President to cause a road to be marked out from the frontier of Missouri to the confines of New Mexico, and making appropriations therefor. The bill having been read through—

Mr. BENTON rose and said, that the petitions presented by the inhabitants of Missouri, and the communication derived from Mr. STORRS, had proved the existence of an inland trade between the valley of the Mississippi and the internal provinces of Mexico. They had shown also, he said, the dangers to which the trade was subject, from Indian depredation on the way, and arbitrary exactions after it arrived. The Indians, prone to robbery and murder, attacked and pillaged the caravans; the Provincial authorities, separated by an immense distance from the parent Government, imposed arbitrary duties on the merchandise imported. To relieve the trade from those dangers and impositions, the citizens of Missouri had addressed themselves to the Congress of the United States, and claimed the interposition of its powerful protection. They have asked, said Mr. B., among other things, for the right of an unmolested passage, protected by treaty stipulations, through the territories of the intervening tribes, and for the appointment of agents, with suitable powers, to reside at Santa Fe and Chihuahua. In deciding upon these requests, the committee to whom the subject was referred, and whose organ I have the honor to be, have held it to be their duty to inquire strictly into the value of the trade for which protection is sought, the probability of its continuance, and its effect upon the social and political, as well as upon the commercial relations of the two countries. They have inquired, accordingly, and, finding the results to be favorable to the object of the petitioners, they have instructed me to report the bill which has been read at your table.

The question being now put, "Shall this bill pass?" I feel myself, said Mr. B., called upon by the novelty of its propositions, by my position as chairman of the committee which reported it, and, above all, by the relation in which I stand with respect to those who are chiefly interested in its passage, to state the reasons which induce me to give an affirmative answer to that question.

First then, sir, said Mr. B., it does seem to me that the trade between Missouri and Mexico is sufficiently valuable to merit the favor of the national protection. It opens a new and extensive market for the cotton goods grown and manufactured in our own country; a market not circumscribed by the walls of a town, or the shores of an island, but spreading over an area of a million of square miles. The seven internal provinces are equal in extent to seven of the principal kingdoms of Europe put together. They are large enough to give rise and outlet to a river washing more territory than the Danube—the Rio del Norte, which traverses sixteen parallels of latitude, and finds in three provinces only, in those called Eastern, an ample space in which to unfold its enormous length. The resources of this extensive region are rich and various. The mountainous districts abound with furred animals; the plains with mules, horses, and cattle; and the central parts with gold and silver mines. The population, exclusive of that description of Indians which the Spaniards call "Indios Bravos," amounts to 600,000 souls, and increases with the rapidity only known to new countries, where manners are simple, the means of subsistence abundant, and land a free gift to all that will take it. The trade of a people inhabiting a country so vast, possessing resources so rich, and increasing in numbers as rapidly as ourselves, must doubtless be valuable. It has already yielded, for the present year, $190,000, in gold and silver coin, and bullion, and precious furs; and this sum, although considerable in itself, is only a beginning and an earnest of what may be expected when the trade is protected and carried to the extent of which it is capable.

The trade promises to be permanent. The internal provinces are naturally dependent upon the valley of the Mississippi for their supplies of foreign goods. They bind upon each other for more than a thousand miles. The Red River, the Arkansas, and the Kansas, furnish different lines of water communication; and the land route is free from obstructions to the march of wagons and carriages, and abounding with the means of subsistence for men and horses. This interior region, so open to access from the valley of the Mississippi, is almost unapproachable from every other side. It is separated from Mexico proper, by distance, by deserts, and by mountains. It is cut off from the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the same barriers. Its interior position has acquired for it the emphatic title of "Provincias Internas," and induced the Kings of Spain to favor it with a government of itself, independent of the Viceroy of Mexico. To aggravate the evil of such a position, is the want of navigable rivers. The Rio del Norte, though magnified by the Spaniards by the imposing titles of "Bravo," and "Grande," is yet only brave in a war upon sand, and only great in the distance which it runs. Of the two thousand miles which it displays in length, no more than four or five hundred, and these towards its head, are fit for navigation; all the rest is choked up with sand. Akin to this evil is another—the want of convenient seaports. The internal provinces may be said to be without seaports. Guaymas, in the Gulf of California, is small in itself, not readily approached, and separated from the valley of the Rio del Norte, by some hundred leagues of distance, and the lofty ridge of Sierra Madra, San Bernardo and Galveston, on the coast of Texas, are nothing but anchorages, and separated by great distances from the rich and populous provinces. Vera Cruz, Tampico, Alvarado, and Acapulco, are about as far off as our Pittsburg is from the town of Santa Fe. They are as far off in measured miles, and about ten or twenty times further in the difference of transportation. From the Mexican ports, the whole route to Santa Fe is over land, and the backs of mules the only means of conveyance. From Pittsburg, the entire distance, with the exception of a mere fraction, is a water line of river navigation. Look at the maps. See the Ohio running a thousand miles direct from Pittsburg towards Santa Fe; then see the Kansas, the Arkansas, and Red River, running directly from it, and meeting the Ohio in the central channel of the Mississippi. Thus not only St. Louis and the towns on the Missouri River, but those on the Ohio, and even those on the seaboard of the Atlantic States, are nearer to Santa Fe than either Vera Cruz, Acapulco, or any other Mexican port. But the decision of the question does not depend upon a view of the maps. It is already solved. The merchandise which is now carried from Missouri to the Internal provinces, is the same which had been previously brought down the Ohio from the Atlantic ports and factories. The cotton goods thus carried out, bear the stamps of Arkwright and Waltham, and are the same which, after paying the cotton-grower for the raw material, and leaving a profit in the hands of the manufacturer, the first, second, and third sellers, and giving employment to numerous carriers, are still sold at another profit in the Internal provinces, and yet sold so low as to drive out of market every competitor from the Mexican ports. This fact, so important to the legislator, is vouched by Mr. STORMS, who informs us that the arbitrary duty imposed by provincial authority, upon American importations, was imposed at the instance of the traders from the Mexican ports, to enable them to contend with those who derive their supplies from the seaboard of our north Atlantic States. Allied by nature, the Internal provinces are now allied in fact, with the valley of the Mississippi. For ages they had been separated by the power of man. The jealousy of despotism had raised between them a barrier of interdicts, more impassable than walls of stone or brass. But liberty has raised her head, and the barrier is overthrown. Our adventurous citizens enter, and unless checked by the government, they will make the inland trade to Mexico as permanent as are the localities, and the liberties of their countries.

To the people of the West, I know this trade to be an object of the greatest value. Their own interior position cuts them off from foreign commerce. The Mexicans are their neighbors, and the only foreign power with whom they can trade. It is one of the few sources from which they can derive the precious metals. The coin already brought in, constitutes the circulating medium of the country in the western parts of Missouri. It is paid into the offices for public lands, and then comes into the coffers of the Government, whose protection it now solicits.

But it is not the West alone which is benefited by this trade. The North and the South participate in her profits. The South grows the cotton, the North works it up, and the West exports it; thus displaying one of the most beautiful operations of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, mutually dependent upon, and mutually aiding each other.

That the trade will be beneficial to the inhabitants of the Internal provinces, is a proposition too plain to be argued. They are a people among whom all the arts are lost—the ample catalogue of whose wants may be inferred from the lamentable details of Mr. STORMS. No books! no newspapers! iron a dollar a pound! cultivating the earth with wooden tools! and spinning upon a stick! Such is the picture of a people whose fathers wore the proud title of "Conquerors:" whose ancestors, in the time of Charles the Fifth, were the pride, the terror, and the model of Europe; and such has been the power of civil and religious despotism in accomplishing the degradation of the human species! To a people thus abased, and so lately arrived at the possession of their liberties, a supply of merchandise, upon the cheapest terms, is the least of the benefits to be derived from a commerce with the people of the United States. The consolidation of their republican institutions, the improvement of their moral and social condition, the restoration of their lost arts, and the development of their national resources, are among the grand results which philanthropy anticipates from such a commerce.

Thus, Mr. President, I think it is fairly demonstrated that the trade in question is worthy of the national protection. The next inquiry is—Will the Government protect it? I answer that the claim for protection rests on the same principle which carries protection to the commerce of the Union upon every sea, in the most remote countries, and upon distant isles. Our maritime commerce requires ships, treaties, ambassadors, consuls, and successive wars, to protect it. The inland trade to Mexico, requires a right of way, to be purchased from the Indians, and two or three commercial agents to be stationed in the Internal provinces. At this very moment we are enacting, with the greatest unanimity, measures of a war character against the pirates of Cuba; and for what? To protect the lives and merchandise of our citizens, in passing through the Gulf of Mexico. And will you not protect the same citizens in going to Mexico by land as well as by water? Will you not protect them against Indians as well as against pirates? Will you lavish your sympathy upon a citizen hung by a pirate, and deny your compassion to a citizen shot and butchered by an Indian? The story of piratical murders has been told to you in language which harrows up the soul; now listen to a plain statement of robberies and murders committed upon our citizens on their way to Mexico.

"Mr. Choteau was attacked upon an island in the Arkansas River, by 800 Pawnees. They were repulsed with the loss of thirty killed and wounded, and declared it to be the most bloody affair in which they had ever been engaged. This was their first acquaintance with American arms. In 1822, Mr. Maxwell was killed, and another American wounded, by the Camanches, near the mountains. In 1823, the Pawnees killed a Spaniard, on the Arkansas, in the service of William Anderson, and forcibly took from him thirteen mules. The company which went out last summer had upwards of forty horses and mules stolen, about fifteen miles south of the Arkansas, by the Oamanches, who lost one man in the affair. The same company, thirty-two in number, encountered, on their return, a war party of eighty Pawnees. The war-whoop was raised, and both parties drew up for action; but the enemy agreed to a compromise when they found that they could not rob without losing the lives of their warriors. In the winter of 1822-'23, Mr. John McNight, of St. Louis, was killed by the Oamanches, at some distance south of the Arkansas."

The use of an unmolested passage between Mexico and the United States, is as necessary in a political, as in a commercial point of view. They are neighboring powers, inhabitants of the same continent, their territories contiguous, and their settlements approximating to each other. They are the two chief powers of the New World, and stand at the head of that cordon of Republics, which, stretching from pole to pole, across the two Americas, are destined to make the last stand in defence of human liberty. They have the legitimates of Europe in front, and the Autocrat of all the Russias in the rear. They are Republican, and Republics have become "the abhorred thing," the existence of which is not to be tolerated in the land. The time was, Mr. President, when the kingdom and the republic could exist together; when the Swiss, the Dutch, and the Venetian republics were the friends and allies of kings and emperors. But that day has gone by. The time has come, when the monarch and the republican can no longer breathe the same atmosphere. A speck of republicanism above the political horizon now throws all Europe into commotion. Telegraphs play, couriers fly, armies move, the Cossacks of the Don and of the Ukraine couch their lances, kings and emperors vault into their saddles; a million of bayonets turn their remorseless points against the portentous sign! We Americans (I use the word in the broadest sense) we Americans see and hear all this, yet we remain strangers to each other, form no associations, and our communications are as tardy and as difficult as they are between the inhabitants of Africa and Asia. Even with Mexico, our nearest neighbor, we have no communication, except by a sea voyage, through a boisterous gulf, infested with pirates. The bill before you is intended to correct a part of this evil; it will make "straight the way" between the United States and Mexico; it will open an easy channel of communication between them, not for merchandise only, but for thoughts and ideas; for books and for newspapers, and for every description of travellers. It will bring together the two nations whose power and whose positions, make them responsible to the world for the preservation of the Republican system. And shall a measure of such moment be defeated by a parcel of miserable barbarians, Arabs of the desert, incapable of appreciating our policy, and placing a higher value upon the gun of a murdered hunter, than upon the preservation of all the republics in the world!

To the Indians themselves the opening of a road through their country is an object of vital importance. It is connected with the preservation and improvement of their race. For two hundred years the problem of Indian civilization has been successively presented to each generation of the Americans, and solved by each in the same way. Schools have been set up, colleges founded, and missions established; a wonderful success has attended the commencement of every undertaking; and, after some time, the schools, the colleges, the missions, and the Indians, have all disappeared together. In the South alone have we seen an exception. There the nations have preserved themselves, and have made a cheering progress in the arts of civilization. Their advance is the work of twenty years. It dates its commencement from the opening of roads through their country. Roads induced separate families to settle at the crossings of rivers, to establish themselves at the best springs and tracts of land, and to begin to sell grain and provisions to the travellers, whom a few years before they would kill and plunder. This imparted the idea of exclusive property in the soil, and created an attachment for a fixed residence. Gradually, fields were opened, houses built, orchards planted, flocks and herds acquired, and slaves bought. The acquisition of these comforts, relieving the body from the torturing wants of cold and hunger, placed the mind in a condition to pursue its improvement. This, Mr. President, is the true secret of the happy advance which the Southern tribes have made in acquiring the arts of civilization; this has fitted them for the reception of schools and missions; and, doubtless, the same cause will produce the same effects among the tribes beyond, which it has produced among the tribes on this side of the Mississippi.

The right of way is indispensable, and the committee have begun with directing a bill to be reported for that purpose. Happily, there are no constitutional objections to it. State rights are in no danger! The road which is contemplated will trespass upon the soil, or infringe upon the jurisdiction of no State whatsoever. It runs a course and a distance to avoid all that; for it begins upon the outside line of the outside State, and runs directly off towards the setting sun. The Congress and the Indians are alone to be consulted, and the statute-book is full of precedents. Protesting against the necessity of producing precedents for an act in itself pregnant with propriety, I will yet name a few, in order to illustrate the policy of the Government, and show its readiness to make roads through Indian countries to facilitate the intercourse of its citizens.

1. A road from Nashville to Natchez, through the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations, by an act of Congress of 1806—appropriation, $6,000.

2. A road through the Creek nation from Athens, in Georgia, to the 31st degree of north latitude, in the direction to New Orleans—act of 1806—appropriation, $6,400.

3. A road from the Mississippi to the Ohio, through the north-west territory—act of 1806—appropriation, $6,000.

4. Three roads through the Cherokee nation, to open an intercourse between Georgia, Tennessee, and the lower Mississippi, by treaty of 1805.

5. A road from Shawneetown to Kaskaskia—act of 1816—appropriation, $8,000.

6. Repairing the road from Nashville to Natchez, within the Indian nations—act of 1816—$7,920 appropriated.

7, 8, and 9. By acts of 1824, that is to say, at the last session of the present Congress, and by the same members to whom I now speak, and sitting in the same chairs in which they now sit, three roads were authorized to be made. One from the Chickasaw Bluffs, on the Mississippi, to Little Rock, in the territory of Arkansas—$15,000 appropriated. One from Pensacola to St. Augustine—appropriation, $20,000. One from the State of Ohio to Detroit—appropriation, $20,000.

These instances are enough, in all conscience, to show the readiness of the Government to open roads through Indian territories. But, in following out the road from Missouri to Mexico, a perverse circumstance intervenes; we are met in the way by the boundary line of the United States, and a road upon foreign territory is a novel subject of legislation in the American Congress. Mr. President, I had always been opposed to this boundary of 1819. I was opposed to it as a line inconvenient in itself, not adapted to the localities of the country, uncovering the flank of Louisiana, dismembering the valley of the Mississippi, cutting off a province to which our title was admitted, placing a foreign people upon the heads of our rivers, and giving them a right (under the law of nations) to navigate those rivers through the heart of Louisiana. For these reasons, and two more, which I have not enumerated, I had always been opposed to the boundary line of 1819; and I liked it still less, when I found it a stumbling-block in my road to Mexico, and a protecting barrier to the cruel Camanches, who kill and rob our citizens. It is true, I could see no reason for not continuing the road with the consent of the Mexican Government, through the unoccupied territory of that power; but the novelty of the thing was appalling; and gentlemen might call for a precedent, although they should find it impossible to start an argument against it. Well, sir, I have a precedent; one which is strictly analogous, directly in point, up to the exigency of the occasion; one which needs not the bed of Procrustes to fit it to the case for which it is wanted. I speak of a road from Georgia to New Orleans, in the year 1807, under the administration of President Jefferson.

In the year 1806, the President had been authorized to open a road from the frontier of Georgia to the 31st degree of north latitude, in the direction of New Orleans. In the year 1807, he was authorized to continue the same road from the 31st degree to the city of New Orleans, under such regulations as might be agreed upon with the Government of Spain. The first part of this road lay through the territories of the Creek Indians; the second, through the dominions of the King of Spain. It is the prototype of the road from Missouri to Mexico. The two sections of the bill which we have before us, are nothing but transcripts, with a change of names, from the two acts of 1806-'07. Here are the acts:

ACT OF 1806.

"Sec. 7. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause a road to be opened from the frontier of Georgia, on the route from Athens to New Orleans, till the same intersects the thirty-first degree of North latitude: Provided, he shall not expend more than $8,400 in opening the same."

ACT OF 1807.

"Sec. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause a road to be opened from the thirty-first degree of North latitude to New Orleans, on the route from Athens to New Orleans, under such regulations as may be agreed upon for that purpose, between the Executive of the United States and the Spanish Government; and he is hereby authorized to expend, in opening the same, any part of the money heretofore appropriated for opening a road on the said route from the frontier of Georgia to the thirty-first degree of North latitude, which remains unexpended."

For a knowledge of this precedent, I am indebted to a conversation with Mr. Jefferson himself. In a late excursion to Virginia, I availed myself of a broken day to call and pay my respects to that patriarchal statesman. The individual must manage badly, Mr. President, who can find himself in the presence of that great man, and retire from it without bringing off some great fact, or some maxim, of eminent utility to the human race. I trust that I did not so manage. I trust that, in bringing off a fact which led to the discovery of the precedent, which is to remove the only serious objection to the road in question, I have done a service, if not to the human family, at least to the citizens of the two greatest Republics in the world. It was on the evening of Christmas day that I called upon Mr. Jefferson. The conversation, among other things, turned upon roads. He spoke of one from Georgia to New Orleans, made during the last term of his own administration. He said there was a manuscript map of it in the Library of Congress, (formerly his own,) bound up in a certain volume of maps, which he described to me. On my return to Washington, I searched the statute book, and I found the acts which authorized the road to be made; they are the same which I have just read to the Senate. I searched the Congress Library, and I found the volume of maps which he had described; and here it is, (presenting a huge folio,) and there is the map of the road from Georgia to New Orleans, more than two hundred miles of which, marked in blue ink, is traced through the dominions of the King of Spain!

With this triumphant precedent, I leave the fate of the bill to the wisdom and to the justice of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER put one or two questions on the subject, which were answered by Mr. BENTON, as to distances, &c., after which

The bill was, on motion of Mr. CHANDLER, laid over until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 26.

Internal Trade between Missouri and New Mexico.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be marked out a road from the line of the State of Missouri, to the confines of New Mexico.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, to strike out the second section of the bill, (which provides for marking out that part of the road in the Mexican territory.)

Mr. CHANDLER said, that he had not yet been satisfied that Congress had a right to take the money from the pockets of the people of the United States, to lay out or expend in what is termed internal improvements, that is, to make roads and canals within the limits of any State in the Union. Gentlemen may tell me that this proposition does not come within the objection, as it is without the limits of any State; true, from five to seven hundred miles of the contemplated road are within the limits of the United States, and probably at least three hundred miles of it, not only without the limits of any State, but out of the limits of the United States, and within the territory of another power, to wit, that of Mexico. As I before observed, I have never been able to find, in the Constitution of the United States, authority given to Congress to lay out and make roads within the limits of any State in the Union, and there would, at least, be as much difficulty in finding authority for taking the money of the people, and therewith to mark out or survey roads within the dominions of another sovereign power. By the bill, sir, I perceive that we are to provide by treaty with the Indians, for the right of passing unmolested through the territory which they inhabit, and if those Indians should afterwards prove refractory, or take it into their heads to refuse us a passage through the country which they inhabit, why then, I suppose, we must submit to their caprice, or make war upon them, within the territory of Mexico. For, I presume, the line of this road will not be the line which divides that part of the country which is inhabited by Indians, from that which is not; nor is it probable that the line between the United States and Mexico will divide the country which is occupied by the Indians from that which is not. Viewing the whole subject as I do, sir, I must be better satisfied of the propriety of the measure than I now am, or I cannot vote for the bill.

Mr. BENTON observed, he could answer the gentleman's objection with great ease. They were only going to treat with the Indians within the territories of the United States, and afterwards mark out the road through the Mexican territories, with their consent.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, asked, whether it would not be acceptable to the honorable mover of this bill, to limit the intended road to the boundary of the United States? There was a very great difference between making a road in our own territory, and in that of another power, even with their own consent. He thought there was a strong impropriety in making roads for other people. However, he wished no argument on the subject, but would move to strike out the second section of the bill.

The second section is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause the marking of the said road to be continued from the boundary line of the United States to the frontier of New Mexico, under such regulations as may be agreed upon for that purpose between the Executive of the United States and the Mexican government."

Mr. LOWRIE said, if this appropriation could be asked for at all, it was on the ground of protecting the commerce of the United States; and if that principle were admitted, it would require some ingenuity to show why an appropriation, which was to be expended beyond the territory of the United States, should not be made to the West, when so much was doing, and had been done, for the East? He adverted to the sums annually expended in keeping a fleet in the Mediterranean for the protection of commerce; and mentioned, as a case strongly in point, the negotiation opened by the Executive, during the last summer, with foreign Governments respecting the erection of a light-house on one of the West India islets.

Mr. BARTON said, this bill amounted to nothing more than a declaration by Congress of a power exercised by the President of the United States in the case just mentioned. The duty and the power of the Executive will remain precisely the same; as the bill merely requests the President to cause a thing to be done, under certain regulations, which he had the power to do without the request. He could see nothing in this section incompatible with the rights or dignity of the Government. He hoped, therefore, the section would not be stricken out.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, thought there was no constitutional objection to the proposed measure, as the Government might, if they thought proper, make a road in the territory of a foreign power, as well as within our own, provided they obtained the consent of that power. The Mexican Government were equally interested with the United States in the prosperity of this trade, and therefore, if they thought it worth their while, they would and ought to do their part. It would be sufficient if we were to mark out the road to the boundary line, and let them meet us there. We were, in his opinion, a little premature in offering to mark out a road through the whole line, in their territory as well as our own, and then to ask for permission to mark it out beyond the boundary. The Mexican Government must be aware of the value of the trade, and if they did not choose to meet us, it would be a fair presumption that they did not want to trade with us. He should, therefore, vote for the amendment.

Mr. VAN BUREN thought that the Government was called upon to afford the same protection to these people, who were engaged in a foreign trade, that was extended to those of the other parts of the Union. The only questions were, whether this trade existed, and whether it was a trade according to the laws and constitution. If so, they have a right to call on the Government for protection; provided it could be given without infringing on any rights. The means proposed were, to mark out a road, and treat with the Indians for a safe passage. The motion to amend the bill was founded, he thought, on a mistaken view of the subject. It was not to make a road, that the appropriation was asked for, but to mark out, merely, the way the traders should go. This was to be done by negotiation with the Indians on this side of the line, and by negotiation with the Mexican Government, on the other side; and the appropriation of $30,000 was for this purpose. He did not apprehend, therefore, that any valid objection could exist. They were not going into a foreign country to make a road, but to treat with the Indians, and mark the way they should travel.

Mr. MAOON did not think this a matter of great importance. Most of the estates, said he, in my part of the country, were originally made by trading with the Indians, and that trade was carried on by traces; but we have got grander than our ancestors, and can't trade with the Indians now without roads being made. I don't care, said he, for precedents; if they are good, I am willing to follow them; if not, I won't regard them. They are, generally, good or bad, as they happen to suit or oppose our wishes. The case of the road made by Mr. Jefferson, was among Indians comparatively civilized, who had some notions of property; but the road proposed now to be marked out, would pass through tribes perfectly wild, who, as soon as they see a white man, think of nothing but to fight and kill him, if they are able. There was nothing that could be secured by negotiating with these wild and savage people. Make what bargain you please with them, they will continue to commit depredations on your traders, whenever they see a good opportunity. It would, therefore, do no good to treat with them. As to the Spaniards, with whom this trade was carried on, Mr. M. said they may have a great deal of money, but, generally, money and knowledge went together; and, though he could not say any thing of their character himself, the description given of them, yesterday, by the gentleman from Missouri, was not very favorable. But, Mr. M. said, as the friendship of these Indians could not be bought, he thought it would be safer for the traders to go through their country by different routes, than to have but one, which would give the Indians the best opportunities for ambush, and committing depredation and murder.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said that he was always happy to have his worthy friend from North Carolina, (Mr. MAOON,) with him in any measure of legislation. He recollected that, during the session, his friend had supported him in a very important proposition, and he should not forget the delight which he experienced in having with him a member so distinguished for long services and integrity of principle. On this occasion, he had entertained some hopes that the gentleman from North Carolina would agree to appropriate $10,000, to find out the best and most direct trace for the enterprising citizen of the West to pursue his trade to Santa Fe, and the western parts of Mexico, when the West had never hesitated to vote for any measure which was necessary to protect the lives or property of our seafaring citizens. Do you call for fortifications? We vote the money to make them. Do you want an increase of the Navy, to secure our commerce upon the high seas, and to secure our seaboard in case of war? We grant the sum necessary to accomplish the object. Do you want additional sloops of war, and additional means to suppress piracy? We give the money, till the Executive Government says "enough." You have asked for $500,000 this year, to suppress piracy in the West Indies: we are ready to give it. We ask for $10,000, to facilitate our trade with Santa Fe, and to take measures to secure our enterprising citizens in their lives and their property while pursuing that lucrative and important trade. The pirates in the West Indian seas are stealing the property of our citizens, and murdering the officers and crews of your merchant vessels, without regard to age or sex; and annually, upon our interior and territorial frontier, our citizens are murdered by the natives of our forests. Every blast which crosses the great mountains of the Alleghany, brings the groans of the dying enterprising trader of the West, murdered by the Indian. Do not our citizens stand upon an equality, whether they be upon the high seas, or in the great American desert, extending to the Rocky Mountains? I feel the same indignation, whether I see the hands of the pirate, or the hands of the savage of the wilderness, imbrued in the blood of our fellow-citizens. I feel the same indignation, whether that citizen be a hardy tar of the ocean, a citizen of the Rocky Mountains, or a resident of this metropolis. Another view is presented to my mind: we have many objects of national expenditure in the West, and it is the duty of Congress to make annual appropriations, out of the funds of the Government in the West, towards these objects—additional military posts should be established—the Cumberland road should be extended to Missouri—a western armory should be erected, and a military armory should be established in some part of the Western States. I hope Congress will not forget the provision in the constitution, as to the regulations of commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. While we build our ships of war, erect fortifications, and appropriate millions for the security of commerce and defence of our maritime frontier, we ask the sum of $10,000 for a great and important object of internal trade, and the security of those concerned in it in the Western country. Can this appropriation be denied to us? I presume it cannot. We have done nothing more than our duty, in doing all we have done for foreign commerce, and for the security of our maritime frontier; nor can we refuse what is necessary for the commerce and security of the West.

Mr. MACON replied, that the case of the light-house, in the West Indies, could hardly be called a precedent, that it was not done by authority of Congress. As to the expense of protecting commerce in the West India seas, from pirates, &c., Mr. M. said it was as much for the benefit of the people of the Western States, as of any other part of the Union, as the products of the West were necessarily transported through those waters, and the people who furnished the cargo, were as much interested in the safety of the commerce, as the owner of the vessel, &c.

Mr. KELLY, of Alabama, said, he trespassed with great reluctance on the attention of the Senate. The great object of the bill is to cherish and foster a commerce already in existence, between the American and Mexican republics. That commerce, to be mutually beneficial, must be regulated and protected, and placed upon a footing of safety and reciprocity by the respective Governments. This commerce must be carried on by land, through several Indian tribes. To be safe, a road must be had, a right of way, or a trace, if you please, secured. To answer the object, this trace must pass the boundary of the United States, and extend for several hundred miles through the wilderness country, in the Mexican republic, to the settlements with whom the traffic must be carried on. Now, sir, to stop the "trace" at the boundary of the United States, would leave this intervening Mexican wilderness to obstruct the proposed intercourse. Why should this be left? I cannot agree, said Mr. K., with the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES,) that we have done enough in going to our own boundary, and that we may leave the balance to the Mexican Government. It may be well to remember that the Mexican Government is in the germ of its existence, struggling with difficulties that we have long since surmounted; and, without intending any disrespect to the population of Mexico, we may say, in the most friendly manner, that they are less intelligent in commercial matters than we are; and, although, to us, the advantages of this commerce are clear and obvious, they may not be so to them; and, however reasonable the calculation may be that they will meet us at the boundary line, and mark the trace through their own territory, I cannot help feeling some doubt, myself, that they may fail to do so as promptly as the commerce in question requires it should be done. It occurs to me, then, as the most rational mode of legislating on this subject, to approach the Mexican Government in a language best of all calculated to obtain promptly the object in view. It may be true, as stated by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) that, in days of yore, many persons made fortunes by traffic with the neighboring Indians, when they had to trudge along "a trace;" and, although this be true, as a fact, I am still willing to travel on a road, when I can find one; and this, it seems to me, may be done by the men of the present day, without incurring the charge of irreverence to their ancestors. And, although this traffic may have been thus profitable, without the aid of Government, I am confident it would have been on a better footing if it had been under the protection of the Government. I have no idea that Indian depredation is to cease on the establishment of this trace, but I believe that less blood will be shed, and less property plundered, under proposed regulations by the Government, than it can be if left to unaided individual enterprise.

Mr. TALBOT thought, that, if the section were struck out, the effect of the bill would be destroyed. He argued to show that it would be far better, before commencing the road, to enter into negotiation, and arrange every thing with the Mexican Government; because, if the United States were to adopt a route, and do their part without an understanding with the other Government, the route might not be located to please the Mexican Government, and the money expended would be wasted. Why not retain the section that authorized the negotiation with the Mexican Government for every thing that was required?

Mr. SMITH thought that the advantages of this commerce might be held out to the Mexican Government, and when they found that they could get their goods on more reasonable terms, they would be induced to join with the United States in making this road. He should vote for the bill, but from a different view of it from that taken by his friend from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON.) Mr. S. thought that sufficient occasions for expending the public money always presented themselves, without seeking them; he repelled the assertion, that the interest of the Eastern States had always been preferred to that of the West—and asserted that the Eastern members voted for all the measures beneficial to the people of the West. He cited many great objects of expense: the Cumberland road; the military works at Mackinaw, and on the Lakes, &c., to show that the interests of the West were not neglected. He did not like the argument that went to prove that one part of the Union was hostile to the other. The only question with him was, whether commerce could be carried on there to advantage, and, as he was satisfied it could be, he should vote for the bill.

Mr. BROWN was very glad to hear such sentiments fall from the honorable gentleman, and hoped that a reciprocal good feeling would always exist. He thought there could be no objections to the bill, and approved the proposition to treat with the Mexican Government. He differed from his friend from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON.) This was something more than Indian trade, and it did not at all follow that, because, in former times, large fortunes were made by the Indian trader, who had traces, that no road should be marked out now.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, had been very much misunderstood if he had been supposed to make the motion with feelings hostile to the bill—he was in favor of it—the mere trifle of money proposed, was nothing—he was opposed to the principle of laying out money in the territories of a foreign power. If it were for the mutual advantage of both parties, the Mexican Government would of course be as ready as we were; but, if it were not, then they would not suffer us to enjoy it. As to the expenditures made for the protection of commerce on the ocean, Mr. L. said it was for the benefit of all—it was not a local interest. The only way that the revenue was procured, was by commerce, and it was the duty of the Government to afford it every protection in its power. He should be pleased to see the road opened; it would pass through a most fertile country, and open a communication between, as the gentleman expressed it, two of the most splendid republics in the universe. Would not the Mexican Government, having a population of seven millions of souls, and gold and silver mines at command, furnish $3,000 for her share? Yes, if the project pleased them, they could give five hundred times as much; and, if they did not like it, that was another consideration. If the gentleman would alter the phraseology of the bill as Mr. L. had suggested, he would vote for it.

Mr. BENTON was well aware of the weight of the objection urged by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, and he was satisfied also that the gentleman was not influenced by pecuniary motives. It was naturally a question of policy, and a subject to which his attention had been previously turned by the precedent he had yesterday cited in justification of the section proposed to be struck out. Although this proposition went by the name of a road, yet, Mr. B. said, it was not so in fact; all that was proposed to be done, was to cast up mounds of earth and sand, and pyramids of stones, to mark out the way. Without a figure, they might be called light-houses; for they were, in point of fact, guides to the passenger. The present measure differed from the act of 1807, authorizing a road to be opened through Florida in two points: that road went through the settlements belonging to the King of Spain, and was a road, properly speaking; this was merely a track, and passed only through the unoccupied parts of the Mexican territory. It was argued that, if this trade were beneficial to the people of Mexico, they would meet us half way; but it was very easy to imagine a trade that was more beneficial to one party than another. We, said Mr. B., are the carriers, and it is we who have need of the road to travel upon; but it is idle to expect that these people will make roads; they are blinded by ignorance. As an instance, he mentioned that the province of New Mexico has been established for more than 150 years. The commerce between Mexico and Santa Fe is carried on by means of mules; the journey there and back occupies five months; and, during the whole period mentioned, has passed but by one route; yet it is a fact, that, on this whole route, there is not such a thing as a bridge, except such as are composed of poles put side by side, such as only our dogs would cross, and such holes were suffered to exist in them, that our men, and even our dogs, would be in danger of breaking their legs. If, then, for so many years, they have not thought it worth while to make a better road for this valuable branch of commerce, how are we to expect them to co-operate here? We are not to expect any thing more from them than the privilege to mark out the way.

The question was then taken on striking out the second section, and negatived—ayes 15, noes 28; and the bill was ordered to a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Boulogny, Brown, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards, Elliott, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, McIlvaine, McLean, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke—30.

Suppression of Piracy.

[SENATE.]

MONDAY, January 31.

Suppression of Piracy.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill "for the Suppression of Piracy in the West Indies;" the motion to strike out the third section, which authorizes the blockade of the ports of Cuba, (under certain circumstances,) being still pending—

Mr. MILLS rose, and said, this bill has already undergone a full discussion, and the chairman of the committee has acquitted himself so entirely to my satisfaction, that I do not wish to trench on the ground which he has so ably occupied.

The first question that presents itself is, what is the object of the bill now before us? Sir, it is the suppression of piracy, the foulest crime of which man can be guilty—a crime which shuts him out of the pale of civilized society, renders him the enemy of the whole human race, and amenable to the laws of every civilized country—a crime, of the perpetration of which it may truly be said, that "his hand is against every man, and every man's hand against him." The next inquiry is, is it necessary that any further legislative measures should be resorted to, to effect this object, so desirable in itself? Have we now sufficient provision by law, without legislative aid for the suppression of this most atrocious offence? Sir, I shall not enter into the horrid detail of the cursed atrocities of these monsters, and of the abominable extent to which they have carried their depredations. The tidings are wafted to your ears on every gale. The representation of respectable individuals, the communications from your authorized agent on the island, the united voice of the whole commercial part of the country, the official reports of the Navy Department, and the recommendation of the President, all combine to stimulate you to provide some legislative measure for the suppression of these horrors. I hope, then, you will not turn a deaf ear to these united and repeated applications. It seems the unanimous opinion that some new proposition should be adopted; that the legislature should do something; and the great question is, whether the measures recommended by the committee are suitable and proper for the emergency? To some of these propositions no objection has yet been made, and I trust none will be. And in deciding the question that is submitted to us, we must look to the practical and probable results of it. This appears to me to be the part which wisdom would dictate. We ought not to be deterred by remote and possible inconveniences, embarrassments, and dangers, much less by imaginary difficulties, from prosecuting that course which promises the most beneficial results. It is very easy for ingenuity to start objections to almost any course, and if these objections are listened to on every occasion, no measure of importance would ever be adopted.

The motion now immediately before the Senate is, to strike out the third section of the bill. To decide this question, we must not look at the third section of the bill, alone and insulated, but see how it is connected with the other parts of the bill, and what bearing it has on them. To examine what tendency it has to assist in carrying into effect the previous provisions contained in the bill, more especially is it necessary to compare its provisions with those of the second section.

The twenty-ninth section authorizes the commanders of our armed ships in fresh pursuit, to land on the coasts of this island, to capture and destroy the pirates. Now, sir, the third section is intended to strengthen this power, and ensure its execution in case of the single event of their taking refuge in any of the ports or cities of the island, and there finding protection. On this condition alone, is it that the third section will ever be brought into operation.

It is said that the third section provides for blockade, that blockade is a war measure, and only to be resorted to flagrante bello, as one of the rights of war. Sir, I agree to this general proposition, and regard a blockade in time of peace as somewhat of an anomaly, but entirely justified by the anomalous situation in which we are placed: for, such is our situation, that none but an anomalous remedy can be efficaciously applied to the evil. It is often necessary to shape our course according to circumstances, and adopt under one set of circumstances, a measure, which, under others, would be improper if not totally unjustifiable.

But, sir, with whom are we at war? Are we at war with Spain? No sir. Shall we, when a blockade is instituted under the limitations contained in the third section of the bill, be at war with Spain? No, sir. It is only an additional remedy for the suppression of this enormous evil—the only means of securing the success of the enterprise. With whom, then, are we at war? With none but those with whom all the nations of the earth are at war—with pirates. On what terms is this blockade to be instituted? After they have found shelter and protection in the ports of the island; when the civil power has thrown over them the shield of authority; is this to be submitted to? Can Spain complain with any shadow of justice? If she is unable to check the progress of these bandits, and if she really wishes to discharge the great duty she owes to the whole civilized world, so far from uttering a complaint, she will co-operate with us in any measures we may adopt for its suppression. If the local authorities are conniving at these depredations, and sharing the spoil with these robbers, and they find refuge and protection from them, then nothing can be more clear than that they make themselves a particeps criminis, accessories after the fact, and are liable to the same punishments as the pirates themselves. In this case you only blockade a penses of treating with the Indiana, for their consent to the establishment and use thereof; the said sums to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated.

port which has been converted into a den of pirates, and put itself out of the protection of the laws of nations. Spain must place herself in this situation, as companion of the pirates, if she complains, under these circumstances, that you invade her rights of sovereignty by taking them in their fastnesses. But, sir, we do not impute any such designs to Spain; we do not suppose she wishes to encourage these villainies; we impute it alone to her imbecility that they are suffered to exist, and the whole civilized world will justify us in our proceeding.

Suppose, sir, that, whilst we were in fresh pursuit of a piratical vessel, she should come athwart a Spanish armed ship, and that ship should shelter the pirates with her guns, would it be an attack on the sovereign rights of Spain if you were to reclaim the piratical vessel, and if necessary, to force her from the vessel that was thus protecting her? Could Spain complain of this with any justice? No, sir, she could not. By the act of affording them shelter, in this fresh pursuit, they would make themselves pirates, and subject themselves to the punishment due to pirates. Where then is the difference between protection extended to a piratical ship on the ocean, and protection extended to a piratical crew on land? Let us suppose, sir, that this piratical vessel, instead of seeking protection under the guns of a Spanish ship, runs into the harbor of Havana or Matanzas, and there finds protection from the civil power. In this case, it is my opinion, sir, that a much more rigorous measure than blockade would be perfectly justifiable. I will not say how far the strict laws of nations would justify our proceeding in this case, but I feel no hesitation in saying that they would deserve to have the town bombarded about their ears, instead of feeling the comparatively trifling inconvenience of a blockade. It is impossible that, in a case like this, you can apply the laws of civilized warfare. They are not in any way applicable. Your enemy is entitled to none of their humane provisions; he is not a prisoner of war when taken, but a culprit liable to be tried by the tribunal of any civilized power, and subject to condign punishment. There are no rules of civilized warfare that can be extended to him.

It is to be observed, then, that the object of this provision is not to humble Spain, or to interfere with her rights, or trench on her sovereignty, but to punish the outlaws of every nation. Parcere subjectis et debellare superbis, is as often a maxim of justice and policy, as it is of magnanimity; but where and to whom is it applied? To those who acknowledge their error and evince a disposition to atone for it, and not to those who, though weak and imbecile, continue their depravity and heap insult upon injury. However weak such a power may be, it is neither politic nor just always to spare them.

But not only Spain, we are told, will be injured, but other nations may take umbrage at this course—nations who are called neutrals. Sir, I should be glad to know who are neutrals in this warfare? There are none. The whole civilized world are our allies in this conflict, and will cheerfully unite with us in our efforts to subdue them as well as our enemy. Sir, by a fair construction of the provisions of this section, and a prudent exercise of the powers vested in the Executive, I think we shall avoid giving offence to other powers. May we not presume that these powers will be prudently exercised? Are we to withhold all power, from a jealous apprehension that that power will be abused? Can we imagine that the Executive will institute a blockade, and rush into difficulties, and precipitate the nation into a war without cause, without necessity?

Sir, I entertain no such suspicion. A reasonable confidence must be placed in the depositaries of power. I am willing to place that confidence, and will go as far as any man to hold the Executive responsible for the faithful exercise of that power; but I am not willing to weaken and paralyze his efforts by any unreasonable suspicion. The course indicated by the third section of the bill, will unquestionably be faithfully pursued by the Executive; negotiations will be pursued, arrangements made, and an understanding will be effected with other nations, if it should ever be necessary to exercise this power conditionally invested in the President on this occasion. But, sir, why should we be more scrupulous on this subject than other nations? Look at Great Britain—more than once she has landed on the coasts of these islands, and scoured the country in pursuit of these marauders; and once, at least, if newspaper authority is to be depended on, she has instituted a strict blockade of the inlets and harbors of the whole Isle of Pines, to secure the success of this pursuit. What was the result of this bold measure? An American vessel and cargo were snatched from the grasp of these robbers, and the crew rescued from death—the bloodhounds were hunted from their dens and fastnesses—were shot down like wild beasts, or captured and deservedly consigned to the gibbet. What, further, was the result of this measure? Twelve vessels, dismantled and plundered, were found concealed in one of these inlets, and, horrible to relate, not one human being of all their crews, left to tell the dismal fate of his comrades; and will you, with such evidence as this before your eyes, with all this horrible detail brought to light, will you speculate and refine with metaphysical subtlety on the rights of sovereignty, and the sanctity of territorial dominion, instead of adopting the only measures that can suppress the evil? Is not this the very case where “right goes hand in hand with necessity and the exigency of the case?” Sir, it seems to me that, if a case can be found where that well-known principle of the law of nations is to be applied, this is the very case, and you are right in making use of all the means necessary to accomplish the object—those means are pointed out by the third section of the bill, and are not such as transcend the necessity of the case.

Suppression of Piracy.

[SENATE.]

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, said, in expressing his opinion he must be allowed to take a very brief historical view of the subject. At the commencement of the session, on the opening of Congress, we were informed by the President, in his message, that "the piracies now complained of are committed by bands of robbers who inhabit the land, and who, by preserving good intelligence with the towns, and seizing favorable opportunities, rush forth, and fall on unprotected merchant vessels, of which they make an easy prey; that the pillage thus obtained, they carry to their lurking places, and dispose of afterwards, at prices tending to seduce the neighboring population. "This combination," the President says, "is understood to be of great extent, and is the more to be deprecated, because the crime of piracy is often attended with the murder of the crews; these robbers knowing, if any survived, their lurking places would be exposed, and they be caught and punished."

The Secretary of the Navy, in his letter to the President, accompanying the message, fully confirms this account; and further states, that there are now few, if any, piratical vessels of a large size in the neighborhood of Cuba, and that none are seen at a distance from the land; but the pirates conceal themselves, with their boats, in small inlets, and finding vessels becalmed, or in a defenceless situation, assail and destroy them, and when discovered, retreat into the country, where, by the apprehensions they create, and the plunder they have obtained, they remain secure, and mingle, at pleasure, in the business of the towns and the transactions of society, and acquire all the information they want to accomplish their purposes. Against such a system as this, the Secretary observes, no naval force, within the control of the Department, can afford complete security, unless aided by the local authorities; and, unless this co-operation be obtained, additional means should be intrusted to the Government, to be used in such manner as experience may dictate.

We have thus obtained, in the most formal and official manner, direct, unequivocal information, of the existence of these atrocities, of the inability of the navy to suppress them, and of the additional means necessary to be intrusted to the Executive, and referred to in the message. These means, as before stated, are, pursuit on shore, reprisal, and partial blockade of the offending ports. The committee recommend the mildest of these alternatives, the blockade, which is, however, denounced by the highly respectable and able gentleman from Virginia, as being an interpolation on the law of nations; as breaking down the moral force of the Republic, and as a just cause of offence, if not of war, to other nations.

Sir, from whom is this advice received? From men ranking among the most distinguished civilians of the age, possessing your entire confidence, who have been drilled in diplomacy by a forty years' experience, who have spent their lives in advocating the rights of neutrals, and grown gray in turning over the works of Grotius, and Vattel, and Puffendorf, and Ward, and Azuni, and a host of other authors, with whom I can boast no acquaintance.

In reference, therefore, to the source from whence the recommendation is derived, as well as to the feeble lights of his own understanding, he denied the soundness of the inferences that had been drawn; and without even making any more recondite research than to an elementary work, an humble one in some respects, he would contend, that the major proposition includes the minor; the whole embraces all its parts; and that, if you have justifiable cause of war against Cuba, or against Spain, you have the right to mitigate the evils of war, by the adoption of any milder course you may think proper to pursue.

It is true, if you blockade a single port of the island of Cuba, Spain may be authorized to declare war, and perhaps be joined by her allies, if she and they choose it; and this would undoubtedly be attended with great injury to us. Peace is the polar star of the interest of our country; but, if it is only to be preserved at the expense of the continued murder of our citizens, and the plunder of our property with impunity, then, for one, he was ready for war; and how much soever of injury it might entail, it would be accompanied with one consolation, derived from the experience of the last war; which was, that, whatever nation chose to go to war with the United States, it would carry them forward in their progress to maturity, per saltum, half a century at a jump.

But we are told, other nations will take umbrage at this: that, although blockade is a beligerent right, and we impose it, we are still not at war.

What have other nations to do with this question? It belongs exclusively to us and to Spain. When two nations go to war, who constitutes, without their consent, a third party to determine who is right, or who is in the wrong? All other nations have a right to demand, is, that, in the prosecution of the quarrel, the rights of humanity shall not be outraged, and that the usages of war shall be observed as regards them. What have they then a right to require, as it regards a blockade? simply, that you shall not entrap them—that you shall give them due notice, a sufficient warning, and that you shall keep up a close, rigorous, unremitting investment, by a sufficient force; if you do this, you perform all your duties as regards them—all the rest lies between the party blockading and the party blockaded.

But, we are asked, suppose we find these offending neutrals in the den of robbers, in the lair of these wild beasts, at the time we invest it, what will you do with them? It is answered, give them the right of egress precisely in the state they were at the time the blockade was imposed; after this, strictly keep them in, and keep them out. This is all they have a right to expect. If they are in bad company, they must feel the effect of it.

Is a formal parchment declaration of war at all times necessary or usual among nations? If it is, what was the state of our quasi war with France, in 1798? Where was the proclamation of France, when she blockaded Cadiz, and kept out, not only merchant vessels, but our messenger of peace, in a national vessel? Where was the proclamation, when the British pounced upon the Spanish frigates and captured them, with their treasure, during the late wars between France and England? Where the proclamation, when she sent her fleet up the Cattegat, blockaded and bombarded Copenhagen, and destroyed the Danish fleet? These cases are adduced as showing that, between third parties, a declaration of war, if you choose it, is not considered indispensable, as to usage, not as approving them.

Have you abundant cause of war against the inhabitants of Cuba? Look at the accounts of your official agent; you find from them, that these murderers and robbers are well known, are connected with the inhabitants, and suffered, if not protected, by the local authorities; and even the Governor General, whose good dispositions are so much spoken of, tells you frankly, when applied to for the aid of Government, that, so deeply implicated are all the inhabitants of Regla, where a quantity of plunder was known to be secreted, that he dare not make the investigation—it might create a rebellion.

Sir, with something more than delicacy, with an approach to fastidiousness, we have kept out of sight the enormities we are suffering; it must be useful, however, to have an occasional and sparing reference to them. He should cite briefly only three instances: The first was that of the Alert, commanded by a very respectable citizen of Portsmouth, in New Hampshire—Captain Blunt. This vessel, bound from New Orleans, was becalmed off the Moro Castle; a boat approached, when the first wretch that crossed the gunwale, ran the captain through the body, who was afterwards cut to pieces, and the only vestige that remained of him in the morning, was his slippers, overflowing with blood; the crew were abused, and the cook, asleep in the steerage, was lacerated in the most cruel and wanton manner, and his mangled corpse thrown to the hogs, who were seen the next day fattening on his entrails.

The next case is that of the Laura Ann, already before the Senate; this was a vessel belonging to New York, boarded by pirates, at a short distance from Matanzas, when bound to the Havana, who, after beating and inhumanly hanging the captain, butchered the crew; but probably discovering, from a critical comparison of the shipping paper, with the number of the dead and dying on the deck, that there was one still wanting, they descended into the hold, exclaiming, in their barbarous language, une mus—one rat left; pricked, with their knives and swords, to find out the deficient sailor, and, lest he should not have escaped torture by drowning, on not finding him, set fire to the vessel, in order that, if on board, he might be consumed with it; on the flames reaching him, he crawled on deck, and finding the pirates were off, dropped overboard, and happily reached the shore.

The last case he should cite, was one that has not before been distinctly presented to the Senate; it is of recent date, and was now on his table in manuscript, duly sworn to. It furnishes some new facts, and gives an exposition of the neutral rights of the innocent, unoffending inhabitants of Cuba.

It is the case of the brig Henry, of Hartford, captured on the 24th of September last, off the Bay of Honda, when bound with a load of sixty-eight mules, from St. Jago, in Mexico, to Charleston, in South Carolina; the vessel, as soon as captured, was run into a small creek, alongside ten other hulks of vessels, having the appearance of being recently burned, and which must have been navigated by 180 or 150 men, not one of whom was visible, but the crew of the Henry was significantly given to understand, that their fate, as soon as the mules were landed, was to be a similar one, and that dead men told no tales. The Henry was then dismantled, to prevent her being seen, her equipment and stores taken out, put on board a Spanish drogher, belonging to Havana, and preparations made for landing the mules; the captain having been twice hung up by the neck to the yard-arm, until he was senseless, and became subsequently deranged, the arm of the mate broken by the stroke of a cutlass, and the crew outraged and abused. Happily, however, before the mules could be landed, the vessel was discovered by the boats of the English sloop-of-war Icarus, who humanely came to their assistance; and on their approach, the pirates quitted their prey, and abandoned it. Not so easily, however, did the neutral inhabitants of Cuba quit their hold; after a time they came off—plead their neutral rights—claimed the mules as their property—they had bought them of the pirates—they had paid a valuable consideration—they had an equitable interest in them, and demanded their delivery! The British commander indignantly took the best possible course he could have adopted, with a single exception; he instantly ordered all the mules to be shot upon the deck; the exception referred to, is, that he should have shot, in preference, those who demanded them. Mr. L. stated, he would not pursue this disgusting detail, but would leave it, after observing, that if, for a length of time, we permitted atrocities of this kind to continue and go unpunished, the multitudinous waves of the ocean would not speedily efface the crimson it would attach to our escutcheon.

Suppression of Piracy.

He had said, that, with the exception of the third section, now proposed to be stricken out, and the first, which contained no new principle, he considered the bill as of little value.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that the subject under consideration was justly considered by the gentlemen who had spoken before him, as one of the utmost importance, requiring the prompt, zealous, and efficient attention of the Government. It was one in which a great portion of his immediate constituents, from their situation and pursuits, had a deep interest, and thinking so, partook largely of the general solicitude which was everywhere felt in relation to the proceedings of Congress in the matter. That circumstance must be his apology for prolonging a discussion which had been conducted with so much ability. At the commencement of the session, this subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; they had given to it their early and zealous attention, and the bill on the table was the result of their deliberations. Although he might not be able to approve all its provisions, he was led, by inclination as well as duty, to give them a liberal and candid examination—to aid in their improvement, if that should be in his power, and support such as he could, consistent with obligations of an equally imperative character.

Although the immediate question before the Senate was to strike out the third section, authorizing, in certain cases, a blockade of the ports of the Spanish Islands in the West Indies, the discussion had embraced the whole subject. He thought this course justifiable, and would himself follow the example which had been set.

As early as the year 1822, piracies in the Gulf of Mexico and West India seas, had arrived at so great a height, and assumed a character so alarming, as to call for the most rigorous exertion of the Government for their suppression. The call was not made in vain. In December, 1822, a law was passed, "authorizing an additional naval force for the suppression of piracy;" making an ample appropriation for the object, and placing the means provided at the disposal of the Executive. Those means had been put in prompt and effectual requisition, under his direction. In February, 1823, a squadron, consisting of seventeen vessels, of different sizes, besides barges, was prepared for sea, and despatched upon the service authorized by the act, under the command of that most gallant and meritorious officer of the navy, Captain David Porter. The success which crowned the exertions of Capt. Porter, and the gallant men under his command, was fresh in the recollection of all. Although driven from the station by pestilence, in the latter part of the season, such had been the destruction, and such the impression made on the pirates, that Captain Porter, in his letter to the Secretary of the Navy, of Nov. 19, 1823, declared "that he had no knowledge of the existence of any piratical establishment, vessel, or boat, or a pirate afloat in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico. That they had all been burnt, taken, destroyed, and driven to the shore, where the latter had, in most cases, been speedily captured by the local military." And the Secretary of the Navy, in his report to the President, of the 1st of December, 1823, which accompanied his message to Congress, stated that "piracy, as a system, had been suppressed in the neighborhood of the island of Ouba, and now required only to be watched by a proper force, to be prevented from afflicting commerce any further in that quarter." Such were the results produced by the exertions made for the suppression of piracy in 1823. Let us now (said Mr. V. B.) direct our attention, for a few moments, to those of the past year. The Secretary of the Navy, in his communication of the 12th of January last, informs us, that all the vessels, making the squadron of 1823, (except four small schooners, two of which had been lost, and two abandoned, as unfit for service,) had been uniformly employed in the object, so far as their size, and the necessity of occasional returns into port for stores and repairs, would permit; that the effect produced had fallen far short of that of the preceding season, was most apparent. From the month of July down to the last accounts, the horrid practice had been gradually extending, and assuming new features of atrocity, until it had arrived at a height not only ruinous to our commerce in those seas, but, in an unprecedented degree, destructive of the lives of our citizens, and distressing to the cause of humanity.

To what cause, he asked, are we to attribute this unfortunate and distressing disparity in the results of the service of the two successive seasons? He put the question, not with a view to implicate any one, but to be informed, by those more capable, and who had better means of information: to the end that, if in the power of Congress, the appropriate remedy might be applied. He knew too well, and prized too highly, the gallantry, fortitude, and perseverance, of our naval officers and seamen, to believe, for a moment, that they could be deficient in any thing which duty required at their hands; and he did not feel himself at liberty, from all the information before us, to say that there had been dishonor or misconduct upon the part of those to whose control the force employed was intrusted. In the communications made to the Department of State by the commercial agents at the Havana, (Mr. Randall and Mr. Mountain,) and laid before the Senate in pursuance of their call, the explanation is attempted to be given. In their several letters, from July to late in November, they complain of the withdrawal of the squadron from that station. They put this matter strongly before the Government: they say, "that since the spring, the vessels have been dispersed on various services remote from the island; that they have merely made it a touching point, in transitu, without remaining long enough to make any permanent impression on the system." They do not question, but, on the contrary, highly applaud the zeal, enterprise, and courage, of our officers and seamen actually engaged in pursuit of the pirates, but attribute the consequence to the diversion of the force to other and incompatible objects; of which, the chief one, they say, is the employment of the vessels, destined for the suppression of piracy, to the transportation of specie from ports in the Gulf of Mexico to the United States. They are very explicit on this subject, and as he (Mr. VAN BUREN) had already observed, expressed themselves very strongly. On the other hand, Commodore Porter repelled the complaints which had been made to the Government by merchants and others, with great force, attributing the revival of piracy to causes other than those spoken of by Randall and Mountain. It was not, Mr. VAN BUREN said, for the Senate to decide whether there was blame anywhere, or if there was, where it lay. The act of 1822 did not (as its title would seem to indicate) confine the appropriation exclusively to the suppression of piracy, but provides "for affording effectual protection to the citizens and commerce of the United States, in the Gulf of Mexico and the seas and territories adjacent." Under it, Commodore Porter had been charged by the Navy Department, in his first instructions, in addition to the suppression of piracy, not only to extend his attention to the suppression of the slave trade, to the system of privateering on our commerce, carried on from Porto Rico and Porto Cavello, but also to the protection of the convoy of specie from Vera Cruz and the Mexican coast generally to the United States. There was, Mr. V. B. said, no complaint from the Department, that any greater attention had been paid to the latter branch of duty than was warranted by its instructions.

But he thought there was reason to apprehend, that the main object, the suppression of piracy, had been seriously affected by the multiplication and variety, and supposed incompatibility of the duties he had spoken of. He advanced this suggestion, however, with diffidence. His inexperience in these matters might lead him into error—but if there was ground for the apprehension he entertained, he respectfully submitted whether measures ought not now to be taken to prevent a recurrence of the evil. Mr. VAN BUREN said he would not detain the Senate longer on that branch of the subject, but proceed to the consideration of the different sections of the bill. [He then adverted to the provisions of the bill authorizing the building of ten sloops of war, the privileges given and rights secured to merchant vessels who should arm for their own defence, and the authority to place on the pension list those seamen in the merchant service who should be wounded by the pirates, and the widows or children of the slain, explaining the grounds on which they rested, and his ideas of their propriety.] These, said Mr. V. B., are all the provisions recommended by the committee looking to attacks upon the pirates on the ocean. They are appropriate, and, as far as such measures can go, will doubtless be found sufficient. But it is supposed that, in consequence of the changed condition of things on the island of Cuba, other measures, and of a different character, are called for.

In 1823, Commodore Porter ultimately received efficient aid from the local authorities of the island. It is now said, that that aid has been withheld during the last season, and that, instead thereof, there has been criminal confederacy with the pirates on the part of the great body of the inhabitants of the island, and a participation in their plunder—that, with the exception of the Captain General, and some of the higher officers, there has not only been a total remissness on the part of the local authorities in the use of means for the detection and destruction of the pirates; but that they have received countenance and protection from most of the officers of the Government. It is on the assumption of those positions, that the committee have recommended measures which are intended to bear upon the inhabitants themselves. That these measures, or others of the same tendency, may change the existing relations between Spain and our Government, is understood; and the consequent propriety of looking well to the facts on which they are predicated, has been duly appreciated. The Executive has been called upon for information. He has furnished it. Of the credibility of the sources from which it is derived, we cannot judge; but we are to presume it good—the ability of its author is apparent. The statements made by Mr. Randall, and by Mr. Mountain, are full of, to us, the most distressing, and to the people and local government of Cuba, discreditable, and even criminal facts. We are told, that there is not the least doubt, that many of the inhabitants are concerned in the equipment of the vessels employed by the pirates, and in the participation of their plunder—that the moment a prize to the pirates arrives on the coast, persons from the interior throng to the spot to share in or purchase the plunder; that the property soon finds its way into the cities, and tempts the cupidity of all by the advantage of the treasure; that large quantities of the plunder have been known to be introduced into Matanzas, and publicly sold, at prices which alone betray the nature of the property; that retailers of goods are seen travelling to the coast with pack-horses, for the known purposes of purchasing from the pirates; that this was carried to so great an extent, that a respectable Englishman, who owned a ferry near the city, informed Mr. Randall that the returns from his ferry gave certain indication when prizes were on the coast, from the number of persons who resort from Matanzas to their rendezvous; that persons, known to be pirates, walk the streets of that city unmolested, wearing upon their persons goods known to have been obtained by violence. One case, which is mentioned by

Suppression of Piracy.

[SENATE.]

Mr. Randall, will serve to illustrate in the most striking manner, the extent of this evil. A large sum of money in doubloons, which had been plundered from a Boston vessel, had been traced to the village of Regla. The Captain General was informed of the fact, and his aid asked for its recovery. Having caused inquiry to be made, he sent for the claimant, and informed him that he feared all Regla would be implicated in the robbery, and that, in the then disturbed and critical condition of the island, he dared not push the investigation further. And, to give countenance to the practices enumerated, we are told that men of responsibility on the island, openly justify the conduct of the pirates, making it a political question, and urging the commission of what they call similar practices of the Americans, in capturing Spanish property, under the South American flag. To redress those atrocious disorders, frequent and unavailing applications have been made to the local government. Circumstantial and well-authenticated accounts of them have been repeatedly laid before the Government of Spain by our Minister at that court, and the attention of the Spanish Government to the subject, solicited with much eloquence and great force. The appeal thereto has been made in vain; on the contrary, all the indications we can derive from the documents, of the disposition of the Spanish marine, are of a character evincing an indisposition to aid in the destruction of the pirates. A Spanish brig of war boarded a piratical vessel in the neighborhood of Cuba, received presents from, and exchanged civilities with her, and suffered her to pass, on being informed by the pirate that he cruised only against the enemies of Spain. In another case, a Spanish vessel of war was laying in Matanzas when the American brig Industry, from Baltimore, was attacked by pirates in the harbor, without interference on the part of the Spaniard, although the attack was well known at Matanzas at the time of it.

It is from these and other facts, established by the documents on our tables, said Mr. V. B., that the committee have drawn the strong inference of a participation in the guilt of the pirates on the part of the inhabitants of Cuba—remissness, if not encouragement, on the part of the local government, and a total disregard of our complaint on the part of Spain. In his judgment, the committee were well warranted in the opinion they had formed and expressed. The case was one which he thought called for the exercise of the best means at the disposal of the Government. That the extermination of those atrocious robbers was due to the character of the country, to the cause of humanity, and to the rights and injuries of our oppressed citizens, was a sentiment in which all concurred. We have, said he, the physical power to effect it—we have the moral power,—that is, the right to do it, and the duty of its accomplishment rests upon us. If they differed, it could only be as to the means to be employed, and the manner of their application. On that subject he would submit his ideas with freedom, but with diffidence, and with an entire willingness to yield to the views of those who were better able to judge. The Executive, in his message, had suggested three expedients, in addition to the other and undisputed provisions of the bill, viz., “the pursuit of the offenders to the settled as well as unsettled part of the island, reprisals on the property of the inhabitants, and a blockade of the island from which the pirates issued.” The committee had adopted the first and last only.

Mr. V. B. said he complained of the provisions of the bill professing to give the right of pursuit, because it fell short of what it ought to be, and he was constrained, by obligations of the most imperative character, to oppose that which authorizes a blockade of the Spanish ports, as wholly unwarrantable. He would state the grounds on which his objection rested. The section confines the right to land and capture the pirates, to cases of fresh pursuit. That right existed to the full extent, by the law of nations, to which it was proposed to be given by the bill, except, perhaps, the alternative of bringing the pirates to this country for trial, if they were captured in the inhabited parts of the Spanish territory. That such, too, was the opinion of our Government, would be seen on a reference to the instructions given to Captain Porter by the former Secretary of the Navy.

But a slight consideration of the subject was necessary to show that that opinion was well founded. Although pirates are not regarded as enemies in the sense in which we speak of the public wars of belligerents and neutrals, still, the inferences which have been drawn by the former Secretary, by analogy to the rights of a belligerent to follow his enemy in certain cases, into a neutral port or country, are founded in reason and good sense. That a belligerent has a right so to follow his enemy, is certain, but in what case can he (without fault on the part of the neutral) alone exercise this right—it is in case of eager pursuit, on account of some conflict or violence which has preceded and which is followed up, whilst the matter is warm. Otherwise, he has no right to seek his enemy in the port or country of his friend. So, too, in regard to pirates, if a vessel is attacked by them, and in its defence, or if, knowing them to be such, and in a lawful attempt to arrest them, they fly anywhere, by land or water, you have a right to pursue them. If that pursuit was continued into the Thames, to the city of London, even to Westminster Hall itself, the act of the pursuer would not give just cause of complaint to the Government whose territory was so invaded. The motive and the object were laudable, and no offence or injury being intended, none would be considered as done. The truth and justice of this position, he said, might be illustrated by familiar allusion to the personal rights of individuals, and he made them. There is, therefore, no doubt, said Mr. V. B., that, if our vessels come in contact with the pirates at sea, and they fly, the right of pursuit to the land, settled or unsettled, attaches, and the bill upon the table gave no more. It was most evident that, unless Spain could be induced to interfere, or the mischief in some other form repressed, a further authority to our forces would become indispensable—the authority to land on the island in search of pirates, to exercise municipal authority there, to wrest the sword of justice from the hands of those who were unable or unwilling to wield it for the ends of justice. He would give the right to the President, to authorize the exercise of such powers, under the circumstances he would thereafter state.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that the views he had thus far taken of the subject, brought him to the consideration of the immediate question before the Senate, the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia to strike out the third section, which authorizes the blockade of the Spanish ports upon the establishment of certain facts. Mr. V. B. said he fully concurred with the honorable gentleman who had made the motion, in considering the measure the section contemplated as utterly unwarrantable by the law of nations, and (if that view of it could be entertained) wholly inexpedient. Mr. V. B. said that the two gentlemen of the committee who had preceded him, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, who had last addressed the Chair, Mr. LLOYD, had attempted to support the measure on various, but in Mr. VAN BUREN's opinion, untenable grounds. The gentleman last up had endeavored to do it in part on the score of the authority derived from the recommendation of the Executive, inferring from thence the opinion of his cabinet, composed, as it undoubtedly was, of men of learning and talents, in favor of the fitness of authorizing of blockades under the circumstances contemplated by the bill. The first we hear of the measure is from our agent at Havana; the next in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, accompanying the President's Message at the commencement of the session, as explained by the Secretary in his letter to the Chairman of our Naval Committee; and, lastly, in the suggestion of the President in his late message to the Senate.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that he had reason to doubt the correctness of the inference of the honorable gentleman; that he had accidentally been possessed of the knowledge, that at least one of the persons alluded to, and him whom the honorable gentleman possibly referred to as the one who had spent a great portion of his life in the study of Grotius, Puffendorff, and Vattel, and other writers on national law, was not of the opinion supposed. But, waiving further remark on that head, what, said Mr. V. B., is the right of blockade? It is, said he, one of the highest acts of sovereignty which the law of nations allows to a belligerent, and, however well established the right is, its exercise is universally conceded to be most harsh and oppressive in its operation upon the rights of third parties of any that is contained in the code. By it a belligerent extends the hardships and sacrifices of war, from the parties concerned to their neutral friends, by interrupting their accustomed and otherwise lawful commerce. He does this when and where, on the coast of his enemy, he pleases, and to any extent his passions or supposed interests dictate, and his means can accomplish; all others must submit to it under heavy and well-defined penalties.

It is a right of war, and it is in time of war only that it is, or ever was allowed by the law of nations. No instance in which it was otherwise exercised, or the right to exercise it claimed, is to be found in the books. This is conceded. The recent blockade of Cadiz by the French, stands upon war ground. That matter has been demonstrated by the gentleman from Virginia, in the lucid argument he submitted the other day. War existed between France, as the ally of Spain, and that portion of Spain embraced by the blockade. If it did not, the blockade was a violation of the law of nations. Mr. V. B. said he was, moreover, indisposed, in any view of the subject, to refer to acts committed in a war waged for the destruction of the liberties of one nation for evidence of the rights of others. Are we, inquired Mr. VAN BUREN, at war with Spain? Certainly not. Is it the design of the committee that the passage of the bill and the exercise of this power, under it, is to put us in that condition? The gentlemen, say no. What then, he asked, are we about to do? To exercise, in a state of peace, a measure which is only allowable in a state of war. When it was admitted, said Mr. V. B., that the section contemplated a measure not authorized by the law of nations, he hoped that, in this country at least, no further argument could be necessary to dissuade from its adoption. Such, however, appeared not to be the case. We are told that the Governments whose trade will be affected by this blockade, will not complain, because it is necessary and proper to secure the suppression of piracy, and because the interests of all nations are thereby promoted.

But why is it that we consider proceedings against the inhabitants of Cuba proper? It is on the ground of their participation in the guilt of the pirates. Of that we judge from information, which we have; but which they may not have. We judge of it under the influence of feelings excited by accumulated injuries; they are not entirely so situated—what is satisfactory to us may not be so to them, and unless it be so, we have no reason to count on their acquiescence. If we had, still we would not stand justified in the eyes of the world, to attempt so flagrant an interpolation in the national code. If they do not acquiesce, then comes the question so emphatically asked by his honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. TAZEWELL,) how will you enforce your blockade? For violations or attempted violations of a lawful blockade, the law of nations authorizes the blockading power to capture and confiscate the property of the neutral. This is on the principle that by the act the neutral takes part with the enemy in furnishing him with the means either of subsistence, escape, or information; and the measure of punishment for such interference, is what he had stated. Questions of prize, or no prize, are to be decided by the law of nations, subject to treaties. By that law it is conceded that condemnation for a violation of such a blockade as this would not be allowed. The right is not given by the act. Why not? Because there is no authority or precedent for it. Are not gentlemen, he asked, aware, that, by thus abandoning the means of enforcing a blockade, they admit, substantially, the illegality of the measure? But we are told, said Mr. V. B., by the honorable chairman, that he contemplates a resort to force, and to force only, to enforce the blockade. What will be the inevitable consequence? A French or English vessel, or the vessel of any other nation trading with Cuba, approaches a port you have blockaded—she is warned off—denying your authority, as she well may, she keeps on. You fire into her, slay her crew, and sink her vessels, and war exists between you and the nation to which she belongs. You thus put it in the power, said Mr. V. B., nay, you make it the duty of your officers on that station to involve you in embarrassments and war almost without limit.

Modifications of the measure have been spoken of to-day, so as to confine it to Spanish commerce. You cannot do it without involving yourselves in the assertion of another equally untenable right, the right of search, in time of peace, of vessels carrying on a lawful trade. In any point of view, therefore, the measure is ill-advised, and should no longer be persisted in. It is to be regretted that it has obtained so far—it may hereafter be brought in judgment against us. We have interests as well as character involved in the question. In the wars which have heretofore ravaged Europe, we have occupied a neutral station,—our situation, the tendency of our Government, and the temper of our people, will, it is to be hoped, continue us in the course we have hitherto so wisely and so happily pursued. The interests of the neutral, therefore, seem emphatically our interests, and we should be careful how we tamper with them. We know well that this right of blockade is cherished and valued by our great maritime rival, as the firmest charter of her naval pre-eminence—a right which she has always manifested a wish to enlarge, and which we, in conjunction with other nations interested in the freedom of the seas, have struggled to confine to its ancient limits. Mr. V. B. had said that we had character involved in this question; what we had said and done on this subject was before the world—our light had not been hid. We had, he said, principle to maintain, which it had been our pride to support, and which we should be ashamed to abandon. Allusion had been made, and properly made, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. T.,) to the collision which had existed in the question of blockade between England and this country at an early period; and he might, with equal propriety, have referred to others of a later date. We should be cautious how we exposed our conduct on occasions that are open to suspicion. Much of our greatness, and no small share of our strength, as had justly been observed, rested on our fidelity to principle, and continued reverence and support of the great doctrines of public law in our intercourse with the world. Mr. VAN BUREN said he would further illustrate his idea upon this subject by a reference to a point of controversy between us and Spain, connected with the very subject under consideration. With no other force than a single frigate, a brig and a schooner, employed in transporting supplies from Curacaoa to Porto Cabello, she had presumed to declare a blockade of more than twelve hundred miles of coast of the Republic of Colombia and the Government of Mexico, adding to the declaration the idle pretence that she had a right to interdict trade with those places, because the same had heretofore been forbidden by the Spanish colonial laws. On the strength of these principles, so entirely inadmissible, she had issued commissions at Porto Cabello and Porto Rico, to privateers, who had committed extensive depredations on our own commerce. We have inveighed loudly and justly against Spain for this outrage. We have said that the only difference between those privateers and the buccaneers of Cuba was, that the former acted under a commission to which the latter made no pretence. On what ground have we done so? It has been, because the idea of now enforcing the colonial laws of Spain was ridiculous, and that by the law of nations their blockade could only be legal as far as their actual force will make it effectual. Will the honorable chairman inform me with what force we can complain of Spain on this inroad of the law of nations, if we appropriate this solemn right of war to mere municipal purposes, with full knowledge that the pretence of a right so to use it is not to be found in that law; and that, in attempting it, we attempt a flagrant interpolation upon its principles? But he had done with this branch of the subject, and would conclude it by conjuring gentlemen to be cautious how they made innovations in the public law, and admonishing them that other nations might hereafter improve upon our decision in a form which might be the occasion of our lasting regret. Mr. V. B. said that he would now state, in a few words, what the provisions were which he would substitute, for those of the bill; they were:

1st. Power to the President to authorize our forces to land on the island of Cuba, in quest of the pirates, and there exercise all the power necessary to their suppression, of which he had already spoken.

2d. Power to the President, on being satisfied of the facts stated in the section; or some other of a similar character, to authorize reprisals upon the commerce and property of the inhabitants of the island, or by way of contribution on the places, participating in the piratical acts upon our commerce, or both, or in such other form as those more acquainted with the matter should prescribe. He would give this power to the President now, because Congress must adjourn in a few days, not to meet again in nine months, and because, during that period, the exercise of such a power might become indispensable, and he would leave that question to the discretion of the Executive, by whom, he had no doubt, it would be wisely and safely exercised.

In that exercise, he had no doubt every thing belonging to the subject would be regarded, and in connection with that part of the subject he would take the liberty of suggesting what, in his humble opinion, might be done with profit and propriety, by the Executive, previous to the exercise of the strong power with which Congress would clothe him. There was, said Mr. VAN BUREN, not only something in the nature of the crime we seek to suppress, but in the place where our power is to be exercised, which not only authorize us to ask, but may perhaps be deemed sufficient to require, that we should ask the co-operation of some, at least, of the other powers of Europe. From the present condition of Spain, depressed as she has been by her foreign and domestic wars, and pressed almost to the earth by her late inglorious conflict with her own subjects, the question of her ability to maintain her power in the island of Cuba had for some years been entertained. It was now, he said, well known, that that circumstance, added to the extreme importance of the island to several of the powers of Europe, and particularly to this country, had given rise to much jealousy among those nations in regard to it. Rumors of cessions, and apprehension of cessions, had been frequently heard and entertained. Such was the jealousy of the inhabitants themselves upon the subject, that when Captain Porter last arrived, orders were understood to have been given, refusing the admission of his squadron into their ports, avowing, as the reason, their apprehension that his object was conquest. That was, however, explained by the present Captain-General, who knew, and was capable of appreciating our motives.

Is there not reason to apprehend that, if, without consultation with England and France, the measures necessary to the entire extinction of this abhorred race, (on the assumption that Spain will do nothing,) may excite jealousies on the part of the Governments to which he had alluded, that may lead to unpleasant embarrassments; and is there not, on the contrary, every reason to hope that on application made to them, they would cordially concur in uniting their exertions with our own, in a cause in which their interest and ours are identified? In conjunction with them, the Spanish Government might be addressed in a manner which could not fail of its effect. She might be told that she owed it to the world to suppress this odious practice; that her delinquency was palpable—that, if she desired its suppression, and had not the means to effect it, she ought to say so, and to consent to the occupation of such parts of her islands as were necessary to that end. If she still refused, the necessary means might be used by the powers of which he had spoken, and a final end would be put to piracy. We have, said Mr. V. B., a right to count on their ready and zealous co-operation. But if, contrary to all expectations, they should refuse, then the Executive could exercise the additional powers with which you invest him. To make these explanations, some longer time might be required than to obtain the evidence necessary to authorize this blockade—but there would be time enough.

In the mean time, our forces in those seas would not be idle—they would act with all the means and authority they had in 1823—and if, after taking such steps, the Executive should authorize measures, which it is conceded might, and probably would, lead to a war with Spain—the nation would support, and all the world approve our course.

On motion of Mr. HAYNE,

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 1.

Suppression of Piracy.

The Senate again proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the suppression of piracy in the West Indies; the motion to strike out the third section, (which authorizes a blockade of the ports of Cuba, under certain circumstances,) being still pending.

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, rose, and said, that, as he could not entirely concur in the views which had been taken of this subject by either of the gentlemen who had spoken, he would ask the indulgence of the Senate in stating the principles on which he was disposed to act in the suppression of piracy. When this question of blockade was first suggested, Mr. H. confessed that it had excited scruples in his mind, in respect to the principles which it seemed to involve, and these scruples had certainly not been diminished by the learned and ingenious arguments of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TAZEWELL.) He was constrained to confess, that the magic wand of that gentleman's eloquence, by which he gave, at pleasure, any form or hue to the subjects which he touched, had exerted its influence on his mind and his feelings. A more deliberate examination of the subject, however, had dispelled the charm, and convinced him that the proposed measure involved no sacrifice of principle, and though, without certain modifications, (which Mr. H. said he would take the liberty of suggesting,) he could not bring his mind to vote for the clause, yet he should be influenced in his vote by considerations entirely different from those which had been urged. He had no scruples whatever on the subject of a blockade of the ports of Cuba, when the case should occur which should, in his opinion, make that measure indispensably necessary for the suppression of piracy. He would endeavor, as briefly as he could, to put the question on what appeared to him to be the true ground; the ground on which we may not only safely act now, but on which we might proceed in all our future measures on this subject. The question is one of such vast importance, involving, to so large an extent, the property and lives of our fellow-citizens, and touching so closely the honor of the country, that it could not command too much of the time and attention of the Senate, or receive too thorough an investigation. He should, after the example of the gentleman who had preceded him, consider the whole bill as open for discussion, and should therefore present his views of the several measures it proposes, and endeavor to show their relative importance in the accomplishment of the great object which we all have in view—the suppression of the atrocious crime of piracy. Mr. H. said he would begin with the question of blockade. The honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TAZEWELL,) who had moved to strike out that feature in the bill, had told us emphatically that it was a measure of war; while his colleague, the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, (Mr. BARBOUR,) insists that it is a measure of peace—peaceful in its character, as well as in its objects. The character of the measure seems to be the only point in issue, between the friends and opponents of the bill. But, sir, said Mr. H., I will submit that this is not the true question; the merits of the particular proposition cannot depend on the name by which it may be called. If the blockade of the ports of the island of Cuba be the only means of affording to the commerce of the United States that protection which it has a right to receive at your hands; if the monstrous and desolating crime of piracy cannot otherwise be effectually suppressed; then the measure becomes just and necessary, and must be resorted to whether it be a measure of peace or of war. The gentleman from Virginia seems to take it for granted that, when he proves that a blockade is a belligerent measure, he has proved enough, and that it follows, as a matter of course, that it is inexpedient and unjust; nay, that it will even impair the moral character of the Government and the people of the United States.

I am disposed, said Mr. H., freely to admit that, according to my view of the subject, a blockade is an act of war. But I feel myself, at the same time, compelled to dissent from the proposition, laid down with so much emphasis by the gentleman from Virginia, that “a blockade acts not upon the guilty, but only on the innocent.” If such was the fact, the right of blockade would never have been conceded to belligerents, nor would the high authorities to which the gentleman had appealed, the learned writers on the law of nations, (whom Mr. H. admitted to be worthy of the encomiums that had been bestowed upon them,) have given their sanction to a practice which did not act upon “the guilty belligerents,” but only on “unoffending neutrals.” It may be true, that a state of war acts efficaciously on your own citizens, by prohibiting all intercourse with the enemy, under the penalties of treason, and that a blockade of the ports of that enemy would add no higher sanction to the prohibition. But how is it with the power whose ports are blockaded? She carries on trade with all the rest of the world. The laws of war do not prohibit her intercourse with neutrals, except in articles contraband of war. But the moment you blockade her ports, you cut off the whole of her trade. Neutrals, it is true, must also be affected; but the effect upon them is altogether incidental, and consequential, and it is suffered only because the belligerent cannot otherwise destroy the trade of his enemy. Look at the practical operation of the blockade proposed by this bill! Is it true that it would have no effect upon Cuba, “the guilty party,” but only (in the language of the gentleman from Virginia,) “on the innocent and unoffending neutrals?” It is true that a blockade would, of necessity, cut off some of our trade with Cuba, as well as that of France, England, Russia, Holland, and the other nations of the earth. But, at the same time, you would deprive Cuba of her trade with all the world, and would therefore affect her to at least ten times the amount that you would affect any other power. The object of the blockade, then, is directly to affect Cuba, and it is no objection to the proposition, (provided the measure be in itself just and necessary,) that it must also operate against neutrals.

Taking blockade, then, to be an act of war, what is the true question which we are called upon to decide? It is, whether such a measure is called for by the circumstances of our present situation. But here it is objected that, if this blockade be an act of war, it must be preceded by a formal declaration of war against Spain, and be followed by general hostilities. But this does not appear to my mind, said Mr. H., to be absolutely necessary. And here I will suggest a distinction between an act of war and general hostilities. No one can doubt that, to march an army into an adjoining territory, to attack and capture a town, is an act of war. During the siege or investment you would claim and lawfully exercise all the rights of war, and yet such a capture might, under certain circumstances, be lawfully made, without a declaration of war. Suppose an armed force to issue from an adjacent territory, from Canada, for instance, and to devastate our frontier and kill our people, taking refuge in a town or fortress on the other side of the line, and that the British Government, (as Spain has done on the present occasion,) refused to interfere—can any one doubt that we would cross over and capture the place? Now this would be an act of war, and yet it need not be accompanied by a declaration of war against Great Britain—nor would it necessarily be followed by a general war.

Every resort to force by a power that has authority to make war, is an act of war. Nay, the definition of war, by the writers on the laws of nations, is "the prosecution of a nation's right by force,"—by force, either partial or general; by force adequate to the object, and applied how, and when, and where, the circumstances of the particular case may require. When you make war, you may carry it on either by general or by partial operations; and the latter are always to be preferred where they can accomplish the object. All measures of forcible reprisals, all levies of contributions, are acts of force—indeed of war, or they must constitute acts of plunder; and yet they are seldom accompanied by a formal declaration of war.

Suppose, said Mr. H., on the occasion of the attack on the Chesapeake, (one of the deepest wounds the honor of this country had ever received,) the gallant officer to whose command was confided the disgraced ship—the ever-to-be-lamented—the incomparable Decatur, had been ordered, he would not say by the President, but by the sovereign authority of this nation, to wipe off the foul stain by bringing into our ports a British frigate, and he had happily executed those orders, would not that have been a war measure? and yet, who would have contended that we had become pirates, and had put ourselves out of the social relations of nations, by making a capture without a declaration of war?

With respect to declarations of war, Mr. H. said, he would consider it unfortunate for the cause of humanity, if the law of nations required that they should, in all cases, precede acts of hostility. The history of the last half century would show numerous instances of the redress of national wrongs by reprisals, and the partial exertion of force, without general hostilities. Our French war, as it is called, was an example of this. The practice of nations, also, for the same period, would show, that declarations of war were not considered as indispensable. Look at the practice of England in these respects. In 1748, she captured the L'Alcide, and the Lys, without any declaration of war. In 1664, she captured a Dutch fleet in the same way, and subsequently, off Cape May, took four Spanish frigates, under similar circumstances. But, said Mr. H., I will not fatigue the Senate by multiplying instances. Every nation of Europe had, in a majority of cases, made war without a declaration. Indeed, it was more usual to resort to manifestoes after a war, than declarations beforehand; to resort to particular acts of war, than to general hostilities. The writers on the law of nations had, indeed, laid down the rule that a declaration ought to be first made; nay, that time and due notice should be given to the enemy. But these rules were seldom observed. Even Bynkershoek, one of the soundest writers on the laws of nations, had allowed, "that, after satisfaction had been demanded and refused, a declaration of war was not required by the law of nature or of nations."

I will only further notice, said Mr. H., the attack by Great Britain upon Copenhagen. Great Britain did not declare war against Denmark, but she sent a powerful fleet, which blockaded the harbor of Copenhagen, besieged the town, interrupted the access of neutrals, and finally captured the Danish fleet. Here was an act of war—here was force, siege, and capture, which did not even lead, in its consequences, to a general war. I know, said Mr. H., that this act on the part of the British Government, has been universally reprobated. But the odium which rests on the transaction has arisen from the belief that the British Government took advantage of the weakness of Denmark to spoil her of her fleet. If the grounds taken by the British Government, however, were founded in truth, will it be said that they would not justify an act of war? They alleged that Denmark had made terms with the enemy; that her fleet was destined for Bonaparte; and that a public declaration of war would only have hastened an event already determined on. Suppose these facts to be known to the British Government, and she would have been justified in seizing the Danish fleet.

But, said Mr. H., if this blockade be a war measure, and a declaration be necessary, he would submit to the gentleman whether the act of Congress which enjoins it, may not be considered as a declaration, sufficient to satisfy the most fastidious advocates of form. The gentleman from New York (Mr. VAN BUREN) had yielded the whole question, when he stated that he was willing, without war, to invade, and occupy a portion of the island of Cuba. He protests against a blockade of the Havana, because, should we attack a neutral vessel, forcing the blockade, "war would, thereby, exist between you and the nation to which she belongs;" but he would capture, and hold the Havana, without war. What then is to become of neutral trade to that port? Surely, if you have a right to besiege, and capture, you have a right to blockade. The greater power must include the less. Nor would such a blockade, as is here proposed, have any affinity to the paper blockade, of which we have so often complained. The proposal is for an actual investment, and such an investment Mr. H. would consider as attended by all the incidents of blockade. Mr. H. was much mistaken if Sir William Scott had not frequently held, that an actual investment, a blockade, de facto, was all that neutral nations had a right to look to; and, if he was not very much mistaken, that great judge had, in one case, the blockade of Monte Video, by Sir Home Popham, in 1807, refused to hear evidence of the illegality of the blockade, it being admitted that the place was actually invested by the public ships of Great Britain.

I consider this blockade, then, said Mr. H., as a measure of force: as putting us into a belligerent attitude, in relation to Spain, and as giving us belligerent rights, as far as we may think proper to exercise them. And now, sir, I will go a step farther, and contend that we have just cause of war against Spain; and, though this may be a war measure, yet there is nothing to restrain us from taking it but our own interests or convenience. The facts, as disclosed by the documents on our table, are, that the island of Ouba is occupied by pirates; that, from their secure asylums on shore, they issue forth, and attack the defenceless merchantman, murdering the crew, and converting the property to their own use; that these depredations are committed by men known to the Spanish authorities in Ouba, and suffered with impunity to live in their cities, and openly to sell their plunder. I will advert, for a moment, said Mr. HAYNE, to a few facts, to show the extent of this practice, and the protection afforded to the pirates by the officers of Spain. The documents on our table show, that, from July to October, a period of less than four months, there were no less than twenty-three vessels captured, and plundered by the pirates—manned, by not less, certainly, than two hundred seamen, of whom scarcely one escaped to tell the tale. When the gallant Captain Graham, of the British sloop-of-war Icarus, rescued from the hands of the pirates the Henry, of Hartford, he found twelve merchant vessels in their possession, the crews of which were nowhere to be found. When the pirates were asked what had become of them, we are told that “they shrugged up their shoulders, and were silent.” These merchant vessels, says Captain Graham, must have been navigated by at least one hundred and twenty men—and it is obvious they had all been murdered. Mr. H. would not attempt to describe the horrors which must have attended the scenes transacted by those fell murderers on the bloody decks of our defenceless merchant vessels. Among the garments, pierced through with holes and stained with blood, were some which had belonged to innocent and defenceless females. Language was inadequate to depict the condition of those who were exposed to the mercy of these fiends in human shape, whose usual practice it was, first to torture, and then to slay their victims, in the solitude of night, when there was no ear to hear their cries, no heart to pity, and no arm to save them. “It is painful (says Mr. Randall) to reflect on the numbers who may have fallen victims to the same fate, but whose tragical stories are buried in the ocean with their mangled bodies.” Now, sir, said Mr. HAYNE, it is proved that not only the inhabitants of Ouba, but the authorities, wink at these acts—nay, they share the plunder; and the Captain-General himself, when a case was brought before him of plundered property deposited in Regla, inquired just so far as to ascertain the truth of the charge, and then declared “that, as he feared all Regla would be found to be implicated in the robbery, in the present disturbed and critical condition of the island, he dared not push the investigation further,” or, in more plain terms, “I will not, because I dare not, grant you redress.”

But it may be said, that the Captain-General of Ouba is not the sovereign of Spain, and that our redress is to be sought for from the King. Well, sir, we have appealed unto Caesar. We have represented these matters to him in language as strong as is at all consistent with the rules of diplomacy, and a becoming self-respect. We have made these representations over and over again, and to this very hour he has never even condescended to give us an answer of any sort. By referring to the correspondence of Mr. Nelson, our Minister to Spain, it will appear that, on the 10th of January, of the last year, he made a strong and formal remonstrance to the Spanish Government on this subject, setting forth, in detail, the depredations committed on our commerce by pirates, who found refuge in Ouba, and other Spanish islands in the West Indies, detailing the nature of their proceedings, and the protection afforded to them by the subjects and officers of Spain. No notice was taken of this remonstrance. It was renewed on the 28d of January, and on the 8d of February, but the Spanish Government remained as cold and silent as the grave. On the 7th of September, Mr. Nelson, for the last time, brought the subject to the view of the Spanish Government. Language is incapable of making a stronger appeal. He states our grievances; tells the King “that the patience of the American Government had been tried to the fullest extent of sufferance, and that the time is at hand when we must resort to measures of a more efficient character.” This representation has also been treated with the most sovereign contempt. By this conduct, the King of Spain has refused us redress; he has adopted the acts of his officers, and made himself responsible for the injuries of which we complain. The Romans, from whom we have borrowed so many of our principles, civil and political, had a custom on this subject, worthy of much commendation. By their Feclal law, the Pater Patratus, or Chief of the Heralds, was sent to demand satisfaction for injuries, and if, in thirty-three days, no answer was returned, the Gods were called to be witnesses of the wrong, and war was forthwith declared.

Now, I do contend, that the conduct I have detailed gives us justifiable cause of war. But we are gravely told, that all this arises from the weakness of Spain, and that this cannot furnish just cause of war. What! shall the subjects of Spain be suffered to depredate on our property, and murder our people, and shall we be told that we must submit to this because Spain is weak? Sir, Spain either can prevent these outrages, and wants the inclination to do so, or she is unable to prevent them. In either case, our right to protect ourselves is complete.

But, said Mr. H., though I contend that there is just cause of war against Spain—war, in any shape, which may suit our convenience to wage; yet, I admit that there is still another weighty consideration, viz: Is it indispensably necessary?

A nation which has just cause of war, is not bound to go to war. That is always a question of prudence for the nation itself. Now, sir, though I am convinced of the right of this Government to go to war, I am of opinion that the object which we have in view, to wit, the suppression of piracy, may be attained at less expense; and, therefore, that it is our duty to ourselves to postpone a measure which should never be resorted to, but under the last necessity. A blockade of Cuba must destroy, not only our own trade with that island, but it must destroy the trade of all neutral nations, and these would be evils of great magnitude. Should the honor of our country, and the protection of the property and lives of our fellow-citizens require this sacrifice, why, then, sir, let it be made. God forbid that we should consent to weigh profit against honor, or that the glory of our flag, or the lives of our citizens, should be thrown into the same scale with pounds, shillings, and pence. But this trade is too important to be lightly jeopardized. It appears, from documents submitted to this House at the last session, that the amount of our annual import from Cuba is near eight millions of dollars: that our exports amount to near six millions: making, together, a trade of thirteen millions of dollars, employing upwards of one hundred and seventeen thousand tons of American shipping, and between four and five thousand seamen.

This trade, too, consists in the exchange of articles which we can best spare, chiefly our bread stuffs and lumber, for those which are most essential to the comfort of our people. The interruption of it would be most severely felt by the poor, who would be deprived of the little luxuries which spread cheerfulness around their firesides. The trade of Great Britain and France, of Holland, Sweden, and Russia, with these islands, is equally important, and entitled to great consideration. Now, said Mr. HAYNE, my opinion is, that piracy may be suppressed without resorting to a blockade, so injurious in its consequences to the commerce of the world. I agree that piracy must be suppressed. I acknowledge that the conduct of Spain gives her no claim for forbearance on our part. I have no scruple to a war measure, and of calling it so in plain terms, if it be necessary. But I do not believe that necessity now exists, and at all events, I am disposed to make a fair experiment, on the subject. I am, said Mr. H., a lover of peace. I believe it to be the interest of the United States to remain at peace with all the world. A few years will pay all our debts, and double our resources and our strength. I would therefore avoid war, on our own account, as long as it can possibly be avoided with honor.

Now, I think it can be proved, from known facts, as well as the documents before us, that piracy in the West Indies can be suppressed by the vigorous, energetic, and unceasing efforts of a competent naval force, having authority to land and to pursue the pirates into the settled as well as the unsettled parts of the country. It will be recollected, said Mr. H., that, at the last session of Congress, the report of Com. Porter was submitted to us, in which he stated, in substance, that piracy had been suppressed—"their boats burned and destroyed, and the pirates killed or driven ashore."

The Secretary of the Navy was so fully convinced that piracy was suppressed, that he stated it was only necessary in future "to watch them." The facts supported this opinion: piracy was suppressed, though the pirates had not been rooted out. This state of things continued up to the beginning of last summer, when it appears, from the documents before us, that Commodore Porter, being fully convinced that piracy was suppressed, returned home, and the fleet was detached on various duties, leaving a few small schooners, which could not remain long at sea, to watch the shores of Cuba. I beg, sir, that I may not be misunderstood; I do not mean to cast any censure on any officer of the Government, much less to pluck a single leaf from the wreath which encircles the brow of the gallant Porter. Sir, the country owes him a debt of gratitude for the addition he has made to our naval wealth, which I shall never forget. But I am constrained to state my conviction, that an erroneous opinion of the complete suppression of piracy; an opinion not confined to Commodore Porter, but pervading all classes of the community, by occasioning the diversion of the force, led to "the revival" of the practice. When the United States schooner Jackall arrived in Norfolk, early in the summer, she reported, that "for three months no act of piracy had been heard of;" and so confident were our officers that we should hear no more of piracy, that when Lieut. Skinner's account reached the United States, an article was published in a paper in this city, in the nature of censure on that officer, for creating a false alarm; stating "that there was not the least doubt that the accounts of piracies were exaggerated." It has been shown, sir, that all the cases disclosed in the reports of Messrs. Randall and Mountain, took place after the withdrawal of the force from Cuba. In Mr. Randall's letter of the 1st July, he tells us "that there were pirates lying off Matanzas, but there was no vessel of war of the United States there."

On the 5th July, he writes, "that the absence of our cruisers had emboldened these men to renew their piracies." On the 14th July he writes, "that the Grampus had arrived off the Havana, on the 7th, from the coast of Mexico, bound to New York." On the 12th, the John Adams arrived, to sail this day, (14th,) or to-morrow, from the bay of Mexico, bound to Philadelphia. In short, Mr. President, these occasional stoppages, in the course of other voyages, "like angel visits, short, and far between," afforded the only protection which our commerce received, if we are to rely on the documents on our table. The pirates, said Mr. Randall, boasted "that they had nothing to fear." I beg leave, said Mr. H., to read one or two passages from the letters of Mr. Randall and Mr. Mountain, which seem to set this matter in a very strong light.

Mr. Randall, in his letter of the 6th of September, says—

"It is also, in my opinion, necessary, that the force employed should be always present, with an undivided view and attention to this business. Their occasional absence on other duties, materially impairs their efficacy. Their operations against the pirates should be consecutive and unremitting. It has been found that occasional visits to suspected places, by different vessels, and at long intervals, produce no serious impression on the pirates.

"I cannot but lament, however, the causes (sufficient, no doubt) which have induced the withdrawing of so large a portion of the force. Recent events here have proved, that, if this was induced by the supposition that piracy was effectually put down, or that the force left was adequate to restrain it, the opinion was erroneous, and its consequences deplorable."

And again, in his letter of the 31st October, Mr. Randall says—

"It is here a matter of common observation and complaint, that the anti-piratical squadron has effected nothing against the pirates, commensurate with its numbers and force, during the last six months. This has not been owing to the want of zeal, of enterprise, or courage, on the part of our officers and seamen actually engaged in this pursuit, but to their diversion to other objects, incompatible with the efficient performance of this highly important service. Since the spring, the vessels have been dispersed on various services remote from this island, which they have merely made a touching point "in transitu," without remaining long enough to make any permanent impression on the system. For a considerable time the most exposed part of this coast, at the most dangerous season, was not visited by a single vessel of war, and, for a still longer time, by none but the smallest and most inefficient."

"The temporary cessation of piracies some time before, caused by the presence of a large force on the coast, seems to have induced a delusive and fatal opinion that the evil was extinguished, and to have led to the diversion of too large a portion of the force, to objects of infinitely less pecuniary, and of scarcely any national importance."

Mr. Mountain, the American consul, holds the same language: "It is too true," says he, "that our commerce has not been protected on this side of Cuba, since early last spring. Our men-of-war have occasionally been here, and off here, on their way to and from the ports of Mexico," &c. Now, sir, said Mr. H., is it not fair to conclude that, if piracy ceased to exist while the force was kept constantly on the coast, and if it broke out as soon as their presence was withdrawn, that an investment of the island of Cuba by a still larger force, kept constantly employed in that service, with a vessel anchored in the harbor of Havana, and another at Matanzas, will suppress the practice entirely? The sloop-of-war will be much more efficient than the worthless schooners now employed on that service, not only on account of being able to remain longer at sea, but because they can carry a number of barges, for service near the shore. Let, then, said Mr. H., the experiment be fairly tried, and if it fail, it will be time enough to blockade or seize the city of Havana.

The right to follow the pirates on shore, Mr. H. also considered as a material means for the accomplishment of the object. He could not concur with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. VAN BUREN,) that we had a right to pursue and take a felon, even in the Halls of Westminster. Where a Government exists, you must apply to the Magistrate, and nations were not in the habit of surrendering even a criminal—they were proud of being considered as a sanctuary, from which even a criminal could not be torn. Nor had the Secretary of the Navy given the power to the extent proposed by this bill. He had restricted the right of fresh pursuit to the parts of the country "where the local government was not felt." Mr. H. thought it should be extended further, and that it would be a very efficient measure. He hoped it would not be stricken from the bill.

As to arming of merchantmen, Mr. H. considered this also a measure entitled to support. He hoped to see the clause amended by the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, extending the aid of the Government to the merchants, and then the measure would be an efficient one, both morally and physically. Mr. H. firmly believed, that these measures, rigorously executed, would suppress piracy, and afford complete protection to our commerce. If he thought otherwise, he would not hesitate a moment in voting for a blockade, or an invasion, or any other act of war, which might be necessary. But he was asked, "what if he was mistaken in that opinion, would he leave our commerce without protection, until the next session of Congress?" To this he would reply, that, if the gentleman would modify this blockade in the following particulars, he would now give it his vote.

1st. That the authority to resort to it should depend on the failure of the other means provided by this act.

2d. That it be, in that case, made applicable, not merely to cases of fresh pursuit, but be a measure of reprisal on the inhabitants of Cuba.

3d. That the measure be taken in concert with other powers, or after a communication with them.

Mr. H. would, even now, move such an amendment, if he did not believe that the Senate was altogether opposed to a blockade in any shape. Should he be mistaken in that opinion, and the Senate should refuse to strike out the clause, he would then submit an amendment. Mr. H. concluded by saying, that, on the whole, he had no doubt of our right to resort to any species of force, a blockade, or to any other act of war, against Cuba. But believing that measures of a milder character might accomplish the object, he was not, at this time, disposed to resort to so strong a measure, unless its exertion were made to depend on the entire failure of all other means.

Mr. VAN BUREN was too sensible of the indulgence he had received from the Senate yesterday, to trespass longer on their time than would be required to notice one or two of the points touched on by the gentleman from South Carolina. That gentleman had done no more than justice to the enormities practised on our fellow-citizens; the documents on our tables were replete with evidence of the most horrid atrocities; but it did not follow that we had a right to resort to any and every measure of redress which might be in our power, whatever might be their effect on the rights of others. However grievous our wrongs, we still owed it not only to ourselves, but to those nations with whom we are at peace, and against whom we have no cause of complaint, to resort to such remedies only as were lawful in us, and not injurious to them. The gentleman from South Carolina had labored to show that a declaration of war was not a necessary preliminary measure to the commencement of hostilities between nations. Mr. V. B. said, there was no doubt that in that the gentleman was correct; whatever might once have been thought upon the subject, the law and the practice had for a long time been different. War might be commenced by acts of aggression. But those acts should be of an appropriate character, such as reprisals, &c., or any act of force against the party by whom we had been injured. Was a blockade of their ports, in the first instance, an act of that character? This, said Mr. V. B., was the question, and the only question before the Senate. He contended that it was not, and that for the plainest of all reasons, because it operated, in the first instance, against our friends, against powers who were not only willing, but one of whom had efficiently and zealously co-operated with us in measures for the suppression of piracy. Against the commerce of those nations we were about to exercise acts of unwarranted violence—acts which could not but lead to the most injurious consequences. But it had been said, that, admitting that, by the law of nations, the right of blockade can only be exercised in time of war, this act itself would place us at war with Spain, and thus render the blockade lawful. Mr. V. B. said, that this argument, however imposing it might, on a first impression, appear, was liable to great and unanswerable objections: first, it was in the face of the declaration of the committee, and professions of the Government, both of which disclaimed the idea of attaching such a consequence to the measure they proposed: secondly, although Spain might consider it as the commencement of hostilities, she might not—she might consult her true interests, and do us the justice to give us credit for proper motives; if she did, our unwarrantable invasion of the rights of other nations would stand without apology: and even if she did not, and war ensued, we will have anticipated its rights at the expense of our respect for the public law, and for the feelings of friendly powers; either of which would, he thought, be unworthy of the American people.

Mr. MACON said there was something in this business which he could not understand. Insurance from New York to New Orleans, the Senate was informed, was but one to one and a half per cent. How insurance could be so low, while so many piracies were committed, was more than he could comprehend. During the wars between France and England, when a great many captures were made, insurance was not so low as five per cent. Mr. M. then said, he thought that no necessity could justify a breach of the public law. We had endeavored, and successfully, to preserve that law, and he knew but one instance of its violation—that one he always thought very doubtful. We had constantly maintained, to the broadest extent, neutral rights with every nation with whom we had come in contact. This blockade, to say the least of it, was of doubtful character, and he therefore did not like it. It had struck him as a curious question, what would be the condition of a French or English vessel, if taken breaking this blockade; would she be a prize, or what? He was not willing to consent to any act which would jeopardize the character of the country. National character was like individual character—it ought never to be doubted—it ought ever to be so pure as to command respect.

It was to his mind as clear as the light of day, that the President had the power of suppressing piracy. Mr. Randall had proved, that, as long as vessels of war were there, no piracies had occurred, and he was afraid that carrying money had produced all these evils. As long as the vessels of war were there, the pirates were invisible; but, as soon as they were gone, they came out. This following the pirates on shore, was a much more difficult matter than gentlemen had represented it to be. How were the pirates to be known when they got on shore? They might change their clothes, or any thing else. The true way was to catch them on the water, by sending a sufficient force to Cuba, and to hang all that were caught; and when they found that catching and hanging were the same thing, there would soon be an end to piracy.

Mr. M. then asked, why would gentlemen wish to go farther than was necessary? What could be better than possessing the power of doing all they wanted? It seemed to him to be a race which should go farthest in his particular way. What more was necessary than to order the vessels to be taken and the men to be hanged?

On the subject of arming merchantmen, Mr. M. did not think the comparison of the assassin a just one; in individual encounters the consequences fall on themselves alone; but here, the consequences would be much more serious, if the power were abused. He did not suppose that merchantmen, generally, would seek to abuse it, but they were not better than any other class of men, nor did he believe them worse.

As to the effect these measures would produce on Spain, they were not worth thinking of. He considered Spain out of the question. What was Spain? No human being could tell—there were people there, and a sort of Government—but the French were there to keep their own people down. With respect to the people of Cuba, Mr. M. said he knew little or nothing. He always had understood that the trade to that island was a most profitable one to the United States. It appeared quite impossible to him that such a state of society could subsist as was described in Cuba; he should hope to find there as many pure as would have saved Sodom and Gomorrah.

Mr. M. said, if he were to liken this blockade to any thing, it would be to the attack on Copenhagen, by the British. Britain was afraid of the naval power of her rival and enemy, and said as Rome did, Carthage must be put down! It was ludicrous to talk of arming a whole nation against 400 or 500 bandits, after the late contest with the British. He saw no necessity for arming the merchantmen. If the navy could not protect the merchantmen, particularly in the American seas, we ought to have neither navy nor merchantmen.

He recollected Preble had put an end to the Tripolitan war, and Decatur soon ended the Algerine war. Both of these people were pirates by trade, by education, and, he had almost said, by religion. Our vessels went there at once: and cannot our vessels catch these Cuba bandits, without our attempting to make an interpolation in the law of nations? It was, he thought, a most difficult thing to alter public law. During the American war, all the powers of Europe assembled to do it—Great Britain withstood it, and the public law is now as Great Britain then said it should be.

It appeared to him, from Mr. Randall's report, that nothing but ships were wanting. He had no opinion of stuffing an administration. If they obtained what they wanted, they ought to be held responsible for the success of the means employed. They did not want either armed merchant vessels, or a blockade. Of the latter, the President speaks with great delicacy; and from the former, the Secretary of the Navy thinks mischief may arise. Therefore, he thought it would be wise to give the administration what they wanted, but no more; and that he was willing to do now. He did not wish to make any profession of his wish to see the robbers exterminated, for we were to be judged, not by our words, but by our deeds. There was not a civilized man in the world but would wish it; and he could not call that inhabitant of Cuba a civilized man, that encouraged piracy. They waged war against the whole human race; a war of the most disastrous kind. They could be governed by no rule towards them but that of extermination: and as they could be repressed most efficiently without either blockading them, or arming the merchantmen, he was opposed to both measures.

The question was then taken on striking out the third section, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Boulogny, Branch, Brown, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of Ala., King of N. Y., Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Md., Lowrie, Melville, McLean, Macon, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Taylor, Tazewell, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, Williams—37.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Eaton, Hayne, Holmes of Miss., Jackson, Johnson of Ken., Johnston of Lou., Kelly, Lloyd of Mass., Mills—10.

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 2.

Suppression of Piracy.

The Senate again took up the bill "for the Suppression of Piracy." The following motion, made yesterday, by Mr. VAN BUREN, being still pending, viz:

Resolved, That the bill "For the Suppression of Piracy in the West Indies," be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to report amendments thereto, giving power to the President, on its being satisfactorily proved to him that any of the pirates mentioned in the said act, find refuge in any of the cities or ports of the said island of Cuba, or other islands mentioned in the said bill, and that the local Governments of the said islands, on being requested so to do, neglect or refuse to aid in the apprehension, prosecution, and conviction of such pirates, to give authority to the crews of the armed vessels of the United States, under such instructions as may be given them, to land on the said islands, in search of pirates, and there to subdue, vanquish, and capture them, and bring them to the United States for trial and adjudication, as the said instructions of the President of the United States may prescribe: and further, to authorize reprisals on the commerce and property of the inhabitants of the said islands.

Mr. BARBOUR made a few remarks against the principle proposed in the instructions, and also against recommitting the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VAN BUREN replied to Mr. B., and had no disposition to burden the committee with a duty which was not acceptable. As there were many propositions before the Senate for amending the bill, he wished it recommitting for the purpose of receiving such shape as would be generally agreeable to the Senate; but he would waive his motion until the sense of the Senate had been expressed on those amendments; and he accordingly, for the present, withdrew it.

The question then recurred on the following section, which Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, yesterday offered, viz :

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no public armed vessel of the United States, authorized and employed for the suppression of piracy, shall be engaged or employed in the transportation of specie, or any other article of freight, unless specially designated therefor by the President of the United States."

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, moved to strike out the words "unless specially designated therefor by the President of the United States."

Mr. COBB said he thought, from the documents which had been communicated by the Executive, it was sufficiently evident that this business of the transportation of specie in public armed vessels of the United States, must be a source of great emolument to those engaged in it. The officers of our naval force being like other men, would be unwilling to relinquish so profitable a trade, and it was a strong impression on his mind, that, so long as the practice continued, piracy never would be suppressed. If piracy were suppressed, there would be no further occasion for their being employed, but, so long as it continued, this system of jobbing would be pursued. Every temptation ought to be removed that would induce them to lax in the discharge of their duties. Let them be employed in the suppression of piracy alone.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said, he understood it had been the practice for the President of the United States to designate the vessels which should be employed in this service of the transportation of specie—but there was nothing prohibitory, in the law and regulations, against other vessels doing the same. The consequence had been, that some part of the squadron had been employed in the transportation of specie. He should be unwilling to prevent the Executive designating, if he should see fit, the vessels which should be employed in the transportation of specie; but, at the same time, to say that other public armed vessels, not so designated, should not be so employed, would be to strike at the root of the evil. He thought piracy would have been suppressed by this time, had it not been for the cupidity of our naval officers.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, said, that, in the documents on the table, there was but one allegation, and that by an individual, to prove that the public vessels had quitted their station, to transport specie, and had thus left the commerce unprotected. He doubted the existence of this fact to any great extent, and certainly the Senate ought not to legislate on it without having the fullest and most authentic information as to the extent of the practice. They ought, in his opinion, to apply for information to that Department which knew what had been done. There was a regulation by which every officer was obliged to report, on his return home, what he had received; therefore, if the Senate called for information, there was no doubt of its being furnished. Mr. L. said he would suppose that an insurrection should break out in a town where our vessels were stationed—Havana for instance—what would be the consequence? Our merchants had large sums of money there, and had no vessels to carry it away; it would be lost, because the public vessels would be forbidden, by law, to carry it away. Mr. L. said he was willing to agree with the gentleman from Maine, as to prohibiting the transportation of specie, excepting with instructions from the President or head of the Navy Department, but he hoped that his amendment would not go farther.

Mr. COBB said that the gentleman from Massachusetts seemed to doubt the authenticity of the statement which had been made; but his (Mr. C.'s) reasons for not doubting it was this: those documents had been presented to the Senate by the Navy Department, and if that Department had not believed in their authenticity they would never have communicated them. What has thus been laid before us, said Mr. C., is a convincing reason why piracy has not been suppressed, and it is the particular reason of my making the motion. The trade of transporting specie must afford great profit to the naval officers who are engaged in it. This temptation is such as to draw their attention from subjects of infinitely greater importance, and unless it is removed they never will perform their duty.

Mr. MILLS, of Massachusetts, thought that the amendment would operate to a greater extent than was anticipated. All public armed vessels were authorized to suppress pirates wherever they met with them. The amendment would go to prohibit the transportation of specie in public armed vessels altogether. Piracy did not exist in the West Indies alone. By act of Congress, the slave trade was piracy, and slave dealers were pirates; therefore, a vessel on the coast of Africa would be prohibited transporting specie as well as a vessel in the West India seas. The modification suggested by his colleague, (Mr. LLOYD,) would have been more proper than this; for that would have prohibited at once all armed vessels transporting specie.

The question was then taken on Mr. COBB's amendment, and lost.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the section so as to prohibit all public armed vessels whatever from transporting specie, except such as should be specially designated by the President of the United States for the purpose; and he said that he was well satisfied that this traffic prevented piracy from being suppressed. The gentlemen of the Navy would, no doubt, like to make a little profit when they could do it legally, and on some stations the practice was very lucrative. Sometimes one commanding officer would have the benefit, sometimes another. Some would make more, and some nothing at all, which produced a soreness amongst the gentlemen of the Navy, while it seemed to divert their attention from the real and important object in view; and as long as this practice continued, the service must suffer by it. It should, therefore, be prohibited, except where the President thought it necessary to point out certain vessels to perform that duty.

Mr. HOWARD, of Maine, said he always thought it was necessary to confine legislation to the subject matter before them—they were now providing for the suppression of piracy, and he hoped they would confine themselves to that subject. If they wished to enact a general law for the regulation of the Navy, they ought to do so. It was a misfortune, he said, that there was not a naval peace establishment adopted, and he thought it was time there was one; but it could not be provided for in a bill intended for a different purpose. The want of such a law had produced all the evils complained of, and many more; and one principle which ought to be in such a law, was that which his colleague had suggested. They had not yet been able to pass a general bill, or to do any thing more for the regulation of the Navy than regarded the pay of the sailors; and the pay of the officers was provided for only by restrictions in the appropriation bill. He regretted these things were not more specially provided for, but it was not regular to attempt it in a bill of this sort. If the Legislature confined themselves to the object before them, he thought they could not miss it. With regard to his own amendment, he thought it was a proper one. Some were of opinion he had gone too far, but others thought he had not gone far enough. He agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the President ought to have the power of designating the vessels which should be employed, but he could not make the amendment he suggested.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, said, that last session the Senate had passed a bill regulating the transportation of specie, and sent it to the other House, but it was not acted on. They had also passed a bill authorizing the building of ten sloops of war, but it had not been acted on. Were they to be told that these sloops of war were necessary for the suppression of piracy, or that they were intended exclusively for that object? No; they were necessary for our service, and he believed it was enough to authorize a law to build them, no matter whether they were connected with the piratical or any other question. He was very anxious to suppress this transportation of specie in public armed vessels. It was necessary, as far as regarded the moral and physical force of the Navy, that it should be prohibited, not only in the Gulf of Mexico, but in every part of the world. We were now beginning to feel the ill effects of this system; the squadron sent to the Gulf of Mexico was useless from this cause. In the South sea this traffic, for such he must call it, was carried on to a greater extent than in any other part, and it would have the same effect in every part of the world—that of impairing the moral and physical force of the Navy. He did not perceive any thing incongruous in making this general provision in the bill for the suppression of piracy; it was as much connected with it as the bill for building ten sloops of war. He believed our naval officers to be the bravest and best on the face of the globe, but, if we placed temptations in their way, which it was not in the power of human nature to resist, we lessened their moral elevation, and lowered that chivalrous character which they ought always to preserve. He did not suspect them of sacrificing their duty, but it was necessary to guard them from all those temptations which might induce them to do so. The moment a soldier or officer lost that high principle which ought to characterize a military man, and became a trader in gold and silver, that moment his moral force was destroyed. What danger could result to the interest of this country from regulating the transportation of specie? They would not allow the President to point out where it should be carried. Did they doubt that he would ever refuse to transport the specie of the citizens of America? If they did doubt it, they must suppose he was unmindful of the interest of those citizens. It might be necessary, and in many instances be proper, to transport specie in armed vessels, but let this specie belong to the citizens of America, and not that belonging to foreign powers. If this provision were made, it would redound to the benefit of the commerce of the country, and the good of the Navy; and as they could not get this provision in a direct bill, they would be satisfied to procure it otherwise.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, said, the current was running very strong against the transportation of specie in public vessels; but he believed it to be a very useful thing. It was not at all a novel principle, but had been acted upon by Great Britain for ages. She expressly authorized her naval officers to do it. If abuses crept into this system, why were they not remedied? why put this sweeping restriction on it? He believed it was a thing which might be easily regulated. If the President were required to designate the vessels which were to perform this duty, how could he possibly do it? how could he foresee what occurrences might take place, or what changes or emergencies happen in the West Indies or elsewhere? Mr. L. observed there had been a sweeping denunciation pronounced against the whole of the naval officers employed in the West India service. Would the Senate sanction such a charge as this without properly ascertaining the facts on which it was founded? He looked upon it in a very serious light. If the gentleman would so modify his resolution as to prohibit the transportation of specie, except with instructions from the President, he would agree with him. As this charge had been seriously made, this bill should lie on the table with the amendment, till they could ascertain what were the instructions given by the Secretary of the Navy to the officers, as regarded the transportation of specie, and to what extent the practice had prevailed.

MR. SMITH said he was against the motion made by the gentleman from Maine, (MR. CHANDLER.) The officers of the Navy had not, in his opinion, done any thing to draw censure on them; they had acted according to their instructions. [Here MR. SMITH quoted the instructions from the documents on the table.] These, said Mr. S., being the instructions, no possible blame could be attached to the officers of the Navy, for conforming to them. MR. S. then remarked that we carried on a great and increasing trade through Alvarado and Tampico; the returns were principally in specie, for there was nothing else to be got there, and it was very unsafe to trust this on board of unarmed vessels. Government might direct one vessel, and one only, to transport the specie, but without that protection, it would be very dangerous to carry on the trade. Our manufactures, said Mr. S., are preferred to all others in the South American market, and our merchants had established their agents in the interior, to whom they sent their manufactures for sale—the returns were generally in specie; and would they endanger this trade, for fear that the naval officers should be drawn away from their employment? He could not understand this. The amendment, as it now stood, without any alteration to it, was a very good one. It might be, Mr. S. said, that the prejudices of education prevented him from seeing any harm that could arise from ships of war bringing home money from the Pacific. The trade there brought much money into the United States. The instructions forbid the Captains, on that coast, from bringing home any money but what belongs to merchants of the United States. You pass this bill, said Mr. S., and it is an interdict. How are your officers to know of the passage of this bill providing against it? or how is the President to designate the vessel that is to be employed? Large sums of money are there belonging to merchants. The agents wish to remit it, but the Captain who is there may not, under this amendment, take it, because he is not the Captain designated. We have a very extensive trade with South America. From the Middle States we supply them with vast quantities of flour in particular. They sell their cargoes at Lima. Part of the produce of the sale they lay out in copper, and the rest they have to send home in specie. But now they will be utterly unable to do so, unless the very vessel the President has designated happens to be on the spot. A great evil will arise from this, because the merchants will be compelled to send their money home in unarmed vessels. This will be known, and pirates will lay in wait for, and capture them. If our naval officers do now and then make a little money, by bringing home specie, I, said Mr. S., shall be very well pleased. Their pay is merely a living, and their obtaining a little money by these means, does harm to nobody. Your trade in the Pacific does not suffer by it. The British allow their Captains, on the station, to make what they can, and they not only bring home money for their own merchants, but bring it for any other party that will pay them for it. It consequently has become a drug in England. What we forbid, they take. I spoke lately with an officer, who informed me that he was requested to bring home a sum of about two millions of dollars, but he dare not do it; and the British did, and received the premium for it. If the officer had been allowed to have done it, he would have made a considerable sum of money, and this quantity of specie would have been introduced into this country, instead of being carried to England. The proposed amendment, Mr. S. thought, would create a great evil to remedy a small one.

MR. CHANDLER said he had never, before this time, been given to understand that the object of building a fleet was to make them carriers of gold and silver for the profit of the officers of the Navy. He did not think the amendment would operate as his friend from Maryland seemed to think it would; if the amendment succeeded, the President might authorize all ships to be carriers, and under such circumstances as he might direct. MR. C. said his object was not to prevent the carrying of specie, under any circumstances whatever, but, if it were to be carried at all, the Navy ought not to profit by it—if their pay was not sufficient, he would say, give them more, but do not let them depend on individual merchants of the United States for their compensation.

MR. LLOYD, of Maryland, said, that he had engaged unexpectedly in the debate. He had certainly been misunderstood if he had been supposed to have said, or intended to have said, any thing disrespectful of the officers of the Navy generally. He believed they were inferior to none in respectability; but they were like other classes of men, and there might be some amongst them who were not quite what they ought to be. They were not now erecting a tribunal to decide on the merits of their naval officers—they were trying now to erect a system for the suppression of piracy, by which they might remove all the obstacles which were stated to them by the President, as existing unfavorable to that view. They were told, amongst other things, by the respectable agent, (MR. RANDALL,) that the transportation of specie through the Gulf of Mexico, has been one of the means of preventing the suppression of piracy. Was the Senate to wait till these officers were tried by court-martial before it gave credence to the President of the United States? for, MR. L. said, he considered the documents being communicated to the Senate, a sufficient proof that the President believed them to be true. This evidence sufficiently proved, that the system of transporting specie had been destructive to the discipline of the squadron in that quarter. What, then, were they to do? They were, if possible, to prevent a recurrence of that system, and, in so doing, they should not pretend to decide on the guilt or innocence of the officers who have commanded on that station. They were told that it was necessary that this practice should be suppressed: therefore, they ought to pass the amendment now proposed. He repeated he meant no reflection on the officers of the Navy generally. He was told by his colleague, that, to remove a small evil, a greater one was to be created; that there was a very profitable trade between the United States and the Pacific; that the returns were made in specie, and it was necessary that our ships should transport this specie. But he would ask him, where any considerable trade was carried on with these ports, was there a single dollar brought home in public armed vessels? The trade, said Mr. L., was carried on in unarmed vessels, and, month after month, vessels arrived at Baltimore, bringing home large amounts in specie—and, if this trade could be carried on in safety to Baltimore, it could be carried on to any other ports of the Union, without the intervention of public armed vessels.

With regard to the transportation of specie from the Pacific, Mr. L. said, it did not often occur that the public armed vessels brought home much from that part of the world. The money made by transportation did not result from the home trade, but from carrying money from port to port in South America. This traffic, Mr. L. contended, was a violation of the laws of nations; our ships of war were converted into insurance offices; the money of the belligerents was put on board, and our officers received the premiums. This ought certainly to be prohibited. The cupidity of the officers ought not to be suffered to compromise the peace of the nation. Nothing but the weakness of the different powers in that part of the world, had prevented our vessels from being attacked on these very grounds. If England and France were at war, would such a thing be suffered? Doubtless it would not, and it did not become the dignity of Government to countenance an act towards a weak power, that she would not do towards a stronger one. Supposing that, after this amendment should have passed, a public armed vessel should transport specie, was there any thing in this amendment to prevent it? Till the law reached the Pacific, the commanders of vessels would act under the instructions they already had. If there were any vessel to carry out this law, and the President had time, he would inform the officers there at once, and would designate the vessel which was to bring home the specie, if it brought it to American citizens, and, if he had not time, they would act under the instructions they now had—and no injury would be done to the nation.

In regard to the case cited of the British Navy, Mr. L. observed that we had a navy which could stand on its own merits, and required no precedent from the British Navy to give it consequence; and we had departed, in many instances, from the practices of the British Navy, many of which were bad enough.

Mr. HAYNE said, that this provision went to make a regulation which would affect the commerce of the United States to a great extent. The object of this bill was to suppress piracy in the West Indies, and any provision might be grafted on it that would tend to assist that object; they might declare the squadron should not be diverted from that one object; should not be sent to the coast of Africa or to Mexico; they might make any such limitations as those; but, when they undertook to make a general regulation for the commerce and Navy of the United States, they opened a wide field for discussion, and it would be impossible to perceive where it would terminate. At the last session, this very point was determined, that the interest of commerce required that this privilege should not be altogether destroyed—but that it should be regulated; accordingly, it was submitted to a committee, and great attention was bestowed on it; a bill was reported for the regulation of the practice, and all agreed to it; and it was not their fault that this was not now a law. But, if the House said they would now go into the consideration of regulations for the transportation of specie, it would be necessary for them to rise, to move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, by adding the clauses of the bill of last session. Was the Senate prepared for this? No. It would be better to suffer this bill to depend upon its own merits, and then he would agree with the gentleman on the proposition as related to the transportation of specie. This was a business of much importance to the commercial part of the Union, and he thought at least they ought to confine their deliberations to the object in view, which was the suppression of piracy in the West Indies.

On the question being taken on Mr. CHANDLER's amendment, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, then moved to strike out of the section the words "specially designated," and insert instead, the words in conformity with instructions.

Mr. L. said, he did not like to undertake to make remarks, without having evidence before him; but he felt himself compelled to do so, to do away the impression that might be made by the observation of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. LLOYD,) that the public ships were converted into insurance offices. This would indeed be a belligerent measure, and would justify the detention and capture of such ships. His impression was, that it would turn out that this practice was prohibited by the instructions of the Navy Department, and therefore the allegation would prove unfounded. Mr. L. said, we had lost at one time 100,000 dollars of specie, by there being no vessel at hand to take it away. He inquired how it was possible to point out which should be the vessel? A large quantity of money might be collected together, and a vessel off the port refuse to take it, because she was not the vessel designated. Meanwhile an invading army might come down and carry off the specie, because the vessel designated to take it away was a hundred miles off, and none other dared to do it.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said, that the President would point out the vessels on the West India station to perform that duty. There were vessels enough for that particular species of service, and the others should not be suffered to engage in it. He did not believe that the merchants were in any danger of losing their money by an insurrection in that quarter. The Senate, he said, were now legislating for the safety of the lives of their fellow-citizens, and to protect them against lawless butchers; and if the President gave general instructions to the fleet, there seemed to be but little danger of those instructions being abused. He esteemed the officers of the Navy, but they were but men, and might become wicked, and might become so in proportion to the temptation. With all his affection for the Navy, he had some fears that it was not on so good a standing as it was at the close of the last war. He was afraid that, if there were another war, instead of seeking the enemy as they had done before, some would be found, who would be more inclined to act as privateers. Part of our navy was in port, and part employed, and there was scarcely a breeze that blew, but what brought intelligence of discord and disagreement among the officers. One-half were engaged in sitting on courts-martial to try the others, and one of high rank was sent for home to answer for his conduct. What is the reason, said Mr. H., that, two years ago, our commerce and sailors were efficiently protected from the depredations of these pirates, and now it cannot be done, though in possession of the same means? You are told by the document on the table, from your respectable agent in Cuba. I think we are bound to believe in it, taken in connection with the supposition that the same effect is not now produced that was formerly, although the same means are employed. The complaint is made to you, and you are to prescribe the proper remedy, and you are doing it in endeavoring to restrain, in some measure, the evil complained of.

Mr. BARBOUR expressed his regret that the amendment had ever been introduced at all. The attention of the Senate had been drawn off by it from the object in view, which was the bill to suppress piracy, to one which bore altogether a distinct character. Independent of any legislative measure on the subject, if information reached the proper department, to whom was imparted the capacity to regulate it, that the naval officers had not been sufficiently attentive to their duty, but had suffered themselves to be seduced from it, it would be their bounden duty to give the necessary instructions to put a stop to such abuses. Mr. B. inquired, whether it would not be possible to effect a compromise between the parties, so as to get clear of the general question in any instance, and to confine it to piracy in the West Indies. If, after the word piracy, aforsaid were added, it would get rid of all the difficulties. The effect of this provision would then be limited to the squadron in the West Indies.

Mr. TAZEWELL observed, that there were pirates in many other parts of the world besides the West Indies. The difference between the object that his colleague had in view, and that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, would best be exhibited by supposing the word piracy struck out from the third section, and piracies aforsaid put in its place. There were pirates in many parts. Slave traders were pirates; pirates there were found also in the East Indies, in the Straits of Sunda, and in the Pacific Ocean. The object of this section was to impose restrictions by law, so that no public armed vessel, engaged in the suppression of piracy, should engage in the transportation of specie. But they wanted no instructions; they had them already; for it was a portion of the duty of every public vessel to suppress pirates, wherever they found them, and there was no better way of assisting commerce than to protect it from the depredations of these freebooters.

The question being on Mr. LLOYD's motion to strike out the words "especially designated," and insert in conformity with instructions, was decided in the affirmative—ayes 27.

Mr. BARBOUR then moved the amendment he had just before suggested, (limiting the operation of the section to the West Indies,) and it was agreed to.

Mr. PARBOTT moved to strike out the words "or any other articles of freight," because public vessels were seldom or never employed in transporting any thing but specie or bullion.

After some conversation, this motion was lost; and then

The question being taken on the section, it was rejected—ayes 18, noes 20.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 3.

Suppression of Piracy.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to suppress Piracy in the West Indies—the amendment proposed by Mr. SMITH, (granting aid to merchantmen to arm,) being still pending.

On this amendment, and various propositions to modify it, in regard to the kind and quantity of armament required, the amount of premium, &c., a discussion took place, which continued about two hours. In this discussion, Messrs. SMITH, HOLMES of Maine, EATON, MILL, LLOYD of Mass., D'WOLF, LLOYD of Md., HAYNE, VAN BUREN, and FINDLAY, took part.

Finally the Senate refused to fill the blank for the premium with $100, with $75, and with $50. On the latter sum, the question was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, D'Wolf, Edwards, Hayne, Johnston of Lou., Kelly, Lloyd of Mass., Lowrie, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, and Van Buren—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Boulogny, Branch, Brown, Chandler, Clayton, Dickerson, Eaton, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Miss., Jackson, King of Ala., King of N. Y., Knight, Lloyd of Md., Macon, Talbot, Taylor, Tazewell, Thomas, Van Dyke, and Williams—27.

The question was then taken on the amendment itself, proposed by Mr. SMITH, and negatived without a division.

Mr. MACON then, for the purpose of ascertaining, as he said, whether the Senate were disposed to act at all on this bill, on this subject of granting encouragement to the merchantmen to arm, &c., moved to strike out the fourth section of the bill, which is as follows:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the commanders and crews of any armed merchant vessel of the United States be, and they are hereby, authorized to recapture any vessel and cargo taken by pirates upon the coast of the island of Cuba, or the other islands aforesaid, or on the adjoining seas; and such vessel, so recaptured, being brought into any judicial district of the United States, shall be adjudged to be restored by any court of the United States, having admiralty jurisdiction therein, to the former owner or owners of the same, he or they paying for salvage not less than one-eighth, nor more than one-half of the true value of the said vessel and cargo, at the discretion of the court, for the benefit of the re-captors, and in such proportions as the court shall direct, which payments of salvage shall be made without any deduction whatsoever."

On this motion a debate arose, of considerable duration, in which Messrs. MACON, MILLS, TAZEWELL, BARBOUR, and SMITH, took part. The debate turned principally on the expediency of inserting in this bill provisions already substantially in force; on the propriety of making any discrimination in the amount of salvage to be allowed for recaptures from the pirates in the West Indies, and recaptures elsewhere; whether proper to fix the amount by the bill, or leave it to the discretion of the court, &c. In the course of the debate, Mr. SMITH moved to strike out the words which made the section applicable alone to Cuba and the West Indies, so as to leave the provision general; but no question was taken before the adjournment.

MONDAY, February 7.

Yaeoo Claims.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, unfavorable to the petition of Ebenezer Oliver and others, together with the motion to strike out of the resolution accompanying, the word "not," so as to reverse the report. The debate on this subject was resumed, and continued during the whole of this day's sitting.

Mr. VAN BUREN spoke at great length against the claims of the petitioners, grounding his objections on these points: That this question had been once decided by a competent tribunal, established at the instance of the parties seeking relief; that it was against the policy of the Government, and against the public interest, to open these proceedings, and, if they were opened, there was nothing in these claims founded either in justice or equity.

Mr. KELLY, Mr. SEYMOUR, and Mr. MILLS, each spoke at considerable length in reply to Mr. VAN BUREN, and in favor of the claim of the petitioners; after which the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 8.

Election of President, &c.

The committee on the part of the Senate, appointed to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, report, in part, the agreement of the Joint Committee to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th day of February, 1825, at 12 o'clock; that one person be appointed teller on the part of the Senate, and two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the House, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce to the two Houses, assembled as aforesaid, the state of the vote, and the person or persons elected, if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution of the United States, which annunciation shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the person or persons elected, and, together with a list of the votes, shall be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

[The committee which made this report consisted, on the part of the Senate, of Mr. TAZEWELL, Mr. VAN DYKE, Mr. KING, of Alabama.

On the part of the House of Representatives, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. ARCHER, Mr. THOMPSON, of Pennsylvania.]

Mr. TALBOT suggested some difficulty in the order of proceeding recommended by the committee, and Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, proposed some amendment, but which he subsequently withdrew. These suggestions gave rise to some discussion of the subject, in which Messrs. HOLMES of Maine, TALBOT, TAZEWELL, LOWRIE, BARBOUR, JOHNSON of Kentucky, KING of Alabama, and VAN DYKE, participated.

Mr. TAZEWELL went, at some length, into an explanation and justification of the course adopted by the committee. In some points, in which the committee on the part of the Senate would have preferred a different arrangement, they were overruled by the committee on the part of the other House, which had its rights as well as the Senate. The mode reported by the committee, was precisely, however, the same as that adopted by the Senate, and agreed on by the two Houses, on similar occasions, from the year 1805 to 1817, inclusive.

The report of the committee was concurred in.

Mr. TAZEWELL was appointed teller on the part of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, February 9.

Election of President by the House of Representatives.

At twelve o'clock, the Senate proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives, agreeably to joint resolution, for the purpose of opening and counting the Electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

At half-past two o'clock, the Senate returned to its Chamber, and then adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 11.

Notification of Vice President's Election.

Mr. TAZEWELL submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be transmitted to John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, Vice President elect of the United States, notification of his election to that office, and that the President of the Senate do make and sign a certificate in the words following, to wit:

"Be it known, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened at the city of Washington, on the second Wednesday of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, the underwritten President of the Senate pro tempore, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the Electors for a President and Vice President of the United States: Whereupon, it appeared that John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, had a majority of the votes of the Electors, as Vice President; by all which it appears that John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, has been duly elected Vice President of the United States, agreeably to the constitution.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, this — day of February, 1825.

"And that the President of the Senate do cause the certificate aforesaid to be laid before the President of the United States, with this resolution."

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the resolution was forthwith considered, and was agreed to.

TUESDAY, February 15.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. KING, of Alabama, in the chair,) the bill to amend the Judicial System of the United States, and to provide for three additional Circuit Courts; the question being on recommitting the bill with instructions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, offered a few further remarks explanatory of the nature of the bill, and called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TAZEWELL, of Virginia, adverted to the importance of the measure, and the impossibility of its receiving the consideration which it merited, and passing through both Houses of Congress the present session. He then moved that the bill and resolution be indefinitely postponed, and pledged himself, should the postponement take place, to co-operate with the honorable mover of the bill, in producing a plan which should ensure the attainment of the object he had in view, by the best means that could be employed.

Mr. TALBOT hoped that the bill would not be postponed, and went into a long argument to show that the Western States, who had been for years asking that the benefits of the circuit system should be allowed them, should not longer be denied a just and common right. He proceeded to reply at some length to the arguments urged against the bill, when it was last before the Senate, and contended that the present bill was only an attempt to perfect a system which had received the approbation of the country for more than thirty years, a system copied from the English Judiciary, which, whatever might be said of the Government, was the pride of the country and the admiration of the world.

The question being taken on the indefinite postponement of the bill, it was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Branch, Clayton, Cobb, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, King of New York, Lowrie, Macon, Mills, Taylor, Tazewell, Van Buren, Van Dyke—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Boulligny, Brown, Chandler, Dickerson, Eaton, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Alabama, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, McLean, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Thomas, Williams—28.

The question then recurring on the motion to recommit the bill with instructions, The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 16.

The Senate again took up, in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend the judicial system of the United States, and for the appointment of three additional circuit judges, (in the Western States,) the question pending being on the recommitment of the bill to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TAZEWELL then, for the purpose, he said, of trying the sense of the Senate on the most important feature of the bill, moved so to amend it as to provide that the three additional circuit judges shall not be justices of the Supreme Court.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that the effect of this amendment would be to degrade the Western States. There was a clause in the constitution, that States, on coming into the Union, should receive equal rights and privileges. He had said, on a former occasion, that it was not to be expected that these States were, in their infancy, to receive, at once, all the benefits of the system, but now, after so much time had passed, and their claims were so generally acknowledged, they were fully entitled to be placed on an equality with the other States; and what was it that was now offered to them? They would allow them circuit judges, but they were not to occupy a seat on the Supreme Bench of the Union. Against this he protested. Mr. J. made a few more remarks in opposition to this motion, when

Mr. TAZEWELL offered, succinctly, his reasons for submitting his amendment, and to show the unreasonableness and impropriety of different parts of the country claiming an exact portion of judges on the bench of the Supreme Court, and the absurdity of resorting to the principle of judicial representation to procure impartial justice, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he wished to say a few words in answer to the gentleman from Virginia, and first, as to judicial representation. He supposed that it was the duty of every individual to put the precise construction on the words in debate, which the individual using those words intended to communicate. If, therefore, from the defectiveness of his language, the gentleman had extended his meaning of the words judicial representation, he hoped he should receive the pardon of that honorable body, in giving a short explanation of his meaning. It might be the same thing to the honorable gentleman whether the man who was to decide on the rights of his constituents came from one of the distant States, or any corner of this Union. Mr. J. said he wanted Kentucky to decide for Kentucky. They wanted the measure of justice extended to them that had been extended to the old States for forty years, and yet their doctrine was said to be heretical. He had said before, and he repeated it, they had a right to a judicial representation on the bench of the Supreme Court, in the sense in which he took it. He meant only the extension of the system to all the States—of that system which secured to Virginia two Supreme Judges, and he did not speak of it in any other view.

Mr. J. wished to do away with the trouble and confusion that had arisen in this country from the words, impairing the obligation of contracts, but he did not deny the solemnity of the principle the words contained. He only spoke of the confusion that had been introduced into the judiciary of the whole Union by those words. He thought the gentleman could not tell him what was the construction put on those words by the Supreme Court of the Union. It had been decided many times, in different ways, in the State he (Mr. J.) represented. He complained of the words because they allowed of a latitude that involved State rights and State sovereignty, of which Virginia had complained as loud as any. He did say, and he repeated it, those words were introduced into the constitution without intending to give them any importance, yet more confusion had grown out of them than from any words in the constitution for many years past.

If the doctrine were true, that responsibility diminished in an inverse ratio as numbers increased, then the body to whom he now addressed himself might as well consist of twenty-four as of forty-eight members. The House of Representatives would be better with half its present number. The same principle would apply—and the Supreme Court had better consist of one member than seven.

He thought that equal justice would never be extended to them, without they were fairly represented, each judge having a district allotted to him, in which he could reasonably move. They did not wish for inferior judges, who were, in a manner, disfranchised, to be sent amongst them; that was not the remedy they wanted. What they asked for was a remedy which should strike at the root of the evil; and he did think they would be degraded if they received judges who were disfranchised from sitting on the Supreme Bench.

He should, he said, be unwilling to trust the decision of those great constitutional questions, which might humble the State sovereignties to the dust, to any tribunal on earth that was not direct from the people, and for the decisions of such questions they ought to have a majority of six instead of three, by increasing the number of judges. He trusted, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia would not prevail.

Mr. TALBOT, of Kentucky, rose and said that the immense importance of the proposition which was the subject of this discussion, not only to that section of the Union for whose immediate and more peculiar benefit it is calculated and intended to operate, but to every portion of this widely extended Union, must be his apology for attempting some opposition to the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who, in addition to the proposition of his honorable colleague, (Mr. BARBOUR,) has favored us with his new projet as a substitute for the bill upon your table.

This last amendment, offered by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TAZEWELL,) the subject of the present discussion, is, to my mind, Mr. President, the more inadmissible—I must say, intolerable, than all the propositions which have been submitted to this honorable body, or for the reformation or improvement of the present organization of our judicial system. Of the importance of this department of our national institutions, of that department which is concerned in the daily administration of distributive justice to the citizens of these United States, by a speedy, correct, and impartial decision of their various controversies, which arise to disturb the happiness of domestic or social life, we cannot speak too strongly, or estimate too highly. The effects and operations of the other departments of your Government—of your legislative and executive—the law-giving and the law-executing functionaries of national authority, you feel the force and enjoy the benefits at intervals. But the action of the judicial functions is that which, as it pervades more intimately the affairs and concerns of men, has an almost incessant and constant influence on the society, the peace and happiness of which it was instituted to preserve and promote. With what caution and deliberate reflection, aided by all the lights of wisdom and matured experience, ought we to approach this interesting subject! Influenced by these considerations, the friends of the proposition embraced by the bill on your table, contemplate by its provisions no radical change in the organization of your judicial system, which has been so long in operation; a system which, framed by the experienced wisdom of many of those sages to whom the glorious charter of our liberties, the Federal Constitution, owes its birth, claims to participate largely in the advantages which so much wisdom, skill, and political knowledge and experience could bring to so great a work as the organization of a judicial system, corresponding to the wants, wishes, and interests of our extensive confederation.

This system, Mr. President, established by the act of 1789, framed in so much wisdom and experience—sanctioned by such names as the Congress of the United States of that period enrolled in the catalogue of its members—adopted as its model, for the outlines of its institution, that of the British Empire, from whom we derive our origin, and many of our inestimable institutions; and whose Judiciary, whatever we may think or say of the faults or defects of other departments of her Government—of the inequality of representation, or corruption of her House of Commons—of the aristocratic and dangerous character of her House of Lords, or of the arbitrary prerogatives of her King—as regards her Judiciary, it has been, in its general organization, in the purity and correctness of its administration of distributive justice, the pride of that nation, and the admiration of the civilized world. The union of original and appellate jurisdiction in the twelve judges of Westminster Hall, who, in their allotted circuits, traverse the extent of the British Isle, holding in each county, or shire, of that kingdom, a court of Nisi Prius, for the trial of causes arising within them, and adjourning questions of novelty, difficulty, or peculiar magnitude, to the Court of King's Bench, or other revising and controlling court of appellate jurisdiction at Westminster—has never yet been held as a blemish, much less of fatal error in the organization of the British Courts. Nor has the number of twelve judges, of which the courts of Westminster are composed, been complained of as inadequate to the discharge of the functions incident to the holding the courts of Nisi Prius, from age, infirmity, or any of those causes which are alleged by honorable gentlemen, as disqualifying the judges of our own Supreme Court from the discharge of the functions of circuit judges, to which they have been found entirely competent through the course of our long experience for a period of five and thirty years.

If this period, Mr. President, having its origin almost coeval with the origin and introduction of our happy form of government, during which a generation has passed away, has marked the present system with no striking imperfection, with no flagrant abuse, indicating incurable defects in its general organization or prominent features—if, on the contrary, this faithful test of long and tried experience, the surest foundation of human wisdom, and best guarantee for the permanency, as well as value of all human institutions, has affixed the stamp of its approbation on its value and utility, this tried experience and this long approval of the present system, by the American people, ought to form a strong barrier, which they have thrown around these existing institutions, not to be lightly or easily prostrated by the experiments of new and untried theories of mere speculation. Unless indeed, such new theories shall be found, on examination, to be based upon foundations of reason and argument of the most satisfactory and conclusive character. Such, to my mind, Mr. President, have not been the character or force of the arguments presented to the Senate by either of the honorable gentlemen from Virginia, in favor of their respective projets, with which we have been favored in the course of this debate.

The plan of my honorable friend, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who moved you for the recommitment of this bill, for the purpose of maturing his projet, is to exempt the present judges, who constitute the Supreme Court of the United States, from all the duties of presiding in, or holding the Circuit Courts, assigning, by his plan, all the duties of those courts, with any other appertaining to the exercise of original jurisdiction, to a new corps of judges, to be created and appointed for this purpose, with the creation of salaries adequate to the attainment of this object. My honorable friend, passing by the considerations of the increase in the national expenditure, as matters unworthy his sublime genius and contemplations; and forgetful that the plan in substance, which he now proposes, was not only offered, but adopted, and put into prompt and immediate operation some five and twenty years ago, and was then found so little adapted to the interests or the sentiments of the American people, as to call from them at once, in terms too loud and strong to be resisted or denied, an imperious demand for its repeal. A repeal was as promptly acceded to by the councils of the nation, and a newly created host of judges, stripped of their salaries, their offices, and their honors, before time had been given them to enjoy, or even taste the delicious flavor of the dainties which had been placed before them—to warm the seats on which they had been placed, or to be warmed by the ermines with which they had been enshrouded.

The honorable gentlemen from Virginia both object to increase the number of the judges who at present compose this tribunal, which is urged and claimed to be one of the objects of the bill on your table. This objection, although plausible as it first presents itself, to increase the number of a tribunal now consisting of seven judges, will soon vanish on the slightest examination of the nature, extent, and importance of the functions bestowed, and which, by our constitution, as it now exists, must necessarily be vested in this most tremendous and awful tribunal; for, such are its characteristics of power and jurisdiction, as legitimately vested in this court by the terms as well as the fair scope and objects of the Federal Constitution; powers and jurisdiction far beyond those of the far-famed Areopagus of Athens, Mr. President, transcendent, as they are known to have been, presiding, as it did, in the pride and plenitude of its powers, not only over the laws, and deciding the controversies arising between the citizens of that powerful and splendid Republic, but empowered to watch over the police of the city of Athens and its various territories, but also to superintend the morals and the habits, and to regulate even the pleasures and amusements of the Athenian people. The Supreme Court of the United States is not only vested with powers and jurisdiction the most ample, for the decision of all questions and controversies arising under the Constitution of the United States, the great charter of our rights and liberties; of all laws enacted under its authority; of all our controversies arising with foreign nations, whether originating from alleged infractions of treaty stipulations; violations of the public law, as between ourselves and foreign powers; the whole class of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, embracing the whole of our external, and much, too, of the internal commerce of this widely extended empire; including all the rights of peace and war. These may be called its judicial powers; and, vast and comprehensive as they are in their details and in the aggregate, what are they compared with that vast political power which is wielded by this tribunal in its character of judge? and judge in the last resort between the State and Federal Governments, in all the great and complicated questions of constitutional law, arising from the mutual action of the State and Federal authorities on each other. It is the exercise of the powers of this latter class, Mr. President, which, in our complicated system of Federal and State authorities, the most transcendent jurisdiction with which human tribunal was ever vested. It is in this character of judge and of mediator too, for they should be united, between the conflicting powers of Federal and State sovereignties, each sovereign and uncontrollable when acting within its legitimate sphere, that, poising the scale of even-handed justice, this august tribunal holds in its hands the destinies of this mighty nation; in which it stands as arbiter between the nations; and it is at the foot of this tribunal that the constitution and laws of every State in this Union may be brought for final adjudication, and before which they may be prostrated.

And it is by the wise, mild, and guiding influence of this solemn tribunal, that the State Governments, revolving in the political, like the planets around the great source of heat and light in the natural world, are to be preserved, as by an attractive or centripetal force from flying off, by some temporary or transient disorder in its movements, from its regular orbit; and, by its aberration from the path prescribed by the constitution, producing confusion and dismay, if not ruin and destruction, in this beautiful but complicated system of our political union.

When we therefore view, as we should do, Mr. President, the vast and complicated powers of this tribunal, for the purpose of ascertaining the more perfect organization of which it is susceptible, for the more perfect accomplishment of its various functions, the sure and great desideratum is, that it be so constituted, as to bring within its reach and in the possession of its members, that knowledge, not only of the constitutions and the statutory regulations, but the unwritten as well as the written laws, together with the customs, usages, and even the manners and habits, various and diversified as they are known to be, of the four-and-twenty States, which constitute our great and extended confederation. For, if these Judges possess the power, and no one denies they have, of declaring, as null and void, and sweeping from the statute book of all and every State of this Union, not only any one law, but whole systems of laws which may be deemed by them to come in contact or collision with the constitution, laws, treaties, or authorities of the United States, or even with certain principles of ethics, or the penal code, the sanctions of which are placed under the guarantee of the Federal Constitution; in this view of the powers of this tribunal, we are called upon to say, whether ten Judges, of which number the bill on your table proposes that court shall hereafter be composed, is too large a one for the attainment of the great purposes of its institution.

The gentleman from Virginia, most remote on my left, (Mr. TAZEWELL,) insists that the number of which that tribunal is now composed, is too large; that he would desire to see it less; and objects, too, to increase to the number of ten, because it being an even number requires more than a majority of a single Judge to reverse the judgment of an inferior tribunal; and to the principle of increased numbers in the composition of judicial tribunals, because, as he alleges, by adding such increase of number, you diminish the responsibility of the judges; it being a maxim with him in politics, that, in proportion to the increase of numbers in those who are to exercise authority, is the decrease of responsibility to those who delegate it.

In reply to this objection, Mr. President, it may be safely admitted, that responsibility is a principle of great weight and importance in the delegation of political power. That there is much, too, in the responsibility of Judges to the depositors of the powers which they may be disposed to abuse; that in this responsibility is regarded the honor, the conscience, the reputation of the Judge; the awful sanctions under which he acts; his amenability to human tribunals by impeachment; to the people from whom he derives his power, and for whose good he ought to exercise it. That after all that could be asked or conceded to this principle in the constitution of these tribunals, however beautiful or valuable the principle in theory may appear, it requires but little reflection or observation to convince us, that, from the unfrequency of attempts to bring to any practical beneficial result by impeachment and removal from office of the Judge who shall have violated any of these solemn sanctions; and the total inadequacy of such a result in case of conviction, to afford redress or compensation for the injury inflicted on the individual or the community, that it is not to this principle of responsibility we are to look as that of primary importance in the organization of the judicial power, as the means of securing those vital and essential benefits which a wise and happy organization of this important tribunal is calculated to ensure to the citizens of this nation. No, Mr. President, it is not to the responsibility of the Judges of this tribunal, vast and weighty as that responsibility is thought to be, that you are to look mainly for the wisdom, equity, and justice of its decisions. It is to the wisdom, it is to the extensive, diversified, and profound knowledge, political, judicial, as well as municipal, of the constitution and laws, not only of the United States, but each and every State composing this Union; with all their diversities, as created and modified by climate, by education, by habits, by interest, and a thousand other causes. It is to this knowledge, to be acquired by all the means of reading, observation, experience, and practice, and to the virtue of your Judges, more than to their responsibility, that you are to look for all those benefits and all those blessings which may be destined to flow, as the inheritance of unborn millions, from the enlightened and correct exposition of the constitutions and laws of this Union, and of the States of which it is composed. The great desideratum in the members of this tribunal, acknowledged on all hands to be so important, is a knowledge, perfect and complete, of the constitutions, the laws, statutory as well as the common law, the unwritten as well as that which is written, with the various customs and usages of the different States of the Union, as well as of the numerous judicial decisions of the State tribunals, by which certain fixed constructions and interpretations have been given to the constitution and laws of each. How is this knowledge, so essential, so indispensable, to be obtained? And is this mass of information upon points so essential to the discharge of the judicial functions in the distribution of justice in individual controversies, and of such infinite consequence to the happiness, prosperity, and harmony of the Union, more easily to be acquired by a small number of Judges, composing this tribunal, created within the favorite precincts of this ten miles square, employed in the exercise of appellate functions only; or by a number of Judges equal to that proposed by the present bill, discharging not only those appellate duties, as under the present system, but also traversing by sections as allotted amongst them, every portion of this widely extended empire; some one of them passing into and presiding in the National Tribunal in every State, and thus, by constant observation, successive experience, by the arguments of enlightened counsel, reared and educated in the bosom of the States respectively, as well as from daily social intercourse, making constant and successive acquisitions from the highest source, from the fountain head, and, from thence, communicating to their brethren of this bench, a complete and perfect knowledge of the code of each individual State, with all the diversities and modifications of each. And it is in this mode alone, that the Judges of your Supreme Tribunal are to continue, as they have heretofore, in the active and constant discharge of their functions of Judges of the courts of original jurisdiction, by presiding in the Circuit Courts, that they will come imbued with a knowledge of the constitutions, laws, and usages of the several States, the history of their birth, the causes of those successive changes, the objects of the modifications which they may have successively undergone, and the sense which has been assigned by successive adjudications of the tribunals of the States, by the interpretations which they have given to the various clauses of those laws and constitutions which have for ages constituted the safeguard of the citizen, the guarantee of all his rights, and which contains the charter of all his civil liberties.

All this information, so difficult in the acquisition, so complicated in its thousand details, so difficult, so impossible of access, at the seat of Government, my honorable friend (Mr. BARBOUR) seems to think may be acquired through the medium of the counsel at the bar, who will follow the causes from the States in which the controversies originate, to the bar of this court, for final adjudication. But the slightest reflection will satisfy my friend himself, that this source of information, on topics of which it is so indispensable that the court should be fully and well informed, is of all others the most defective and fallacious. But suppose that neither the magnitude of the cause, nor the circumstances of the parties, will justify the employment of any counsel either at home or abroad; or suppose that counsel on one side only is sent from the State from which the appeal is brought for an adjudication, which in its consequences may affect the interest or touch the liberties or franchises of the citizens of the whole State; then, in such a case, are the judges of this tribunal limited in the exercise of their judicial functions to the boundaries of this magic circle, within the ten miles square? Where is he to find the clue to guide him through the labyrinth of complicated laws, perhaps obscurely penned; in phraseology of ambiguous or doubtful meaning, which he is then for the first time called upon to adjudicate, an utter stranger? The most virtuous, enlightened, and upright Judge, thus circumstanced, must feel embarrassment and dismay; exposed to fall into error and mistake; and from which neither the books in his own, nor the public library here, nor any other source of information within his reach, will afford him means to escape.

But, in opposition to the proposition of my honorable friend from Virginia, my honorable friend from Maine, who sits before me, (Mr. HOLMES,) ventured, in a passing remark or two, to suggest, that the Judges of this august tribunal were sufficiently national, as he feared already, as evidenced by the tenor of their recent adjudications, touching this delicate and important topic of their jurisdiction, the collision between the National and State authorities; and ventured to suggest his fears, that an entire separation of the functions and duties now exercised by the Judges of the Supreme Court, as Judges of the Circuit Courts residing in the several States, agreeably to the projet under consideration, was not calculated to render those Judges less national in their sentiments and opinions on this important branch of their jurisdiction. At this suggestion, my honorable friend takes fire, and reprobates in terms of the severest censure, what he chose to consider as an assault on the dignity or purity of the members of this bench. Now, for myself, Mr. President, I must confess, that to my mind, there was nothing in the remark of the honorable gentleman from Maine, calculated to excite the ire, or to call for rebuke from the more fastidious advocate for decorum in debate, as regards the dignity of this body to whom it was addressed, or incompatible with either the dignity or purity of the members of the dignified tribunal to whom the remark referred.

It is most true, that the Supreme Court of the United States, as the head of one of the great departments of our free and happy Government, deserves, and should receive all that personal respect and regard which their exalted situation is calculated to inspire. But it is equally true, that it is essential to the freedom of debate in a legislative body, vested with powers, and clothed with solemn duties, so to model and organize this tribunal as to adapt it, in the best manner possible, to the correct exercise of these important duties, for which it was designed by the constitution, to speak of it as it is, and with a decent, though respectful freedom.

In discharge of this high and solemn duty, I must take leave to repeat the question asked by the honorable Senator from Maine, Whether there is not some cause to apprehend that, if divested of all original jurisdiction, and dispensed from the exercise of functions which require the Judges to pass into, and preside in the tribunals of original jurisdiction within the respective States, and for the exercise of the appellate powers with which they are invested, limited to the range, and placed within the attractions of this favorite ten miles square, the seat of national splendor and national power—a spirit, a little too national, may not be imbibed by the members of this tribunal, august and dignified as it is? The vast and transcendent powers and jurisdiction of this court, with the importance of a correct, enlightened, and impartial exercise of those powers, to the future peace, happiness, and prosperity of our Union, has been briefly hinted at, but not the singularly important and delicate position which this tribunal occupies, as the judge and mediator in all conflicts and collisions between the powers of National and State sovereignties, between whom it is so important to the prosperity and happiness of all, that the scales of Justice between them should be poised by the most even hand; yet it is obvious, from the very nature and organization of this tribunal, deriving its existence, the appointment of its Judges, from one of those powers, the Government of the nation, that power from which all its honors flow—from whom the emoluments and rewards of office are received—and to which all its responsibilities, as recognized by the constitution, are due. Is there not, Mr. President, in the very origin and organization of this tribunal, if not a radical defect, at least enough to justify every wise and cautious statesman, so to regulate the duties of the members of this tribunal, as to correct, as far as practicable, any apprehended bias resulting from the nature and organization of this tribunal, by such regulations as wisdom may prescribe, or long experience suggest? And how can this object, so desirable, be promoted with more success than by the organization of the present judicial system of the United States, by which the Judges, in discharge of their functions of Circuit Judges, are compelled, in their allotted circuits, to visit all the various States of our extensive Union, and in the discharge of their judicial functions, as well as the social intercourse which dwells with the citizens and inhabitants, preserves in the bosoms of the Judges of this tribunal, sentiments and feelings connected, in some degree, with the just pride, the sovereignty, and constitutional independence of the States? The feelings and recollections of these may not always remain so vivid in the breasts of judges permanently residing within the bosom of no particular State, but within a peculiar dominion of the United States. These suggestions, Mr. President, are the offspring of no unreasonable distrust of human virtue, much less of any want of respect for the truly revered and exalted characters of the Judges by whom that bench is filled, but from a consciousness of the infirmities of human nature, and a desire to guard, as far as human wisdom can, against their mischievous tendencies—suggestions, the wisdom of which will not be controverted until, indeed, we shall be convinced that angels, in the shape of men, have come down to judge for, as well as to rule over us.

But the sensibility of my honorable friend, to a supposed attack on the purity of this tribunal, which none has, or, I presume, will call in question, even by insinuation the most remote, was as uncalled for as unexpected, as regards the quarter from whence this chivalric spirit comes. For, among the States of this Union, which, from New Hampshire, in the North, to Georgia, in the South, embracing Ohio and Kentucky, in the West, have, in succession, felt the glow of indignant resentment at the real or fancied dangers to which they have been exposed, from the real or imagined infringement of their sovereign rights, from the claim or exercise of jurisdiction by this tribunal, Virginia surely has not been without her private griefs. Nor has the jealous vigilance of that proud, high-minded State, felt, or indicated, a disposition to acquiesce tamely, and without a struggle, in the claims of jurisdiction on the part of this Supreme Court of the Nation, touching, as she conceived, her rights and prerogatives as one of the members of this Union of independent States. Nor has she been slow or feeble in the measures she pursued, in vindication of her rights thus supposed to be endangered. Passing by her manly and spirited opposition to the sedition act, and the conduct of the Federal Judges in enforcing its sanctions in violation of the Constitution of the United States—need I remind my honorable friend of the firm and decided stand taken by the Supreme Court of that patriotic State, a tribunal filled by men illustrious for their virtuous and enlightened minds, to the jurisdiction claimed and exercised by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the famous case of Fairfax and Hunter; a case in which, after solemn argument and mature deliberation, the Supreme Court of that State, if I am not mistaken, not only decided against the power thus claimed and exercised by this tribunal of the nation, to take jurisdiction by writ of error, of cases of private right which had been finally decided by that court as the tribunal of the last resort within the State; but resting on the sovereign power of the State, refused peremptorily to obey the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States. A refusal which, but for the mild and conciliatory course adopted by this latter tribunal, of directing the execution of their mandate by their own immediate officer, might have brought at once the authorities of the State and Federal Government into a state of fearful and alarming conflict; at the possible consequences of which every real patriot must shudder. Nor was this the only occasion in which this high-minded and patriotic State has evinced alarm at the encroachment of this tribunal, as she deemed them, on her power and jurisdiction as an independent State. A case, much more recent than that just alluded to, and of familiar recollection to us all—the case of Cohens against the Commonwealth of Virginia, in which a jurisdiction was again claimed and exercised under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, by the Supreme Court of the United States, to arrest the Supreme Tribunal, or court of law of that State, having jurisdiction in the case, in the regular enforcement, in the usual form, by information, of one of her penal laws—a law prohibiting the vending of tickets in any lotteries but those established by the authority of the State. The enforcement of the wholesome sanctions of this law was deemed important, not only in the protection of the morals and preservation of the interests of her citizens, but against the operation of a by-law of the Corporation of this city, passed in pursuance of an act of Congress, and controlling in its operation the penal and municipal regulations of the State. That Virginia did feel some alarm at this apprehended violation of her rights as a sovereign and independent State, her rights, by wholesome regulations, to the internal police of her own State, on points entirely municipal; and that some of her most enlightened statesmen were alarmed at the attempt to arraign at the bar of the Federal Tribunal, as a party in the record, the State itself, which was made a party to the case, is evinced by the fact, that counsel of the first distinction, the most eminent in their public councils, was deputed and appointed on the part of the Commonwealth, to maintain its sovereign rights, believed to be infringed by this claim of jurisdiction on the part of the Supreme Court of the United States. That this jurisdiction, thus claimed by the court of the Nation, to decide on the sovereign rights of the States by appeal, or writ of error, was maintained by this tribunal, must be in the recollection of all who are in the habit of attending to subjects of this nature. And that Virginia escaped from what she might possibly have supposed the mortifying, if not degrading, consequences of a defeat in this struggle for the maintenance of her sovereign rights, is to be ascribed alone to the peculiar phraseology of the act of Congress by which this power of creating lotteries is delegated to the corporation, not to any defect of power on the part of Congress, as the exclusive legislature over the ten miles square, so to have framed this delegation of power, as to have arrested the power of that Commonwealth in the established enforcement of suitable regulations for the government of its own citizens in relation to the internal police thereof.

But these occurrences, Mr. President, strongly calculated as they are to arouse the feelings and excite the apprehensions of the patriotic statesman, anxious for the perpetuation of our happy Union, like most other political occurrences, transient as a winter's storm, quickly pass away and are forgotten: and those States, once so agitated by the supposed danger of tyranny or usurpation, sink into profound repose. Thus Maryland, Kentucky, and Ohio, in their turns, have had to encounter the power and influence of that great engine of political power, the Bank of the United States; have been severely attacked, and, after a feeble and ineffectual struggle, have been successively vanquished in the contest; have contended without aid or co-operation from their sister States, who, aloof from the contest, have seemed indifferent to their fate. Nor have the generous sympathies of their brethren been sufficiently enlisted, to elicit even a salutary jealousy of the ultimate consequences to be feared from a succession of such attacks and triumphant victories over the several States on the part of the General Government and the institutions to which it has given birth.

I trust, however, Mr. President, that, in these remarks, briefly touching on the apprehended tendency of some recent decisions of this tribunal, for which, as well as its several members, I entertain none but the most respectful sentiments, it will not be understood that I mean by insinuation to cast the slightest shade of imputation on the purity of intention or the correctness of judgment with which justice is impartially dispensed from this exalted bench. All I mean to contend for is, and it is certainly open to candid and fair remark, that, from the nature and organization of this tribunal, deriving all its powers, honors, and emoluments, from the Government of the nation, to which all its responsibilities alone are due; that such is the present imperfect state of human nature, unless attributes more than human be ascribed to the members of whom it is composed, that there is some cause to apprehend an unconscious bias; a bias the more to be apprehended, because it may be an inmate of the more virtuous mind. And, that it is therefore the duty of every patriotic and enlightened legislator, to correct the tendencies to such dangerous bias, by any means which legislation is competent to effect; I have therefore endeavored, I trust not in vain, to argue, that it is by the discharge of the duties of Circuit Judges within the several States according to the present wise organization of the Courts of the United States, and the associations which the discharge of those duties produce, that a competent knowledge of the constitutions, laws, and customs, and all the variety of their modifications, can be best acquired by the members of the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, and those feelings of equal regard and veneration for the sovereign rights of the individual States be imbibed and cherished, which alone afford a fair promise of the correct discharge of the important duties of impartial umpires between the governments of the States and that of the nation, so imperatively demanded by the theory of our complicated forms of government, and on which the happiness and prosperity of our common country, and the perpetuation of its free institutions, so essentially depend.

The present system of organization of the courts of the United States, founded in much wisdom, framed by many of the sages to whom we are indebted for the great charter of our liberties, sanctioned by a happy experience of thirty-five years; adapted to the administration of justice by the same impartial means; and well adapted to the number and extent of the States which at that time composed our Union; the benefits of which, by a simple extension of the system, and application of its principles to the nine Western States, which have swelled the number and added to the wealth, power, and resources of the Union, is all we ask, is all the bill on your table contemplates, and is that to which no honorable member of this body has denied our unquestioned right.

On what ground, then, I ask, is it now to be withheld? The demand is not now for the first time urged on the councils of the nation. For several successive sessions it has been solicited, urged, and pressed for; but as yet in vain. On the part of the opposers of this bill, what is urged in opposition? Why, time, time for deliberation! We, the friends of the measure, are preparing something new of vast importance. What we ask, seems to be perfectly fair and reasonable. This procrastination, Mr. President, from the last to the present session, from the commencement of the present to almost the point of its termination, is that of which the friends of this measure have a right to complain. The advocates of the measure seek for the establishment of no new principle; no new modification of those which are old and well established. A simple extension of the principle of the Federal Courts, to meet the increased numbers of our States and population. It is what imperious justice gives us a right to ask; what the councils of the nation cannot in justice hesitate to grant. Hope, already long deferred, sickens at the apprehensions of further delay in the execution of this necessary work; and the people of the West, already deeply injured by the long delays which have already intervened, cannot much longer fold their arms in silent acquiescence at the injustice of such repeated and unjustified delays.

Let me bring home the force of these remarks, to the bosoms of honorable Senators, representing here the ancient States, which, from the origin of your system, have been in the constant and full possession of its benefits, to say, what would be their emotions, if it were proposed that Virginia, for example, should no longer have a member of the bench of the Supreme Tribunal to preside in the Circuit Courts, but should be content with her District Judge? Yet, would such deprivation be no more unjust, than the denial of the same advantage to each of the new States which have been admitted into the Union since this system was adopted, and received its present form?

Upon this hasty and desultory sketch of the views on which this bill is advocated by its friends, I will, with the utmost cheerfulness, submit it to its fate, only deprecating, as I do most fervently, any attempt on the part of its opposers, by farther unnecessary delays at this advanced stage of the session, to defer its passage without a direct decision on its merits—of the correctness and justice of which I have nothing to apprehend.

Mr. FINDLAY, of Pennsylvania, made a few remarks expressive of the doubt he still felt on the subject, notwithstanding all that had been said; and concluded by moving an adjournment.

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 17.

Judicial System.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend the Judicial System of the United States, and to authorize the creation of three additional Circuit Courts: Mr. TAZEWELL's motion to exclude the additional circuit judges from being judges of the Supreme Court, still pending.

Mr. TAZEWELL submitted one or two additional reasons which weighed with him in offering his amendment; and

Mr. BAETON, of Missouri, briefly stated his reasons for opposing the amendment; and also why he disapproved of the bill as it stood.

The question was then taken, without further debate, on Mr. TAZEWELL's motion so to amend the bill that the additional circuit judges shall not be justices of the Supreme Court, and was decided in the negative by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Branch, Clayton, Cobb, D'Wolf, Elliott, Tazewell—6.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Bell, Benton, Boulogny, Brown, Chandler, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Miss., Jackson, Johnson of Ken., Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Mass., McIlvaine, McLean, Macon, Mills, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, Williams—40.

Mr. VAN BUREN thought it apparent, from the votes of to-day, that the Senate was not only determined on acting on this subject, but was decidedly in favor of the principle contained in the bill; that is, the appointment of additional circuit judges, who should be also judges of the Supreme Court. For himself, he preferred the plan that had been offered by Mr. BARBOUR; the separation of the Supreme Court from circuit duties; but, as the Senate favored the plan proposed by the bill, he rose to move a single amendment, which was to reduce the additional number of circuit judges to be provided for by the bill to two, so that there should be (with the present one in the Western States) three circuit judges in that section of the Union.

This motion was supported by Mr. VAN BUREN, and was opposed by Messrs. TALBOT and HOMER, of Maine; when

The question was taken on the amendment, by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Bell, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, Hayne, King of Ala., King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Mass., McIlvaine, Macon, Mills, Parrott, Seymour, Smith, Taylor, Tazewell, Van Buren, and Van Dyke—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Boulogny, Brown, Dickerson, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, McLean, Noble, Ruggles, Talbot, Thomas, and Williams—17.

The bill was then recommitted to the Judiciary Committee, (for the arrangement of the circuits, &c.)

Statements of the Foreign Commerce of the United States.

The President communicated to the Senate the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
16th February, 1825.

SIR: In conformity with the provisions of the act of the 10th February, 1820, entitled, "An act to provide for obtaining accurate statements of the Foreign Commerce of the United States," I have the honor to transmit, herewith, the following statements of the Commerce and Navigation of the United States during the year ending on the 30th day of September, 1824, viz:

1st. A. A general statement of the quantity and value of merchandise imported into the United States from the 1st October, 1823, to the 30th June, 1824.

1st. B. Do. do. from 1st July, to 30th Sept., 1824.

2d. A summary statement of the same.

3d. A general statement of the quantity and value of Domestic Articles exported.

4th. A general statement of the quantity and value of Foreign Articles exported.

5th and 6th. Summary statements of the value of Domestic and Foreign Articles exported.

7th. A general statement of the amount of American and Foreign Tonnage employed in the Foreign Trade of the United States.

8th. A general statistical view of the Commerce and Navigation of the United States.

9th. A statement of the Commerce and Navigation of each State and Territory.

From these statements, it appears that the imports during the year ending on the 30th September, 1824, have amounted to $80,549,007, of which amount $75,265,064 were imported in American vessels, and $5,288,958, in foreign vessels; that the exports have, during the same period, amounted to $75,986,657, of which, $50,649,500 were domestic, and $25,337,157 were foreign articles; that, of the domestic articles, $48,444,619 were exported in American vessels, and $7,204,881 in foreign vessels; and of the foreign articles, $23,967,087 were exported in American vessels, and $1,370,070 in foreign vessels; that 850,038 tons of American shipping entered, and 919,278 cleared from the ports of the United States; and that 102,367 tons of foreign shipping entered, and 102,552 cleared from the ports of the United States during the same period.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant, Wm. H. CRAWFORD.

Hon. President of the Senate pro tem.

The letter was read, and

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, of Mass., it was ordered, that 1,000 copies thereof, with the documents accompanying it, be printed for the use of the Senate.

After some other business, *
The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 18.

Public Land and Slavery.

Mr. KING, of New York, rose and said, in offering the resolution he was about to submit, though it was a subject of great national importance, he did not desire to debate it, nor did he offer it with a view to the present consideration. He submitted it as a matter for the future consideration of the Senate, and hoped it would be received, by all parts of the House, as one entitled to its serious attention. He then laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America, That, as soon as the portion of the existing funded debt of the United States, for the payment of which the public land of the United States is pledged, shall have been paid off, then, and thenceforth, the whole of the public land of the United States, with the net proceeds of all future sales thereof, shall constitute and form a fund, which is hereby appropriated, and the faith of the United States is pledged, that the said fund shall be inviolably applied to aid the emancipation of such slaves, within any of the United States, and to aid the removal of such slaves, and the removal of such free persons of color, in any of the said States, as by the laws of the States, respectively, may be allowed to be emancipated, or removed, to any territory or country without the limits of the United States of America.

The resolution was read, and on motion of Mr. BENTON, ordered to be printed.

The Senate next took up the bill making an appropriation of 6,000 dollars for the purchase of Mr. Rembrandt Peale's picture, (exhibited in the rotunda,) embracing an equestrian portrait of General Washington, and equestrian portraits of General Lafayette, General Hamilton, and other officers.

Mr. MILLS, chairman of the committee, stated to the Senate the reasons which induced the committee to report the bill. Its object was to make a suitable appropriation for the purchase and preservation of the most correct and perfect likeness of Washington, the man who was so dear to his country. The committee had taken great pains to ascertain the correctness of the resemblance, and they were satisfied not only of that, but that the whole work was executed with great taste and skill. This opinion was not founded on their own critical powers, but on the judgment of those who were most competent to form an opinion. If it were desirable for Congress to possess any work of this character, this was the one of all others most desirable. It was not merely a portrait of Washington—it combined incidents of an historical character—was commemorative of an event of the utmost interest and importance during the Revolutionary war. It shadowed forth the alliance which existed between our country and France, by the representation of General Lafayette. Mr. M. repeated, that if it were desirable for Congress to possess any thing of this kind, no picture could be presented more worthy of the consideration of Congress. He explained the views of the committee, in fixing the sum to be appropriated at $8,000, and remarked that the committee were of opinion that this picture was not second to any of Colonel Trumbull's, in its scenes and execution, for each of whose paintings $8,000 had been appropriated.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said that he should be pleased to know what was an adequate compensation for the work in question. The sum you propose to give, is equal to the annual salary of your Secretary of State, superior to that of your Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. He asked whether this work was a year's labor? He thought that the rule adopted by the committee would not have much weight with the Senate, as, in his opinion, in the purchase of Trumbull's paintings, they had been abominably taken in. Those paintings, which cost $32,000, were not worth 82 cents. Mr. H. said he did not pretend to be a critic in painting, but he would say, that Trumbull's last painting, commemorative of the resignation of General Washington, was a piece of the most solemn daubing he ever saw. The event it was intended to commemorate was one of the most sublime incidents that ever took place in the country. But what do you see in the picture? Why, a man looking like a little ensign, with a roll of paper in his hand, like an old newspaper, appearing as if he was saying, "Here, take it—I don't want to give it up." He concluded with moving to strike out 6,000, and insert 4,000.

Mr. MILLS replied, and entered into a further explanation of the views of the committee in reporting this sum. He thought it not proper for any gentleman to speak of Col. Trumbull's paintings as the gentleman from Maine had done; much less so to criticize a work performed by a gentleman who had borne a conspicuous part in the events of those days.

Mr. CHANDLER called for a division of the question; and the question was first taken on striking out 6,000; which was carried in the affirmative—ayes 20, noes 14.

Mr. TALBOT said a few words, when Mr. HOLMES moved to fill the blank with 4,000 dollars.

Mr. HAYNE moved 5,000, and stated as a reason, that he was well satisfied that the artist would not take 4,000 dollars.

The question on inserting 5,000 was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Bouigny, Cobb, Eaton, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, Lowrie, Mills, Parrott, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, and Van Buren—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Branch, Brown, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards, Holmes of Maine, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, McIlvaine, McLean, Macon, Ruggles, Taylor, Tazewell, Thomas, Van Dyke, and Williams—22.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, then moved to fill the blank with $4,500, but, before the question on this sum was put,

The bill was, on motion of Mr. MILLS, ordered to be laid on the table.

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

Massachusetts Claim for Militia Services.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit, herewith, a report from the Secretary of War, with a report to him from the Third Auditor, of the settlement, in the amount stated, of the claims of the State of Massachusetts, for services rendered by the militia of that State, in the late war, the payment of which has hitherto been prevented by causes which are well known to Congress. Having communicated my sentiments on this subject fully, in a message bearing date on the 23d of February, 1824, it is unnecessary to repeat in detail here, what I there advanced.

By recurring to that message, and to the documents referred to in it, it will be seen that the conduct of the Executive of that State, in refusing to place the militia thereof, at that difficult conjuncture, under the direction of the Executive of the United States, as it was bound to do, by a fair construction of the constitution, and as the other States did, is the great cause to which the difficulty adverted to is to be ascribed. It will also be seen, on a view of those documents, that the Executive of the State was warned at the time, if it persevered in the refusal, that the consequences which have followed would be inevitable: that the attitude assumed by the State formed a case which was not contemplated by the existing laws of the United States relating to militia services: that the payment of the claims of the State, for such services, could be provided for by Congress only, and by a special law for the purpose. Having made this communication, while acting in the Department of War, to the Governor of Massachusetts, with the sanction and under the direction of my enlightened and virtuous predecessor, it would be improper, in any view which may be taken of the subject, for me to change the ground then assumed, to withdraw this great question from the consideration of Congress, and to act on it myself.

Had the Executive been in error, it is entitled to censure, making a just allowance for the motive which guided it. If its conduct was correct, the ground then assumed ought to be maintained by it. It belongs to Congress alone to terminate this distressing incident, on just principles, with a view to the highest interests of our Union.

From the view which I have taken of the subject, I am confirmed in the opinion that Congress should now decide on the claim, and allow to the State such portions thereof as are founded on the principles laid down in the former message. If those principles are correct, as on great consideration I am satisfied they are, it appears to me to be just in itself, and of high importance, that the sums which may be due, in conformity therewith, should no longer be withheld from the State.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the purchase of the Equestrian Portrait of Washington, by Rembrandt Peale.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, moved to amend the bill by filling the blank with $4,500; which was decided in the affirmative—ayes 20, noes 14.

On the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed for a third reading?" it was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Clayton, Eaton, Elliott, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, Mills, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, and Van Buren—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bouigny, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards, King of Alabama, King of New York, Lanman, McIlvaine, McLean, Macon, Noble, Palmer, Taylor, Tazewell, Thomas, and Williams—20.

Indian Tribes.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the preservation and civilization of the Indian tribes within the United States.

Mr. ELLIOTT, of Georgia, rose, and, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, asked the attention of the Senate to a few remarks which he proposed to make, in explanation and support of the objects of this bill. The measures proposed in this bill, said Mr. E., have, for their object, the preservation of the Indian tribes within the United States, and the improvement of their condition; as well as the advancement of the wealth and power of the Union. The attainment of objects so interesting both to the philanthropist and the statesman, justified a special message from the President of the United States, and can hardly fail to secure the grave attention of this body. So long as the Indian tribes within our settlements were strong enough to wage war upon the States, and to pursue their trade of blood with the tomahawk and scalping knife, it was neither the policy nor the duty of the Federal Government to consult their comfort, or to devise means for their preservation. The contest, then, was for the existence of our infant settlements, and for the attainment of that power by which a civilized and Christian people might safely occupy this promised land of civil and religious liberty. It was then to be regarded as a struggle for supremacy, between savages and civilized men, between infidels and Christians. But now, sir, when, by successive wars, and the more fatal operation of other causes, hereafter to be noticed, their power has departed from them, and they are reduced to comparative insignificance, it well becomes the magnanimity of a humane and generous Government, to seek out the causes of their continued deterioration, and, as far as practicable, to arrest its progress, by the application of the most appropriate remedies. To any one who has carefully attended to the history of the tribes within the old States, it must be apparent, that their uniform decline results from causes growing out of their location. So true is this position, that, while you can scarcely point to a nation of Indians wasting away, either numerically or physically, in their native wilderness, I know of no tribes within the States surrounded by a white population, who have not declined in both these respects, and who are not in manifest danger of extinction. What, sir, has become of the immense hordes of these people, who once occupied the soil of the older States? In New England, where numerous and warlike tribes once so fiercely contended for supremacy with our forefathers, but 2,500 of their descendants now remain! And these are mixed with negro blood: dispirited and degraded! Of the powerful league of the Six Nations, so long the scourge and terror of New York, only about 5,000 souls survived! While in Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, they are either entirely extinct, or their numbers are so reduced as to have escaped the notice of the Department. In Virginia, Mr. Jefferson informs us, that there were in 1607, between "the sea coast and the mountains, and from the Potomac to the most Southern waters of James River, upwards of forty tribes of Indians,"—now there are but forty-seven individuals within the whole State! From North Carolina none are returned—and only four hundred and fifty from South Carolina! While in Georgia, where, thirty years since, there were not less than thirty thousand souls, within her present limits there are not now more than half that number. That many of these people have removed, and others perished by the sword in the frequent wars which occurred in the progress of our settlements in all these States, I am free to admit. But where are the hundreds of thousands, with their descendants, who neither removed nor were thus destroyed? Sir, like a promontory of sand, exposed to the ceaseless encroachments of the ocean, they have been gradually wasting away before the current of the white population, which set in upon them from every quarter: and unless speedily removed by the provisions of this bill, beyond the influence of this cause, a remnant will not long be found, to point you to the graves of their ancestors, or to relate the sad story of their misfortunes. From this view of the subject, sir, I am brought to the conclusion, that two independent communities of people, differing in color, language, habits, and interests, cannot long subsist together—but that the more intelligent and powerful will always destroy the other. This, it must be confessed, is a sombre picture of human nature—but it is a sketch from real life; and the statesman will legislate for man as he is, and not as he ought to be. Now, communities not independent of each other, may differ in most of these respects, and yet not only subsist together, but, to a certain extent, increase and better their condition. Some of the South American Indians, although conquered and reduced to slavery by the Spaniards, were not destroyed. Their tribes are still extant; and, having commingled their blood with that of their conquerors, they are at this time an improved and powerful people. The African slaves, too, in the United States, are a distinct and separate people, but they rapidly increase, and are daily improving in condition. In these instances, the mutual dependence which exists, creates, in some sort, a community of interests. But, two communities of people, wholly independent of each other, and differing essentially in character and habits, must find their feelings and interests in perpetual collision. To confine such discordant materials, therefore, within the limits of the same State, cannot fail to engender endless contentions. And these, as in all other controversies, where physical power is made the arbiter of right, must ever result in the discomfiture of the weaker party; who, at length, dispirited and degraded under a sense of comparative weakness, and increasing wants, become idle and vicious, seeking in the bottle that gratification which they once enjoyed in the chase—and this degradation, and these habits, lay the foundation of their subsequent deterioration.

And, sir, if it be so difficult to preserve the Indian population within the States, from gradual but certain extinction, owing to the operation of causes inseparable from their location, how can we hope to promote either their moral or intellectual improvement, under such circumstances? Confidence in the sincerity and good intentions of those who essay to teach and improve us, is essential to success in the undertaking. But how can confidence exist amidst the daily irritations which grow out of the unhappy situation of these people? Are they yet in the hunter state? Their sustenance, then, depends on the quantity of game that may be found within their limits. But this is daily increasing, by the encroachments of the whites, who penetrate their forests, and kill off the animals on which they subsist. Have they advanced to the condition of herdsmen? Their stock pass the boundaries of their territory; they are found to trespass upon the property of the whites, and they are destroyed.

Nor, sir, is this all; new acquisitions of territory are repeatedly urged upon them, and, savage as they are, they are not so devoid of common sense, as not to argue from the past to the future, and to anticipate the fate which awaits them, in the traditions of the powerful tribes who once commanded the banks of the Potomac and Delaware, and whose names alone survive! Under the pressure of such circumstances, it is idle to look for any solid or extended improvement in the Indian population within the States. A few of them, of mixed blood, may acquire some knowledge, and more property, but the great mass of this population cannot be expected to escape the causes of decline and degradation which have heretofore produced such uniform results. Under this impression, and with a view to sustain and improve the Indians now within the States, this bill was reported. It proposes to accomplish these benevolent objects by the purchase of a tract of country lying between the Missouri and Arkansas Rivers, as a permanent possession for these people. This tract is said by Mr. Storrs, who has explored it, to be very fertile, well watered, and abounding in game. But I will give you his own language, from a letter lately received by the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. In reference to the plan of colonizing the Indians, he says:

"Nature could hardly have formed a country more admirably fitted to such a purpose, than that which lies between us and the Arkansas River. It is among the most beautiful and fertile tracts of country I ever saw. Streams lined with timber intersect and beautify it in every direction. There are delightful landscapes, over which Flora has scattered her beauties with a wanton hand; and upon whose bosom innumerable wild animals display their amazing numbers. The spring clothes this solitude with its richest scenery, and affords a combination which cannot fail to please the eye and delight the imagination.

"If a few remnants of our tribes were settled here, embracing, if possible, the Osages and Kansas, and their prospect should become flattering, others would naturally join them, and form similar establishments; and, in the course of a few years, we should witness the gratifying spectacle of an organized government of industrious habits, and peaceful villages, surrounded with smiling fields and domestic herds. As I passed through that delightful region, I could not help regretting that it should be a waste of Nature; and felt a secret assurance that, at some future period, flocks would feed upon its abundant herbage, and a numerous population would derive support from its fertility. It is a part of the country which will not answer our purposes of social intercourse and compact settlements. But, for the Indians, hardly any country could afford greater advantages than the tract adjoining the Kansas River, the Osage, the Neodio, the Verdigrisee, and, perhaps, the Arkansas, below where our route to Mexico crosses it. They could, from those places, procure salt from the salt plains of Arkansas; and during the incipient state of their progress, before their harvest could be equal to their support, the game would afford them an abundant means of support."

Such is the country proposed to be assigned to the Indians as their future home. It will be subdivided into surveys of sufficient extent to meet the exigencies of every tribe; and to each will be assigned a separate location. The whole to form a colony of red men, under the protection and guardianship of the Federal Government. From this territory, all white men will be rigidly excluded, except missionaries, teachers, and artisans, now engaged in their instruction and improvement, or such as may hereafter become necessary for that purpose; and these will be removed and settled with them. In this situation, all the wants of such a people will be provided for. No sudden transition from the hunter to the agricultural condition, will be expected by practical men. Such a change must be the work of time, and can be realized only in the descendants of those who shall be removed. These will be sedulously taught, both by precept and example, the value of the cultivation of the earth, on permanent possessions, and under a government of known laws. And, growing up under the influence of such instructions, with minds and morals improved, and relieved from the debasing associations of their former situation, every hope may be indulged of the most gratifying result. In the mean time, the adult population, upon whose habits and prejudices no very salutary effects could be expected, will find employment and profit in the chase, and in the management and increase of their domestic animals; for which purpose every section of land may have an outlet to the Rocky Mountains, and the privilege of hunting be purchased of the natives.

But here, sir, I will anticipate two objections. The first, that the congregation of so many different tribes of Indians on adjoining tracts, must necessarily lead to wars between them, more ruinous than the collisions they experience with the whites in their present situation. This would probably be the case, were they not sensible of the presence and power of the Federal Government, to adjust their difficulties, and to put down the wrong-doer. But it is proposed to have agents among them, men of known principle, well acquainted with the Indian character, respected by them, and anxious for their improvement. These men will act as umpires between the various tribes, and, by a timely adjustment of their quarrels, take away the occasion of wars. And the presence of the military posts, which will be stationed on the Western and Northern limits of this colony, cannot fail to give to such supervisory law, the efficiency which is anticipated. The second objection is, the danger to be apprehended by the adjoining States, from the power of the Indians thus collected. But, sir, it is to be recollected that these tribes have all experienced the power, and been subdued by the arms of the United States; and that the position which they will occupy, is one which will expose them to the whole Indian population to the North and West of them. Under such circumstances, every motive to be suggested, either by fear or interest, must impel them to the cultivation of peaceful habits, and a close alliance with the United States. This objection, then, is founded upon the supposition, that these Indians will act directly contrary to their obvious interests, and make war upon those whose power they know they cannot resist, and the preservation of which, they feel to be necessary to their own safety. Now, this is too violent a supposition to be the foundation of any objection which would require serious refutation. The contemplated removal and settlement of those Indians, therefore, will not endanger either their peace or our safety, while it promises to them an entire exemption from all the causes of deterioration, under which they now languish. That the civilization and moral improvement of these people must be the necessary consequence of their removal and settlement, as this bill contemplates, I am not prepared to say. But I do say, Mr. President, unless they are removed from their present situation, and that very shortly, too, there will be but few to require this experiment at your hands—an experiment which, although it may fail, I believe to be more full of hope and promise concerning the future prospects of this unfortunate race, than any which has been heretofore attempted.

Thus much I have felt it my duty to say, in reference to the deep interest I believe the Indians have in the proposed measures. But, I have said these measures would also increase the wealth and power of the Union. The removal of the Indians beyond the limits of the States, would leave us in possession of all the lands they now occupy; and these, from their situation and extent, must be very valuable. Almost all the Indian reservations have been of the best lands; and surrounded, as they are at this time, by a white population, and improved by roads, and other facilities of intercourse with the adjacent country, they would command comparatively a high price. But these lands form an aggregate of no less than seventy-seven millions five hundred thousand acres. Now deduct nine millions five hundred thousand acres, as lands belonging to Georgia, when the Indian title shall have been extinguished; and one hundred and forty-four thousand in possession of the Cahawba Indians, but which, if surrendered, would belong to South Carolina, and you will have sixty-seven millions eight hundred and fifty-six thousand acres subject to the disposition of the United States? Suppose this immense tract sold at only two dollars per acre, a fund would be created of one hundred and thirty-five millions seven hundred and twelve thousand dollars! Which, after reimbursing the treasury for all expenses incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this bill, would not only be adequate to the extinction of the national debt, but leave an immense amount at the future disposal of the Government.

But, sir, the wealth and power of the Union will be still more advanced by the greater compactness of the population, and the increased cultivation of the soil of the States, which would be ensured under the operation of the system. If the wealth of a nation depends upon the quantity of its surplus productions, whatever has a tendency to increase these productions, must operate favorably upon the resources of the community. By the plan proposed, an immense tract of land, now useless, would be brought into cultivation, some of which will produce the most valuable staples, either for use or exportation. Within the States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee, there are upwards of 88,000,000 of acres of valuable land, that would be redeemed and brought into cultivation! Most of this soil would grow cotton, and swell the valuable export of these States to an astonishing amount. But, sir, what shall I say of the value of the population which this measure would ensure to these States? This Senate must be well aware that it is not less the policy of the Federal Government than it is the interest of these States to afford every facility to the rapid increase of their efficient population. Situated at the most exposed point of the Union, as two of these States are, with an extensive sea-coast, incapable, from the nature of its soil, of sustaining but a very sparse population, they must rely, for their defence, principally, on the dense population of the interior. Florida, too, with her immense maritime frontier, will look chiefly to Georgia and Alabama for aid in time of war. And, as New Orleans was saved in the last war by the power of the adjoining States, so Florida, and the sea-coast of Georgia, and Alabama, can be successfully defended against future invasion only by the timely augmentation of their physical power. It becomes, then, an object of cardinal interest with the Federal Government, upon whom devolves the high duty of national defence, that every portion of these States should be filled up with an effective population; and blind, indeed, is that policy, which would continue to appropriate so many millions of acres of land, thus situated, to the unproductive uses of Indian occupancy, regardless alike of the wealth of the nation and of her means of defence! But, sir, independent of the general policy which so strongly recommends this measure, its tendency to fulfil the just expectations of Georgia, in reference to the cession of 1802, should ensure to it the most favorable reception. Twenty-three years have nearly elapsed, since the Union contracted, for a valuable consideration, to extinguish, for the use of Georgia, the Indian title to all the land within her limits. Knowing the influence and power of the Federal Government, Georgia could not have anticipated the delays which have occurred, nor foreseen the obstacles which they would have interposed to the accomplishment of her expectations. And, although fully sensible of the pernicious effects of this procrastination, in the abridgment of her wealth and power, such has been her attachment to the Union, and respect for its Government, that she has hitherto repressed the full expression of disappointment, in the hope that every new appeal to the justice of the United States would result in the performance of their stipulations. Formerly, her claims were postponed for the convenience of the national treasury; and, latterly, by representations of the difficulties of compliance. But now, sir, a plan is offered for your acceptance, free from all these embarrassments. It is proposed to exchange lands beyond the Mississippi for those tracts held by Indians within the States. Should this plan succeed, it will enable the United States not only to discharge their obligations to Georgia, "peaceably, and on reasonable terms," but to confer a lasting benefit on the Indians thus removed, by giving them a permanent home, for their present precarious possessions. In his message on this subject, the President informs Congress; that a treaty with the Creek Indians is now negotiating, and "with a reasonable prospect of success." Although no serious difficulties may now present themselves to the acquisition of these lands, yet, every day's delay is calculated to augment such as do exist. The attainment of property by a few individuals of mixed blood, (some of whom own cotton plantations, worked by African slaves,) has given to a small minority a controlling influence in the councils of the nation. These men become, annually, richer and more powerful, while the great body of the nation are impoverished and degraded. Without game to subsist on, and unskilled in the arts of civilized life, they are in fact the menials of this aristocracy, who employ and support them; and who, fully sensible of all the advantages resulting to their avarice from the possession of this power and influence, will not easily be persuaded to use either in support of a policy which, however it may be calculated to subserve the interests of the mass of the red population, may ultimately deprive them of the station and emoluments they now enjoy. Most of the difficulties which have been experienced in treating with these Indians, have been occasioned by the influence and intrigues of men of this description, who, having no interests in common with the nation, could not be expected to sympathize with them. The mass of the red population have long been inclined to such a removal and settlement as this bill proposes; and, should the treaty with the Creeks succeed, the Indians will be removed, at their own request, beyond the Mississippi, and settled upon lands to be given them as a permanent possession, in exchange for those they shall have surrendered. In fact, a disposition to such a removal and settlement as this bill contemplates, is manifesting itself from various quarters; and many applications for this purpose, have been already made to the War Department, by the more intelligent and reflecting among the Indians of different tribes. Nay, sir, delegations from ten or twelve tribes have actually arrived in this city, within the two last days, charged by the nations to whom they belong, with the expressions of their gratitude for the propositions contained in this bill, and of their readiness to comply with its requirements. Nothing, then, is wanting to the accomplishment of this important object, but the sanction of Congress. About 180,000 souls of this unfortunate race now await their destiny at your hands! Pass this bill, sir, and you elevate their character, and impart new hopes to their future prospects. Reject it, and you set your seal to their degradation. And, although their fate may be delayed, I consider it as inevitable as the march of time. Every motive, therefore, of humanity, of policy, and of interest, urges you to the sanction of this bill. In such a cause, and under such circumstances, I am not permitted to doubt the decision of the Senate.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

After the consideration of Executive business, The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 23.

Civilization of Indians.

The engrossed bill for the preservation and civilization of the Indian tribes within the United States, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the House for concurrence.

Portrait of Washington.

The engrossed bill authorizing the purchase of the equestrian portrait of Washington by Rembrandt Peale, was read a third time.

On the question "Shall this bill pass?"

Some discussion ensued; Messrs. KING, of Alabama, MACON, LANMAN, and NOBLE, opposing the appropriation, which was supported by Messrs. MILLS and LOWRIE; it was finally decided in the affirmative by Yeas and Nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Barbour, Benton, Bouigny, Clayton, Eaton, Elliott, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Kelly, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, Mills, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Van Buren—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Branch, Brown, Chandler, Cobb, D'Wolf, Edwards, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, McIlvaine, McLean, Macon, Noble Palmer, Taylor, Tazewell, Williams—18.

So the bill passed, and was sent to the House for concurrence.

Cumberland Road.

The Senate took up, as in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BARBOUR in the chair,) the bill appropriating 150,000 dollars for the extension of the Cumberland road from the Ohio to the Muskingum, at Zanesville—the amount of the appropriation to be reimbursed to the Treasury out of the fund reserved for laying out and making roads under the direction of Congress, by the several acts passed for the admission of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri into the Union—

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, (Chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals,) said this was not at all a new subject to the Senate, but it was one of great interest, not only to all the States west of the Ohio, but to some of the Eastern States likewise. He therefore asked the favorable attention of the Senate to it. He would not deny that the State he represented would be one of the first to feel the benefit of the appropriation, but it would, he hoped, be admitted, that the State of Ohio had some reason to ask this of the General Government, and it ought to be conceded to them. The Legislature of that State had, he said, passed laws, during the last session, for opening a navigable canal between the waters of Lake Erie and the Ohio, which, when completed, could not fail of being of great service to the United States, in peace and war, and would likewise enhance the property of the United States in that State, and in those further westward. If, therefore, from such considerations, the United States would make a beginning this year, for the extension of the road beyond the Ohio River, which now connects the valley of the Ohio with that of the Potomac, they would find their own interest in a liberal policy in this regard, which would be of material service to the Western States.

Mr. COBB said, that, although he would not pretend that he should be able to throw any new lights on the great principles involved in the bill under consideration, yet he could not consent to its passage without some degree of investigation, and therefore he solicited the attention of the Senate for a few minutes. At the present period it could not be expected, that there are many persons who could contribute additional lights upon a question which had engaged the attention, and elicited the investigation of the ablest statesmen in the nation. Yet he looked to its final decision with very great anxiety. He thought the Senate would concur in believing with him, that those principles had not been entirely settled when they looked to the history of this system of internal improvements. There had been no instance within his recollection, when the claim for the power of adopting it had been advanced, in which it was not denied by some one of the departments of the Government. At the very first session of the Congress of which he had first the honor of being a member, (which was at the commencement of the present administration,) the question was brought before the House of Representatives. At that time a solemn vote was taken in that body, declaring that Congress had no power to construct roads and canals. This vote was predicated on the report of a committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as related to the subject, and in which message the power was expressly denied to Congress. How far the opinions of the Executive, since that period, had undergone a change, in relation to the question, was as well known to the Senate as to himself; he should not stop to point out the change, if any, inasmuch as he adverted to the Message, merely to show that the question had not been settled. He repeated, that he felt great anxiety as to the result of the vote now about to be taken in the Senate, inasmuch as he believed it involved the great question, whether this Government was to drop all its federative characteristics, and was about to become, as predicted by the great Virginia Prophet,* a splendid national consolidated government, reared upon the ruins of the sovereignty of the people and the States?

In using such expressions, Mr. C. said, he was aware that he was harping upon an old string, whose simple notes were extremely disagreeable to the ears of certain modern politicians. The subject had become unfashionable. But, from the earliest period at which he had seriously thought on political subjects, he had been taught to reverence the principles he was attempting to advocate, and the Senate would therefore pardon the terms he had used, if there was any thing offensive in them. He had learned from the State in which he was born, (and of which you, sir, are a Representative,)† that there is safety in sometimes recurring to fundamental principles.

Much might be said, he thought, as to the expediency of the measure under consideration. It might, with great propriety, be inquired, why Congress was called on to extend the Cumberland Road at this time, even admitting they had the power? Why the Western States were now better entitled to have such a beneficial boon extended to them, than the other States of the Union? What was said when the Cumberland Road was first undertaken? The sole object was to form a connection, by a permanent and durable road across the mountains, between the Atlantic coast and the navigable waters of the West. This was effected by constructing the road from Cumberland to Wheeling. At that time, did any person dream that so soon, if at all, Congress was to be called on to extend it from Wheeling to the Mississippi? For that, he understood, was the object avowed by the advocates of the bill. If the Western States generally, could have no claim to such a beneficial work, much less had the State of Ohio, considered singly. The fund out of which the expense of making the road is to be paid, so far as any portion of it was derivable from that State, had been long since expended. The reservation of the percentage on the sales of the public lands for roads, in the State of Ohio, had been sunk in constructing the Cumberland Road, to which it was, by law, applied. Nay, the expense of the road had greatly exceeded the reservation by many thousand dollars. He was sure the fact would not be denied.

* Patrick Henry.

As the question involved all the principles relating to the powers of the Federal Government on the subject of internal improvements, he would here lay down a proposition, which he thought almost self-evident. It had been contended, that the United States were bound to construct this road, by compact made with several of the Western States at the time of their admission into the Union. Admitting that such a compact could be produced, and that it contained an express stipulation to that effect, it would not, in his opinion, change the proposition. It is, that Congress have no powers, and can have none, but such as are derived from the Constitution of the United States. It matters not with whom, whether a State or an individual, the Federal Government may have made such a compact, it could add nothing to the powers of that Government, unless contained in the constitution itself. This was sufficiently evident from the very first section of the first article of that instrument, which declares that the Legislative powers "therein granted" shall be vested, &c. Other parts of the instrument, especially some of the amendments, show the truth of the proposition beyond doubt. He would not now turn to the clauses, as they were, doubtless, familiar to the memory of every member present.

Almost every person who had expressed an opinion on the subject, so far as had come under his observation, admitted that this Government was one of limited powers—limited not alone by the prohibitions of power to be found in the constitution, but by an absence or want of a grant of power therein. It would seem that this was true, as well from the parties by whom, as from the manner in which, the Federal Government was first constructed. It was, perhaps, unfortunate, that we do not more frequently recur to the circumstances under which the constitution was framed, when we are about to establish the principles from which is to be derived the true rule for the construction of an instrument of such vast importance.

By what parties, and for what object the instrument was formed, would better appear from a document which he was about to read than from any thing he could say. It was one of the celebrated resolutions of the Kentucky Legislature,* containing, as was at one time said, the foundation of Republican principles. He used the word Republican as a party designation, inasmuch as he now had allusion to the principles professed by the party so named, at the period of the adoption of the resolution, and for a long time thereafter. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That the several States, comprising the United States of America, are not united on the principle of unlimited submission to their General Government; but that, by compact, under the style and title of a 'Constitution for the United States,' and of amendments thereto, they constitute a General Government for special purposes, delegating to that Government certain definite powers, reserving, each State to itself, the residuary mass of right to their own self-government—and that, whenever the General Government assumes undelegated powers, its acts are unauthorized, void, and of no force. That, to this compact, each State acceded as a State, and is an integral party, its co-States forming, as to itself, the other party. That the Government, created by this compact, was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers. But that, as in all other cases of compact among parties, having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions, as of the measure of redress."

In this resolution will be found the anatomy of the Federal Government; the principles on which it was created; and, if so, it will not be a difficult matter to determine in what manner the parties to the constitution, those by whom the Federal Government was framed and adopted, intended this instrument of creation should be construed and expounded. If the doctrines contained in that resolution are true, then it is evident that the compact, thus denominated the Federal Constitution, was one entered into between sovereign States, wherein each relinquished a portion of its sovereignty. Common sense would teach us that such a compact should be so strictly expounded, as to take from the grantors no more of their sovereignty than is absolutely necessary to effect the great objects of the compact. At this very point, then, (said Mr. C.) I start in establishing that strict rule, by which I conceive the constitution should be expounded. If I should be so fortunate as to support this strict rule, by other circumstances, equally strong and forcible, it may, with propriety, be contended, that the power to construct roads and canals is nowhere to be found in the constitution. Should I, however, * These resolutions are said to be, and no doubt are, the production of Mr. Jefferson, and contain his opinion on the subjects embraced in them.

† Resolutions of a similar character were about the same period (1798), adopted by the Legislature of Virginia, in support of which "Madison's report" was founded, at the session thereafter. At a later period, the Legislatures of Pennsylvania and Ohio adopted resolutions containing like principles.

fail in showing this to be the true rule, and the liberal one, more recently established, should be adopted in its place, I shall not be able to deny that such power, or any other not expressly prohibited, is conferred.

The rule for which I contend derives strong support from many other circumstances, as before stated. It is supported from the first section of the first article of the constitution, which I have already noticed. It is supported by the adoption of the amendments of the constitution, all inserted for "greater caution." It is supported by the manner in which amendments are directed to be made. When adopted by Congress, they are to be ratified by that body, in each State, which represents its sovereignty; or the same representatives of sovereignty may request a call of a convention for proposing amendments. It is supported, also, by the declarations and commentaries of the early expositors of the instruments. I venture to throw the gauntlet, and defy any one to point to any contemporaneous expositor, of approved reputation, who has decided in favor of those broad and liberal principles of construction contended for by the advocates of the bill.

Mr. RUGGLES, of Ohio, followed Mr. COBB. He said the object of the bill before the Senate, was to appropriate one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the continuation of the Cumberland road from Wheeling in Virginia, to Zanesville, on the Muskingum River. At some future time, said Mr. R., when the resources of the country will justify it, there can be no doubt, but Congress will make appropriations to continue the same road to the Mississippi River, at some point near to, or opposite St. Louis. There is no subject of Internal Improvement, that presents as strong claims upon the consideration of Congress as this. It is one to which the attention of the Government has been long, and ardently directed. This great work was commenced in 1806, at Cumberland, in Maryland, and has received the patronage and support of three successive administrations, and is now admitted, by all sound politicians, who look to the future prosperity and perpetuity of this Union, as an object of the first consequence. In discussing this subject, Mr. R. said, we ought to discard all local and personal considerations, and treat of it solely in a national point of view. If mere local and personal considerations are to govern the deliberations of Congress, the great and permanent interests of the nation would be disregarded, the most valuable improvements remain untouched, and the great principles of legislation settle down into selfishness, and a contest for sectional benefits. Higher and nobler views ought to govern this Senate.

Mr. R. said he would not go into the discussion of the constitutional question, whether Congress had a right to appropriate money for internal improvements, to make roads and canals. That question he had considered as long settled by both Houses of Congress after the most able and solemn arguments. The gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB,) has, with great ability, given us his sentiments on that point, attempting to show that Congress has not the power to appropriate money to make roads and canals, but he had entirely failed to convince him of the correctness of his positions. This system had been in operation for twenty years; the country had acquiesced in it; the soundest heads and ablest talents of the nation had decided in its favor; the venerable patriot Jefferson had given to it the sanction of his great name and influence; he may be justly styled the father and patron of the Cumberland road. The agitation of the constitutional question at every session would result in no good, but might be productive of great evil to the nation; there is a point on all questions, beyond which we ought not to go, where discussion and opposition must end. Mr. R. said he hoped we had arrived to that point, and that the only question now would be, How can we best improve the condition of the country, by a wise application of its resources?

Whatever might be the opinion of gentlemen on the constitutional question, on the right and power of Congress to appropriate the funds of the nation to make roads and canals in the United States, generally, there could be but one opinion in relation to the present measure. This question stands on distinct and different grounds altogether. It arises out of a solemn and deliberate contract between the General Government, and the States north-west of the Ohio River, by which the former are bound to execute this work. Congress has received, and is still continuing to receive, a valuable consideration: an equivalent for the money now proposed to be expended. If it fails to fulfil its engagements, it may justly be accused of violating its contract with the North-western States. What are the facts in relation to this subject? When those States were admitted into the Union, the Congress of the United States, by their several acts, authorizing the people to form for themselves a constitution and State government, agreed, that the States would not tax the public lands for five years after they had been sold, that five per cent. arising out of the net proceeds of the sale of those lands, should be appropriated for the purpose of making roads; three per cent. of which was to be laid out within the States by their respective legislatures, and two per cent. by the authority of Congress, in making a road leading to those States. Let us examine more particularly, said Mr. R., into the real state of the question, and inquire what has been the practice of the General Government for twenty years past.

Ohio was the first State that was admitted into the Union upon this principle. This took place in 1803. When the two per cent. which had been reserved for making a road leading to that State, had accumulated so as to justify an expenditure, Congress passed a law in 1806, authorizing commissioners to be appointed to survey and lay out a road from Cumberland, in Maryland, to the State of Ohio. After the survey and location were completed, annual appropriations were made by Congress for constructing the road, until it was finally completed from Cumberland to Wheeling, on the Ohio River, a distance of one hundred and thirty-five miles. This road lies entirely within the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. Not one rod is within any of the new States. The contract with the State of Ohio is fulfilled; the road has been made to the boundary of that State; the two per cent. that has arisen, and will hereafter arise, has all been expended. Ohio, therefore, has no further claim upon Congress for any portion of the two per cent. which may be produced by the future sales of lands in that State.

It is but justice to admit, said Mr. R., that a greater sum of money has been expended in making the Cumberland road to the Ohio River, than the two per cent. would amount to in the State of Ohio. This excess must be considered as a direct appropriation from the treasury, for the accomplishment of a great national object, in which the whole Western country had a direct and beneficial interest. All the States bordering upon the Mississippi, as well as the Ohio River, derive important advantages from the execution of this work. It is also equally important to the Atlantic States, being the usual channel of intercourse, both commercial and personal, between the East and the West. It serves as a common bond of union to connect various and distant portions of the country together.

Mr. R. said he would now submit an estimate to the Senate, of the expense of making this road from Wheeling to the Mississippi River. This estimate is furnished by Mr. Shriver, who was one of the commissioners appointed in 1820, to survey and locate it, and is well acquainted with the whole ground over which it passes. The utmost reliance may be placed upon this statement, from the fact of his having been employed by the Government for superintending the making of the Cumberland road, from its first commencement, until it was completed to the Ohio River; having, therefore, acquired as much practical information upon this subject, as any other man in this nation, Mr. Shriver thus estimates the expense of making the road. The whole distance is 500 miles. The first section, from Wheeling to Zanesville, is about 80 miles. The expense for making it, including bridges, and necessary side-walls, is estimated at $450,000, which is a little more than $5,500 per mile. The road to be made similar, in all respects, to that on this side of the Ohio River. It is to be remarked, that this section will be the most difficult and expensive, as the road passes through a very uneven country, the ravines being deep, and the hills bold and abrupt. The second section, from Zanesville to Dayton, a distance of about — miles, is estimated to cost $550,000. The eastern part of this section, and more than one-half of it, can be made of broken stone, like the former, and the remainder, or western part of this section, must be made of gravel, of which there is a great abundance, and of an excellent quality. This section of the road can be made much cheaper than the first, owing to its passing over a more level and even surface, and requiring less expense for bridges. The third section of the road, from Dayton to the Mississippi River, a distance of 220 miles; the expense of making it cannot be estimated as accurately as the two former sections. When this part of the road was surveyed by the commissioners, there was considerable snow on the ground, which prevented them from examining it as particularly as they could have wished, and ascertaining the quantity and kind of materials with which to make it. Mr. Shriver, however, states, that this section of the road can be made without paving it, and without stone bridges, for $2,000 per mile, which will cost, from Dayton to Mississippi River, $640,000. It is, however, believed that, when this section of the road becomes more settled and better known, that stone or gravel will be found in sufficient quantities to make the road, the whole distance, of a permanent and solid character. From the foregoing statements and remarks, it will appear that the whole expense of making the road from Wheeling to the Mississippi River, will amount to $1,640,000. From the statement before exhibited, from the Commissioner of the Land Office, the two per cent. arising from the sales of land in the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, and applicable to this object, amounted to $2,162,176, leaving a balance of $522,176, in favor of the two per cent. fund. Mr. R. said, the flattering result to which he had arrived, was no visionary dream, no fanciful speculation—it is produced by the facts exhibited by the Commissioner of the Land Office, and by the estimates and calculations of another of your officers, who has been many years in your employment, and of great experience and accuracy. There can be but little doubt that time will test their perfect correctness. From so interesting and gratifying a view of this subject, can it be considered as asking too much of this Senate to pass the bill under consideration? It has passed the House of Representatives by a large majority—shall its progress be arrested here, the great object be defeated, and the hopes and wishes of millions of your fellow-citizens in the West, who are anxiously watching your deliberations on this subject, be disappointed and blasted? It is to be hoped that such will not be the result. The case presented is of the strongest character—one not only founded upon solemn contracts, but upon the great principles of justice, mingling in itself political considerations for the permanent union of these States, of the highest importance. Let, then, this great work go on and be completed; unite the East and the West by the strongest possible ties; let their citizens be no longer strangers, or be considered as having distinct and separate interests. Complete this road; the difficulties of personal and commercial intercourse will be broken down; distance will be annihilated; and the shores of the Mississippi will be brought within the neighborhood of your capital.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, said, as frequent allusion had been made in the debate to the grant for the preservation of certain islands in Boston harbor, the object of which seemed not to be distinctly stated, although he was too much indisposed to fight a battle even once, willingly, yet, to fight it twice over, he would again explain what that grant was for. It was for the preservation of an island, which was in mid-channel, and served as a barrier or shelter to a very excellent roadstead at the entrance of the harbor, for vessels of war of the United States, and the channel of which was filling up by the wasting of the island, which formed also a commanding situation for a fortification in time of war, to secure it for which purpose, with the head land opposite, were among the objects of the grant, and they were important; but it was the apparent good will with which the appropriation was agreed to, which was, at the time, and continued to him to be, the most grateful part of it.

The question was then put on the indefinite postponement of the bill, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bell, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Elliott, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Macon, Mills, Tazewell, Van Buren, Williams—19.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Boulogny, Brown, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, McIlvaine, McLean, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Thomas—25.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, (who wished time to examine more particularly the statements and calculations submitted by Mr. RUGGLES.)

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 24.

Mr. NOBLE submitted the resolution of the General Assembly of Indiana, disapproving the amendment proposed by the State of Georgia to the Constitution of the United States, on the subject of the ingress of people of color into the several States of the Union; which was read.

Delaware and Chesapeake Canal.

The Senate next took up the bill authorizing a subscription on behalf of the United States, of 1,500 shares of the capital stock of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal.

Mr. TAZEVELL moved the adoption of two additional sections to the bill, embracing provisions for authorizing a subscription, on behalf of the Government, of 400 shares of the capital stock of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company, (which connects the waters of the Chesapeake with those of Albemarle Sound.)

Mr. TAZEVELL, in offering his amendment, made a few remarks to show the importance of the work which it was his wish to aid—the necessity of such aid to make it what it ought to be, &c. He drew a parallel between the two works to show their similarity and identity of purpose and effect—the first, opening an interior communication between the Delaware and Chesapeake waters—the other connecting the Chesapeake and the waters of North Carolina; and thus making an immense extension of the benefit which the Delaware Canal would effect. This is in part the substance only of his remarks—the speaker being indistinctly heard by the reporter.

Mr. Brown thought it was his duty to oppose this amendment, because the present was not, in his opinion, the proper time to urge it. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAZEVELL) had professed himself opposed to the grand connection of the whole coast of the Atlantic by internal navigation, which struck his (Mr. B.'s) mind as a most magnificent and useful project, and one which was of the utmost importance to the nation—they would be sure to feel the benefits of it whether they were at peace or war—he declared he had not the least objection to assist the Canal Company of Virginia—he considered that Canal a most important link in the great chain; but to introduce it at this time would defeat the object which this bill contemplated, at least for the present year.

The Chesapeake and Delaware Company wanted the sum now asked for, to complete the canal which had already been begun. The first act incorporating this Company was passed in the year 1799; it had received the sanction of the different States through which it passed, and had attracted the attention of the most enlightened statesmen from the time of the adoption of the constitution. This chain was recommended by Mr. Gallatin, in his able report, which alone would be sufficient to immortalize his memory.

It was presumed by those who are well acquainted with the localities, and the course the canal has to pass, that this would be good stock—stock which the United States could realize when they thought it necessary to assist in the extension of further improvements, probably without any loss.

The question of the constitutionality of appropriating public money for these objects, had been, Mr. B. said, so thoroughly discussed by men so much more able than himself, that it was perfectly unnecessary for him to touch upon that topic—it would be sufficient to say, in answer to the objection made by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB,) that, if this power was not granted, as was the opinion of Publius, in the "Federalist," that gentleman had signed bills for the appropriations for the Cumberland Road.

This bill, Mr. B. said, broke no ground—it claimed no sovereignty, nor trespassed on any domain. If there could be any objection, it would arise from the United States being placed in the attitude of corporators, subject to the law of the State. This was an objection which had long ago been got over in a case of much more importance to the United States—that was, the incorporation of the Bank of the United States. Therefore, there could be no objections to their becoming shareholders.

Mr. SMITH said, the State of Maryland had always taken a deep interest in this canal. It had not only granted a corporation, but had subscribed money towards its completion. Therefore, it seemed a duty on his part to say something on the present occasion. He was not one of those who concurred with the gentlemen from Virginia, (Mr. TAZEWELL,) in his views. Mr. S. said he had always been in favor of internal improvement, so far as it could be executed according to what he considered the true construction of the constitution, and he thought the present measure came within the true construction of it. It was the beginning of the great chain of internal intercourse from Cape Fear to Boston, and this canal being completed, would show that all the others were indispensably necessary, and would, at the proper time, be taken up.

The proposition of the gentleman was, he thought, worthy of great consideration; the canal alluded to by him, was highly important to this great chain, and ought to be perfected; he should, therefore, when it was brought forward at a proper time, give it his most cordial support.

Mr. S. said he understood that the sums subscribed by the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware, with that subscribed by individuals, would, with the appropriation now asked for from Congress, be sufficient to complete the work. As far as they had hitherto proceeded, the cost was within the estimate, and when this work was done, that alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia would be done also, and the communication from Cape Fear to the Delaware would be complete. The subscription had rapidly filled for forming the canal to unite the Delaware and Raritan, which was a most important measure in reference to a time of war; and, in time of peace, would save insurance and lessen the coasting trade, which was the only objection he had to it. The East River, Long Island Sound, &c., made almost an internal communication with Boston; and, if the canal were made, cutting off the dangerous navigation round Cape Cod, there would be, in some sort, an internal navigation from Cape Fear to Boston, and he thought the time would come when Pensacola would be connected by a canal.

Mr. VAN DYKE thought, from what the gentleman from Virginia had said, he might predict he was not opposed to the system of internal improvements and constructing canals: for by his offering the proposition he had done, he seemed to say he had no scruples as to appropriating the public money for that purpose.

Considering him, therefore, as a friend to the present measure, Mr. V. D. said he would ask him to consider how much the amendment he had proposed would impede it, by introducing a proposition new in its character, which had never been under the consideration of Congress; which had never been referred to any committee, which they had no official information to act upon, and which would, therefore, be the very means of defeating the object of the bill. Under this view, therefore, Mr. V. D. hoped he would withdraw his amendment. In opposing the amendment, Mr. V. D. said he acted in conformity with the course that had been pursued in the House—placing each proposition for appropriating money on its own specific character and grounds. Instance the bill proposed to subscribe for a certain number of shares for the completion of a highly useful and necessary work; it was not proposed to give the money, but to subscribe for a portion of the stock, to enable the company to go on with their operations.

It was a subject, he said, that had been before Congress on many occasions, and had been approved of by the Senate many years ago. It had been discussed, and thoroughly discussed, in the House of Representatives, and that House was willing, if the Senate would concur, to take so many shares. Mr. V. D. deprecated the idea of bringing forward another and a new proposition to attach to it, proceeding on an untrodden ground, to embarrass the Legislature—a proposition for an object which they may have heard of individually, but which had not been the subject of inquiry, and which they had now neither time nor opportunity to investigate.

Mr. LOWME, of Pennsylvania, thought this amendment would as effectually defeat the object of the bill, as a majority of noes on the original proposition. Viewing, as he did, with a favorable eye, the project advocated by the gentleman from Virginia, he could not agree with him in all the particulars of the parallel he had drawn between the two projects. For many years the subject of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal has been before Congress, and the attention of the Senate had been particularly drawn to it—for the last 6 years they had reported in its favor—statements had been submitted, going into detail, and the bill had been discussed in, and had passed through, the House of Representatives; and now a new project was offered; if it had been proposed at the early part of the session, it would have followed the usual course, would have been submitted to a committee, and would have been consequently acted on; but if it were now urged on, crowded as they were by business, they must vote on trust; he therefore hoped the amendment would not prevail. If the project had all the merit its friends ascribed to it, it could not fail of succeeding at a future period.

Mr. BRANCH, of North Carolina, said the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia was of more importance to the section of country he had the honor to represent, than any that had ever been brought before Congress; it was connected with the destinies, not only of the east, but the west part of the State. The Senate would recollect, that the Roanoke River had as much fertile land in its vicinity as any part of the Atlantic States. That river, he said, takes its rise in the western part of Virginia, waters the western parts of North Carolina and Virginia, and at this moment more produce is raised in the vicinity of this river, proportionably, than in any of the Atlantic States. Four years ago, a company was chartered by the Legislature of North Carolina, to improve the navigation of the Roanoke River—its funds had all been expended, and the navigation was now nearly completed; the canal round the principal falls of the Roanoke was now excavated, and if they had any way of getting to the sea, they might carry on a most extensive and lucrative trade; the proposition now offered, was the only one by which they could get their produce to market; the funds of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company were exhausted, and the present assistance was asked to enable them to complete the canal. Mr. B. said his friend from Virginia (Mr. TAZEWELL) had clearly shown how intimately the two projects were connected, and he believed if something were not done, all the money expended in North Carolina in improving the Roanoke River would prove so much money thrown away. He thought they could not be charged with encumbering the present bill. If Congress, by a majority, had no constitutional difficulties; if they could embark on the subject of internal improvements, why should not the people of North Carolina receive some portion of the benefit to be derived from that system?

Mr. TAZEWELL replied to the objection, that sufficient time had not been afforded for the examination of the subject, by saying that the bill now under discussion had, it was true, been laying on the table for several weeks past, but it was nothing more than the printed bill of the House of Representatives, that had passed two readings in that body; and its consideration here was not more mature than that of the amendment he had just offered: the only reason, however, why his proposition was introduced as an amendment to this bill was, because there was not time for it to pass through the two Houses as an original and separate proposition; but that, when returned to the House as an amendment to the present bill, it would have sufficient time to pass.

Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, said, he should vote in favor of the amendment. Although the subject was treated here as a new one, it was a proposition which was familiar to the public mind; it related to a way that had been travelled at least for seventeen years; there was no doubt that Washington had seriously considered the project, and indeed it had been before the public so frequently, and in so many forms, that every gentleman's attention must have been drawn to it, and his conclusions formed.

Mr. B. said he considered the plan of internal navigation from St. Mary's to Boston, as one entire work, and he would lend all the aid in his power to effect it from one end to the other; yet he was indisposed to carry on a work of this description by piecemeal. He looked on the works proposed to connect the waters on the front of the Atlantic coast in the same point of view. The able report of Mr. Gallatin, on that subject, showed that there were but eighty or ninety miles of cutting required to connect the whole of the tide waters from St. Mary's to Boston. He wished that the whole system should be adopted, and completed at once, and then confidence would be established throughout the whole Union. With respect to the ability to complete this inland navigation, when there were but ninety miles to cut through, it could not be doubted. When it was considered that sixty millions of dollars had been expended for transportation during the late war, over roads so abominable as to make the cannon-balls cost a dollar a pound, was it to be supposed that in time of peace, with increasing resources, they could not afford to pay for the construction of roads, which, in time to come, would prevent such an enormous waste of money? The whole system would not, in his opinion, cost more than half the sum that was expended for transportation during the late war. He should vote in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, because he was willing it should share the same fate as the original bill, and because, although he was devoted to the completion of the entire system, he objected to the patchwork way in which it presented itself.

Mr. B. was opposed, however, to the manner in which this money was to be applied. He did not approve of associations between this Government and the people of the United States. By the bill, this great Government became nothing less than stockholders in an act of incorporation in one of the States. If they began in this way, subscribing to different associations, they would doubtless have innumerable applications of this description; every one would commence by demonstrating in as clear a manner as Euclid himself could demonstrate, that it would be a great money-making business for the United States; and by and by, petition would follow petition, praying a subscription of stock.

Mr. B. concluded by observing, that, on the report of able Engineers, he should be willing to vote any sum of money for the completion of the work from St. Mary's to Boston, but he was against its being carried on in this piecemeal way.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, expressed his regret that the gentleman from Virginia had brought forward his amendment. It appeared to him that the friends of the Dismal Swamp Canal were willing that the canal in their part of the country should be completed, and had no great objection that the public money should be appropriated for that purpose, if it could be done without their vote, they being constitutionally opposed to it. But, Mr. S. said, if they would only allow the present bill to pass without attaching their proposition to it, they would be the more sure of their project succeeding when brought forward by itself at the next session.

This bill, Mr. S. repeated, was proposed twenty years ago, and in consequence of an amendment similar to the present, being proposed, the whole fell to the ground; and there was no doubt, if the present amendment prevailed, some of the Western members would propose an additional amendment, which would break down the whole.

The plan proposed by the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BERTON) was certainly a most extensive one. He would not be satisfied by taking things piecemeal, but must have every thing transacted on the largest scale. It was his (Mr. SMITH's) opinion, that if they were to attempt to act on a general system, they would get nothing at all done. The fortifications had been erected by piecemeal; a certain sum of money equal to the means of the country had been annually appropriated; but if they had attempted to complete the whole system at once, it never would have been done; there were many parts of the report of the Corps of Engineers, on which many of the members of Congress would have been unwilling to have acted. It surely was not sound argument to say, they were to relinquish a great good because it could only be accomplished by piecemeal. If they had attempted to procure the construction of the Cumberland road according to this grand system, not an inch of it would have been made. He would advise gentlemen to be content with what they could get, and not, by attempting to overload the carriage, to break down and lose the whole.

Mr. BRANCH, of North Carolina, said, although he had his scruples in regard to the constitutionality of the present measure, which would probably influence his vote, he was not disposed to defeat the bill on the table in any other than a direct way. He was opposed to the exercise of the power, because he thought that the constitution under which they acted, did not confer it. He should forbear portraying the consequences that had arisen from the immense patronage possessed by this Government, because many instances of it must be fresh in the recollection of every gentleman. The power already exercised was excessive, and should they add new strength to this power, already so formidable to the friends of liberty? He trusted not. Should they place immense sums of money at the disposal of the Government—of the President? that President who had not only controlled the deliberations of this Congress, but had named his successor? Was it not their duty to pause and seriously reflect on the awful consequences that were likely to result from granting this power? He trusted they would, and that every gentleman would feel it his duty to vote against this bill.

The question being taken on Mr. TAZEVELL's proposition, it was negatived by the following votes:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Branch, Elliott, Hayne, Holmes of Miss., Jackson, Taylor, Tazewell, Williams—10.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Bouligny, Brown, Chandler, Clayton, Dickerson, Edwards, Findlay, Holmes of Me., Johnson of Ken., Johnston of Lou., Kelly, King of Ala., King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Mass., Lowrie, McIlvaine, McLean, Macon, Noble, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke—31.

The question recurring on the third reading of the bill—

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, said he rose with a full heart, to take his last farewell of an old friend that he had always admired and loved—he meant the Constitution of the United States. On this occasion, he said he had experienced a difficulty in expressing his feelings. Perhaps old people thought more of what took place when they were young, than of the occurrences of after times; but in times of old, whenever any question touching the constitution was brought forward, it was discussed day after day; that time was now passed. Gentlemen say it is not necessary now to enter into the constitutional question on this measure. The first time he had ever known them refuse to discuss the constitutional question, involved by a proposition, was, when the act was passed incorporating the present bank of thirty-five millions; from that time the constitution had been asleep.

Every scheme that was proposed was with a view of tying the people together. The late Bank of the United States was to give them a currency alike throughout all the States. It was said at the time, that this was impossible; the friends of the bank insisted they could do it; but, had they done it? Then they got into a system of manufacturing, and everybody was to get rich by it. The next thing was the system of a great navy and fortifications, which was to make them one people from the Atlantic to the Rocky Mountains, from the Bay of Passamaquoddy to Florida; but, had it done so? And now the people were to be tied together by roads and canals. He thought the plan of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) was as wise a one as ever was devised to add power to the Government. Do a little now, and a little then, and, by and by, they would render this Government as powerful and unlimited as the British Government was. We go on deciding on these things, said Mr. M., without looking at the constitution, and I suppose we will, in a few years, do as was done in England—we shall appoint a committee to hunt for precedents. My heart is full when I think of all this; and what is to become of us I cannot say.

This Government was intended to be a limited one, its great objects were war and peace, and now we are endeavoring to prove that these measures are necessary, both as war and as peace measures.

Mr. M. said he would beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to a celebrated report made in Virginia in 1799, for a true exposition of the constitutional powers of this Government. If there was reason to be alarmed at the growing power of the General Government, how much more has taken place since? Congress now stopped almost at nothing, which it deemed expedient to be done, and the constitution was construed to give power for any grand scheme. This change was brought about little by little; so much had never been attempted at one time as would agitate the people. Compare these things with those which had, in old times, been done under the constitution, and the change would be found to be most astonishing. The end of them all would be, in the vulgar tongue, taxation.

He had before expressed his belief that the public debt would never be paid off. They were following Great Britain, step by step, and the final result would be, they would cease to look to the debt itself, but think only of the interest. The history of the British Government would prove, that every war had increased the public debt, and added to the burthens of the people; and what was the result in America? At the time of the Revolution, the war produced eighty-four millions of funded debt; this was now increased to ninety millions, and instead of paying it, they were following the example of Great Britain, and turning it into 4½ per cent. stock, which, like the 8 per cent. stock, no one would buy at par.

Mr. M. said he was against this Government connecting itself with any company. He would have it get clear of the Bank of the United States. Let it appoint no officer, and if it cannot dispose of its stock on good terms, let it get rid of it at any rate. His idea of internal improvement in this country, was, to take from the people all unnecessary burthens. Let them have plenty of wholesome food and good clothing, and he doubted not they would continue to raise boys and girls who would become men and women. These were the sorts of internal improvements he desired to see. It was in vain to talk of any other internal improvements strengthening the country, when there was ninety millions of public debt, and above a hundred of private debt owing. Much of the latter, indeed, was called accommodation paper, but he knew it was false.

These schemes, he thought, were monstrous strides, considering the character of the Government. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr.

SMITH) was for laying the constitution aside on this bill, but that was nothing new in that gentleman, for he had constantly pursued that plan ever since he had known him.

Mr. M. was afraid they were going to follow the system recommended by a member of a certain foreign legislature. When he was asked what measures he would adopt to make the people peaceable and submissive, he replied, "Tax them heavily, and collect it rigidly; give them enough to do, and they would never plague the Government." This was the practice in Europe, and it had succeeded very well. As to the meaning of the constitution, Mr. M. said, those who composed the Convention that formed it, certainly must have known what they intended, and all the writers of the day referred to no power of this kind; but it seemed the people of the present day understood what the framers of the constitution intended better than they did themselves. He could give no other names to his feelings than fears. It was true, he had no fears for his personal liberty, but he feared his descendants would be taxed up to the nose, so that if they got breath, it would be as much as they could do. The country now was not in a situation to pay direct taxes. In time of war, there was 15 per cent. difference in the taxes of the different States; but the same thing would not be suffered now. He was certain the Government could neither lay them nor collect them at this time. His fears might be groundless—they might be nothing but the suggestions of a worn-out old man, but they were sincere, and he was alarmed for the safety of this Government.

The question was taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Boulogny, Brown, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Noble, Parrott, Ruggles, Smith, Talbot, Thomas, Van Dyke, Williams—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bell, Benton, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Elliott, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, McLean, Macon, Seymour, Tazewell, Van Buren—18.

And the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 25.

Lake Superior Copper Mines.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Commissioners to treat with the Chippewa Indians, for the right of discovering and working certain valuable Copper Mines, supposed to be on the south side of Lake Superior; and appropriating the sum of ten thousand dollars to defray the expense of treating with the said Indians. The bill having been read—

Mr. BENTON said that the existence of copper mines on Lake Superior was a fact of historical notoriety, attested by all travellers in that region for a century and a half past. They were seen in 1689 by the monk La Hontan; in 1721, by the Jesuit, Father Charlevoix; in 1766, by Captain Carver; in 1771, by Henry; and in 1789, by Sir Alexander McKenzie. Each of these travellers published an account of these mines, and their descriptions have excited the attention of the first mineralogists of Europe. Some years before the commencement of our Revolution, a mass of silver ore was found in the same region, carried to England, and gave rise to a mining company, of which the Duke of Gloucester was the head. They caused a gallery to be opened in a hill on the south side of the lake, but finding nothing but copper, the operations were discontinued; for it was no object in the then condition of the country and state of transportation, to carry copper from Lake Superior to London.

In the year 1800, at the time when the Government of the United States contemplated an augmentation of the Navy, a resolution, adopted in both Houses of Congress, authorized an examination to be made of these mines, by a competent agent; but the policy of the Government changing soon afterwards, the examination was attended with few results.

In 1807, Mr. Gallatin deemed these mines of such value as to be enumerated by him among the sources of our national wealth.

In 1820, they were visited by Governor Cass, of Michigan, and Mr. Schoolcraft, a mineralogist, and a report of their discoveries made to the Secretary of War. A knowledge of this fact, Mr. B. said, had induced him, at the session of 1821-2, to lay a resolution upon the table of the Senate, calling upon the War Department to furnish all the information which the Department contained upon this subject. In compliance with that resolution, a report had been received, and published among the documents of 1822-'3, giving full and satisfactory information upon the extent and value of these mines. Their report has been confirmed, by a letter from Governor Cass, lately printed among our documents, and by another from Mr. Schoolcraft, (which was read,) and the fineness and purity of the metal had been proved by the proport of a mass of 50 pounds weight, which had been lately deposited in the Library of Congress. But the superior fineness of this metal is not a mere matter of opinion. It has been tested in the Mint of Utrecht, by the Inspector General of that Mint, upon the request of our late fellow-citizen, Governor Eustis, of Massachusetts. That distinguished citizen, anxious to be useful to his country, had possessed himself of specimens of this copper when at the head of the War Department, and carried them with him afterwards on his embassy to Holland. The report of the inspector is to be found in all the principal European works upon the subject of mineralogy. It says:

"The examination of the North American copper, in the sample received from his excellency the Minister, by the operations of the coppel, and the test by fire, has proved that it does not contain the smallest particle of silver, gold, or any other metal. Its color is a clear red; it is peculiarly qualified for rolling and forging, and its excellence is indicated by its resemblance to the copper usually employed by the English for plating. The dealers in copper call this sort Peruvian copper, to distinguish it from that of Sweden, which is much less malleable. The specimen under consideration is incomparably better than Swedish copper, as well on account of its brilliant color, as for the fineness of its pores, and its extreme ductility."

Mr. B. would not dilate upon the advantages to be derived from a home supply of this metal. It was an article of almost universal use. Ships could not be built without it. The cost of copper in a single ship of the line, lately built under an act of Congress, was $57,000. Merchant vessels required a proportionate supply. In all the grain-growing districts of the United States, it was in demand for stills. The Mint of the United States made annual purchases, sometimes to the amount of $80,000 for the coinage of cents and half cents. Combined with zinc, of which there was an exhaustless supply in the mineral districts of Missouri, copper produced brass, an article of such universal use and application that it was found in every form, and in every house, from the cottage of a peasant to the palace of a King, and applied to every use from the pin to the cannon.

Mr. B. believed that the problem of the existence of these mines ought to be solved, and that the appropriation of $10,000 contemplated by the bill, was an object of no consideration in the magnitude of the question to be decided.

Mr. DICKERSON was not opposed to the object of the bill, but he preferred a modification of its provisions. He would prefer that an agent should be sent to examine the country, and to make a report, and to have that report returned before the subject was finally acted upon. He was no stranger to the accounts which described a large mass of native copper on the south side of Lake Superior, but detached masses of any metal were not considered as certain indications of mines. He instanced the lumps of gold found in North Carolina, and of other metals found in other places, and yet without the accompaniment of mines.

Mr. CHANDLER was in favor of having the country examined before any thing further was done; but considered the undertaking as an experiment, in which we, the United States, would probably spend more dollars than we should ever receive cents.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, replied. He said that reports of the kind that gentlemen called for, had already been received, and referred to in debate by the senator from Missouri. If gentlemen wanted reports founded upon actual experiments in searching for mineral, such search would involve the commission of a trespass upon the soil and jurisdiction of the Indians—a point upon which the gentlemen had been particularly scrupulous heretofore.

Mr. BENTON rejoined. He was not skilled in the science of mineralogy; but he knew enough to know that a solitary mass of any metal, found by itself, was not a sign certain of the presence of a mine. But here the fact was not what the gentleman supposed it to be. The indications of copper on Lake Superior, were not confined to the mass which the gentleman had particularized. It was seen in thousands of places, in lumps and in veins, on both sides of the lake, on the islands within it, and extending across the country to the Falls of St. Anthony. Mr. B. said that it was a continuation of that great region of fossils and minerals, which, beginning upon the Arkansas River, traversed the State of Missouri, crossed the Mississippi at the Falls of St. Anthony, and exhibited itself on both sides of Lake Superior. As to reports, said Mr. B., we have enough of them. We know as much as we can learn, by looking at the surface of the ground. If we want to know more, we must penetrate the bowels of the earth, and that is the precise thing which the bill before the Senate proposes to do. It is in vain to say, that we must not search until we are sure of finding. Upon that principle nothing would be found, except what the chapter of accidents would give. It was equally in vain to argue against the existence of valuable mines on Lake Superior, because they were not yet discovered. The great copper mines in England, which now furnish more than one-half of the whole quantity of copper produced by all the mines in the known world, were only discovered in the last century; the name of the great salt mine in that kingdom, Sa-lina, was known to the Roman legions two thousand years ago; but the vast mine of salt, which furnished the salt water of that spring, was only discovered some fifty years ago.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

SATURDAY, February 26.

Occupation of the Oregon River.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. MILLS in the chair,) the consideration of the bill for the occupation of the Oregon River.

Mr. BARBOUR said, that, personally, he had no particular concern with this bill, and had not intended to have participated in the debate, as it was under the care of the Military Committee, whose members were every way able to defend it; but as the Senate had laid it on the table in consequence of his absence, he felt it due to them to state, that he approved of the bill, and would avail himself of this opportunity briefly to state the reasons which induced that opinion.

The subject would naturally divide itself into two views, under which it should be considered: 1st. Have the United States a right to the territory proposed to be settled? and, 2dly. Is it politic now to occupy it in the way proposed by the bill?

On the first point, as to title, he had but little to add to the very full exposition given by the American Plenipotentiary to the Court of St. James. He thought, by a comparison of that state paper with the counter statement of the representative of that court, there could be no difficulty in saying, that the claim of Great Britain, as to the territory on the Oregon, was without foundation. If, as Mr. B. believed, America, in the spirit of friendship and forbearance, had made a sacrifice to Russia of five degrees of her just claims on the Northwest Coast, and in the same spirit had been willing to make an equal sacrifice to Great Britain, he hoped on her part she would eagerly seize this proof of good will, and close with the terms proposed. Be that as it may, the United States can yield no further. As a consequence, our claim must be held as unquestionable many degrees to the north of the proposed settlement. As a matter of curiosity, and indeed as connected with the question in hand, one may be permitted to recur to the pretensions of the European nations to the different portions of the New World. Spain, under whom we claim, has unquestionably the undivided credit of its first discovery, and, to the extent to which this fact goes, the best title—to which she superadded the grant of the head of the Christian world, in the person of the Pope; and however ridiculous the latter may seem at this time, at the time of the exercise of this high prerogative it was respected by the civilized world. This respect, however, yielded eventually to cupidity, and the other nations of Europe proceeded to appropriate such portions as accident or circumstances enabled them, in opposition to the claims and the protests of Spain. The opposing claims were sometimes adjusted by rules established pro re nata. Sometimes merged in contemporary subjects of contest in Europe, or, finally, if there were any rule generally acquiesced in, it was discovery and actual occupation. Now, by the correspondence before referred to, by whatever test our claim to the territory in question shall be decided, it seems obvious that that of the United States is not to be shaken. As every gentleman is in possession of that correspondence, a more particular reference is deemed unnecessary.

Passing to the second view of the subject, Is it politic now to occupy it, in the way proposed by the bill? we must inquire what are the probable advantages or disadvantages.

The bill proposes a military establishment only on the banks of the Oregon. Its advantage is obvious, as it regards our navigating interest in time of peace. When we advert to the extent of this interest on the Pacific already, and its probable future increase, a friendly asylum, which will be furnished by this establishment, to which our vessels can repair, in an otherwise strange, distant, and perhaps hostile region, must contribute alike to their comfort and safety.

If, from the ocean we look to the interior, and to the great and diversified territory washed by the Oregon, this settlement, as a depot for commerce, must be full of advantage. Advantages of such a position, in the event of war, are too obvious to be enumerated. What are the disadvantages to be objected to it? An unwieldy extent of empire? What is meant by this objection? If you will not settle it yourselves, give it up to some of the European nations—either will take it off your hands, and quiet your scruples on this head. But no American Senator will propose this. What then? Is it to be kept as a jungle for wild beasts? No. It is not in the order of Providence. The earth was designed for man. It is not in human power, if it were wished, to prevent the consummation of the design. Fifty years ago and the valley of the Mississippi was like the present condition of the country of the Oregon. It is now teeming with a mighty population—a free and happy people. Their march onward, therefore, to the country of the setting sun, is irresistible. I will not disguise that I look with the deepest anxiety on this vast extension of our empire, as to its possible effects on our political institutions. Whatever they may be, however, our forefathers decided the experiment should be made. When it was determined to annex the vast region of which the country in question is a part, to the old States, that question must have been deliberately weighed, and, in that determination, our destinies, whatever they may be, were placed, in this particular, beyond our control. While I look with anxiety, sir, it is mingled with a strong hope—the hope of the future rests on the strong foundation of the experience of the past.

Our advance in political science has already cancelled the dogmas of theory. We have already ascertained, by the happy combination of a National and State Governments, but above all, by a wise arrangement of the representative system, that republics are not necessarily limited to a small territory—and that a Government, thus arranged, produces not only more happiness, but more stability and more energy, than those the most arbitrary. Whether it is capable of indefinite extent, must be left to posterity to decide. But, in the most unfavorable result, a division, by necessity, from its unwieldy extent—an event, I would devoutly hope, is afar off—we even then can console ourselves with the reflection, that all the parts of the great whole will have been peopled by our kindred, carrying with them the same language, habits, and unextinguishable devotion to liberty and republican institutions.

Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, said, he had hoped, that, before gentlemen opposed to this bill should be called upon for their reasons against it, the Senate would have heard from its friends all the arguments that can be urged in its favor. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) has mentioned its importance to our trade in the Pacific in general terms, said Mr. D., without descending to any detail of facts or circumstances. He also stated that we had already acquired this territory of Oregon—we should have deliberated when we so acquired it—not now—that it was impossible to stop the march of population in that region—and that it was our duty to provide for extending such population, which, in that gentleman's opinion, was a sufficient reason for passing the present bill.

It is true, that, by the operation of certain causes, we have acquired this territory; but that circumstance surely imposes upon Congress no obligation to provide for its occupation or population, unless the interests of the United States should require it. To that country we owe nothing. By the present bill, that portion of country lying on the Pacific Ocean, north of the 42d degree of North latitude, and west of the Rocky Mountains, is to be erected into the territory of Oregon, without defining its northern boundary. The President to occupy the same with a military force, and cause a suitable fortification to be erected. The Indian title to be extinguished for a tract not exceeding thirty miles square, or nine hundred square miles. To erect a port of entry within and for said territory, whenever he shall think the public good may require it, and to appoint such officers as may be necessary for the same; after which, the revenue laws of the United States shall extend to, and be in full force in, said territory. It is true, the bill does not provide for the appointment of a Governor or Judges of this territory: but these no doubt are to follow. The present is but an incipient step in a much more extensive plan of populating and settling that country, as we may collect from the original bill as laid upon our tables; and even this is but a part of the whole plan, as this would include a chain of posts from Council Bluffs to the mouth of Columbia River.

In all these points of view, it is a bill of the highest importance.

As yet, we have extended our laws to no territories, but such as were or are to become States of the Union. We have not adopted a system of colonization, and it is to be hoped we never shall. Oregon can never be one of the United States. If we extend our laws to it, we must consider it as a colony.

The period never will arrive when it will be proper to adopt the measures proposed by the friends of the present bill; but, if ever, this is certainly not the time: because their adoption now would interfere with existing relations between the British Government and ours.

The territory of Oregon is bounded on the South by latitude 42, as by our treaty with Spain. On the North, the Russians renounce all claim to the country South of latitude 54° 40'. We think our claim incontestable as far as the 49th parallel of latitude, supported by the cession of Spain in 1819: by the discovery of the mouth of the Columbia River by sea, and afterwards by Lewis and Clark over land, and by an actual settlement at the mouth of the Columbia in 1811. This would leave the British Government a belt of 5° 40' of latitude from the Rocky Mountains and the Ocean, between our possessions and those of Russia; an arrangement, it is to be presumed, not altogether satisfactory to the British Government, and which, indeed, could be of very little importance to them. They have already extended their settlements to a point on the Columbia River, and we know they have set up a pretence of claim to all that part of the territory lying North of the Columbia to its mouth. It would have been desirable that they should have been parties in our treaty with Russia; but in this they refused to take a part. The extent of their claim is not to be ascertained or limited by Congress; but our commercial treaty with that Government certainly recognizes a claim to some part of that territory, without defining what part. By the 8d article of that treaty, it is agreed, "That any country that may be claimed by either party, on the Northwest Coast of America, westward of the Stony Mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of the convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers; it being well understood, that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of said country, nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other power or state to any part of the said country; the only object of the high contracting parties in that respect being to prevent disputes and differences among themselves."

This treaty expires in 1828, until which period, it will be highly improper to take possession of this territory by military force, or to establish a port of entry there, or, indeed, to exercise any act of possession or occupation we did not exercise at the period of making this treaty; more especially in that part of the territory to which the British Government laid claim, however unfounded.

The President, by this bill, is to take possession, by a military force, of the Oregon Territory. We claim up to the Russian line, latitude 54° 40', but consider our right incontestable to latitude 49. The President must, therefore, take possession up to that parallel. He is to cause a fort to be erected on Oregon River, on the left or the right bank, as he shall deem it expedient, and cause the Indian title to be extinguished to a tract of land thirty miles square, or 900 square miles, including said fort, and which ought to include both banks of the river, and include a considerable portion of country claimed by the British Government, but which, under the provisions of our treaty, they have not thought themselves authorized to occupy by a military force. Our port of entry may be erected at Nootka Sound, and our revenue laws extended to every part of the territory.

As yet the British Government have done nothing to contravene the provisions of this treaty, but will they quietly look on and see us take military possession of this territory, make our establishments, purchase the Indian title to 900 square miles, erect fortifications, and establish ports of entry? By our treaty, the country is to remain open without prejudice to the claims of either party, in order to prevent disputes. But is this measure calculated to prevent disputes? On the contrary, will it not lead to immediate collisions with the British Government? Will they not also take military possession of this territory? erect fortifications, purchase the Indian title, and establish ports of entry? We cannot steal a march upon them; they are always on the alert—we shall gain nothing by this hasty, this uncalculated measure. At all events, before we proceed further, let us ascertain by negotiation, not by military force, our respective parts of this territory. If we are entitled to the whole of it, by amicable adjustment, if possible, or, if we must enforce our rights, by military occupation, let it not be done till all other means have failed. It is to be presumed the British Government are willing to enter into negotiations for settling our respective boundaries in that territory. Should the negotiation occupy many years, it ought to excite no regret, as it would give the unhappy natives of that region a little more time to breathe upon the face of the earth, before the final process of extermination, by means of a white and civilized population, shall take place. No doubt the British Government would willingly renew the third article of the treaty of 1818 for ten years more, to prevent disputes. And if the two Governments would make a perpetual treaty, to take no further possession of that territory, than they now have, or that might be necessary for the purposes of trading with the Indians, they would do more for the cause of humanity, than has been done in the present age.

In 1810 we had a settlement at the mouth of the Columbia River, called Astoria, which the British took from us during the late war—it was, however, delivered up to us under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, and, whoever may be the private owners of the property there, the possession is in the United States, and may now be occupied as it was before the war. As yet, we have sent no military force there. What is the immediate pressure for such a force at this time? To protect our ships engaged in the whaling and fishing, and in the fur trade, and taking of sea otters. The whales are caught in the Southern latitudes, and all the sea otters we shall ever take upon the coast of the Oregon Territory, would not pay the expense of marching a single company across the Rocky Mountains.

What little commerce we may have upon that coast, will be much better protected by three or four ships of our Navy, than by any fortification on Oregon River. We have now in the Pacific Ocean the frigate United States, sloop of war Peacock, and schooner Dolphin, and can send more there if necessary.

But is this territory of Oregon ever to become a State, a member of this Union? Never. The Union is already too extensive—and we must make three or four new States from the territories already formed.

The distance from the mouth of the Columbia to the mouth of the Missouri, is 3,555 miles—from Washington to the mouth of the Missouri, is 1,180 miles—making the whole distance from Washington to the mouth of the Columbia River, 4,708 miles—but say 4,650 miles. The distance, therefore, that a member of Congress of this State of Oregon, would be obliged to travel, in coming to the Seat of Government and returning home, would be 9,800 miles; this, at the rate of eight dollars for every twenty miles, would make his travelling expenses amount to 8,720 dollars. Every member of Congress ought to see his constituents once a year. This is already very difficult for those in the most remote parts of the Union. At the rate which the members of Congress travel according to law, that is, twenty miles per day, it would require, to come to the Seat of Government, from Oregon, and return, 465 days; and if he should lie by for Sundays, say 66, it would require 581 days. But, if he should travel at the rate of 80 miles per day, it would require 306 days. Allow for Sundays, 44, it would amount to 350 days. This would allow the member a fortnight to rest himself at Washington, before he should commence his journey home. This rate of travelling would be a hard duty, as a greater part of the way is exceedingly bad, and a portion of it over rugged mountains, where Lewis and Clarke found several feet of snow in the latter part of June. Yet a young, able-bodied Senator might travel from Oregon to Washington and back once a year; but he could do nothing else. It would be more expeditious, however, to come by water round Cape Horn, or to pass through Behring's Straits, round the North coast of this continent to Baffin's Bay, thence through Davis's Straits to the Atlantic, and so on to Washington. It is true, this passage is not yet discovered, except upon our maps—but it will be as soon as Oregon shall be a State.

But how could a revenue be derived from such a State, or supplies sent to it, but at an enormous expense? Every portion of strength given to this State, from the other parts of the Union, would so far weaken the Union: and this territory, when it shall obtain the strength and importance of a State, will fall off from the Union by its own weight.

Is this territory to be a colony? Have we a surplus population that we wish to send from our country? So far from that, we have hundreds of millions of acres of fertile lands, within the boundaries of our present States and Territories, that remain unoccupied for want of a population to take possession of them. While this is the case, shall we be holding out inducements to our citizens to seek settlements in the remote parts of the earth.

If we plant a colony at Oregon, we must protect it, and that at an enormous expense. And what advantage can we expect in return? Surely none. We form a vulnerable point where our enemy can easily reach us, and where it will be very difficult to defend ourselves. The British, last war, took from us our settlement at Astoria. This was a matter of but little importance. But if we had possessed a city there of 80,000 inhabitants, we should have expended millions for its defence, and, after all, probably have lost it.

Will this colony afford us any very important commercial advantages? Are we to supply it with manufactures? It will be a long time before we supply ourselves. We import, for our own consumption, annually, of foreign manufactures, more than the amount of five and twenty millions of dollars. Are we to have great advantages in the fur trade with the natives of that region? As soon as we establish a white population in Oregon, who will drive the Indians back to the Rocky Mountains, that trade will cease.

To carry the provisions of this act into effect, the sum of 50,000 dollars has been agreed to, as contained in the bill from the House of Representatives. This sum has, however, been struck out, for the purpose of inserting a larger. A sum ten times larger will be required before the objects of the bill can be carried fully into effect. In a report of the 23d of Feb. 1824, we have an estimate of the expense of transporting 200 troops from Council Bluffs to the mouth of Columbia River, at 44,000 dollars. It is fair to judge of the future by the past. The expense of the Yellow Stone expedition is a case in point. The transportation of 145 tons of provisions, munitions of war, &c., by the steamboat Expedition—145 tons by the steamboat Jefferson—75 tons by the steamboat Johnson, with 800 troops, chiefly from the mouth of the Missouri to Council Bluffs, 650 miles, cost the United States 255,000 dollars. There were other charges attending the expedition, to a large amount, so that it may be estimated that the transportation of our troops to Council Bluffs, with all the necessary supplies, munitions of war, &c., cost us at the rate of nearly a thousand dollars per man.

If we send men enough to Oregon to defend themselves, and establish military posts from Council Bluffs to the mouth of Columbia River, we ought to appropriate half a million of dollars as a beginning.

The third article of the treaty of 1818, was evidently intended to suspend, for ten years, any further acts of possession or occupation, than had then taken place. This seemed necessary, to prevent disputes between the parties. Humanity had nothing to do with this arrangement. Had the object been to protect the native owners of the soil from the encroachments of a white population, a civilized population, an exterminating population, it would have been in the highest degree honorable to the contracting parties. Would to Heaven there was a perpetual decree, that should forever secure to the aborigines of that soil, the quiet possession of the country they now enjoy. If that were the case, it would be easy for the United States to adopt a plan, by which a region of at least two hundred and fifty thousand square miles might be secured as an abiding-place for three hundred thousand of the native children of the forest, who are otherwise doomed, in a short period, to be swept from the face of the earth, by the same civilized population that have exterminated the numerous tribes that once possessed the Atlantic States.

From the meridian of Council Bluffs there is an immense region, extending to the Rocky Mountains, containing about 160,000 square miles, which, from the sterility of the soil, the want of wood and water, can never be cultivated, and, of course, never admit of a civilized population. An accurate description of this region may be found in Major Long's Expedition, vol. 2, page 850. After describing this country, he says, in page 861—

"In regard to this extensive section of country, I do not hesitate in giving the opinion that it is almost wholly unfit for cultivation, and of course uninhabitable by a people depending upon agriculture for subsistence. Although tracts of fertile land, considerably extensive, are occasionally to be met with, yet the scarcity of wood and water, almost uniformly prevalent, will prove an insuperable obstacle in the way of settling the country. This objection rests not only against the immediate section under consideration, but applies, with equal propriety, to a much larger portion of the country. Agreeably to the best intelligence that can be had concerning the country both Northward and Southward of the section, and especially to the inferences deducible from the account given by Lewis and Clarke, of the country situated between the Missouri and the Rocky Mountains, above the River Platte, the vast region commencing near the sources of the Sabine, Trinity, Brasos, and Colorado, and extending northwardly to the 49th degree of North latitude, by which the United States territory is limited, in that direction, is, throughout, of a similar character. The whole of this region seems peculiarly adapted as a range for buffaloes, wild goats, and other wild game, incalculable multitudes of which find ample pasturage and subsistence upon it.

"This region, however, viewed as a frontier, may prove of infinite importance to the United States, inasmuch as it is calculated to serve as a barrier to prevent too great an extension of our population westward, and secure us against the machinations or incursions of an enemy, that might be disposed to annoy us in that quarter."

It would seem that nature had secured this last refuge to the tribes inhabiting this vast region, but this will fail them, if we protect our trappers and hunters by an armed force, who are traversing every part of this region, destroying the beaver and buffalo, and which must effectually destroy the native inhabitants by taking from them their very means of subsistence.

The Rocky Mountains, and inhospitable regions adjoining them, within our boundaries, may be estimated at 40,000 square miles, making, in all, 200,000 square miles of country, which will never admit of a white population. Add to this about 50,000 square miles of territory, lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Western Ocean, which, although susceptible of a white population, may be permanently secured by treaties and conventions to the natives of the soil. This would altogether form a region of 250,000 square miles—a very small portion of the immense continent, which, three centuries ago, belonged exclusively to the red men of the then Western world.

The different tribes between the meridian of Council Bluffs and the Rocky Mountains, may be estimated at 120,000 souls; those west of the Rocky Mountains, at 80,000. If they were made secure, in the possession of this territory, their population would increase; and a part of the remnants of the tribes now in the bounds of the States, would, with the aid of our Government, remove into this reserved territory, where they could hope to rest in peace. From a late message of the President of the United States, it appears, that the whole number of Indians remaining in our States and Territories may be estimated at 129,000,—all of whom, it is desirable, should remove beyond the Mississippi. It is probable that as many as 80,000 of them may be induced to remove beyond the meridian of Council Bluffs; the residue will probably remain till they gradually become extinct, as numerous and once powerful tribes have already done in the Atlantic States. This would make a population, for a region of 250,000 square miles, of 800,000 souls. The British Government are famed for their magnificent plans for ameliorating the condition of the human race. Would they not readily join the Government of the United States in any measure that might be necessary to secure the whole territory claimed by both parties west of the Rocky Mountains to the present possessors of the soil? It is an object worthy of the united exertions of the two Governments—of the united exertions of Europe and America. No object so interesting to humanity has presented itself to the present age—we have institutions for the colonization of our black population—for extending the benefits of religion and civilization to the most remote parts of the earth—while the miserable remnants of the innumerable tribes that once possessed this whole continent, seem doomed to be swept from the face of the earth, by the irresistible flow of a white, civilized, Christian population, without one great effort to save them. To this abused race we owe an immense debt, only to be obliterated by their extermination, which will happen in a short period, unless the civilized world will extend the means of preservation. Of the numerous tribes that once traversed the Atlantic States, the proud and fearless owners of the soil—Where are they now? With those who lived before the flood. In all the old States, except Georgia, there are to be found no more than 8,000 souls of this unhappy race. The residue exterminated, except a few who have retreated beyond the Alleghany Mountains, and who still linger in this world, to lament their wretched condition, and to relate the melancholy history of their wrongs.

We have lately passed a law for the preservation of the Indian tribes within the United States, by which a permanent residence is to be provided for them west of the State of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, provided they will consent to be transferred to this region; and the faith of the nation is to be pledged, that they shall be permanently protected in the peaceable possession of this country. If we should permit them to possess the country eastwardly of the meridian of Council Bluffs, and bounded on the south by the Arkansas Territory, on the east by the State of Missouri and the Mississippi River, and the Red River, up to the latitude of 49, it would be an addition of thirty or forty thousand square miles to the region already described, and furnish a safe, ample, and happy retreat to all the tribes who shall think proper to embrace the offers of our Government. As to the Oregon Territory, it can never be of any pecuniary advantage to the United States, but it may be made the means of promoting, in a most signal manner, the cause of humanity; and this is the best possible disposition that can be made of it; while the worst would be the adoption of the provisions of the present bill.

Mr. D. concluded by moving that the bill lie on the table, which was carried—ayes 19, noes 17.

Unsigned Act.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

Just before the termination of the last session, an act entitled "An act concerning wrecks on the coast of Florida," which was then proposed, was presented to me, with many others, and approved, and, as I thought, signed. It appeared, however, after the adjournment, that the evidence of such approbation had not been attached to it. Whether the act may be considered in force under such circumstances, is a point on which it belongs not to me to decide. To remove all doubt on the subject, I submit to the consideration of Congress, the propriety of passing a declaratory act to that effect.

Public Lands and Slavery.

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That Congress possesses no power to appropriate the public land of the United States, 'to constitute and form a fund to aid the emancipation of slaves,' within any of the United States, or 'to aid the removal of such slaves;' and that, to constitute such a fund, or, 'to pledge the faith of the United States,' for the appropriation thereof towards these objects, would be a departure from the conditions and spirit of the compact between the several States; and that such measures would be dangerous to the safety of the States holding slaves, and be calculated to disturb the peace and harmony of the Union."

Mr. HAYNE said, that, in asking the leave of the Senate to lay the foregoing resolution on the table, he was calling their attention to a subject of the most vital importance to those whom he had the honor to represent, and closely connected with the rights and interests of the Southern States. It would be recollected that a resolution had been submitted a few days ago, by an honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) which proposed, (without any request from the States, or any call by them on the General Government for aid,) to set apart, and pledge a fund, for the emancipation and removal from the United States, "of such slaves as, by the laws of the States, respectively, may be allowed to be emancipated and removed;" which resolution had been laid upon the table, with a declaration, that it was not to be called up for consideration. This course had put it out of the power of the Southern members, whose constituents were deeply interested in the proposition, to show the unconstitutional character and dangerous tendency of measures of this nature. The only course which was left them to pursue, was to lay on the table a counter resolution, intended as a solemn protest against any unsolicited interference on the part of the Federal Government, with the subject, which properly belonged to the States, and which involved not only the peace but the existence of those States—a subject with which it was conceived the Federal Government had nothing to do, and concerning which Congress could not possess that species of information necessary to wise and safe legislation.

The resolution was laid on the table accordingly.

TUESDAY, March 1.

Occupation of the Oregon River.

Mr. HAYNE renewed the motion to take up the bill authorizing the occupation of the mouth of the Oregon River. He thought that justice required that an opportunity should be given to the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) to answer the statements and arguments delivered by Mr. DICKERSON against the bill. It was a matter of public interest that the information which he possessed on the subject should go to the public; and as soon as that gentleman should have submitted his views to the Senate, Mr. H. said he would agree to postpone the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER opposed the taking up the bill, for the reasons he had before stated. He thought it was best to act first on the business necessary to be passed, and then would be a very good time to debate a bill which there was no intention of passing during the present session.

The motion to take up the bill prevailed; and the Senate went into Committee of the Whole on it, Mr. ELLIOTT in the chair.

Mr. BENTON, in reply to Mr. DICKERSON, said, that he had not intended to speak to this bill. Always unwilling to trespass upon the time and patience of the Senate, he was particularly so at this moment, when the session was drawing to a close, and a hundred bills upon the table were each demanding attention. The occupation of the Columbia River was a subject which had engaged the deliberations of Congress for four years past, and the minds of gentlemen might be supposed to be made up upon it. Resting upon this belief, Mr. B. as reporter of the bill, had limited himself to the duty of watching its progress, and of holding himself in readiness to answer any inquiries which might be put. Inquiries he certainly expected; but a general assault, at this late stage of the session, upon the principle, the policy, and the details of the bill, had not been anticipated. Such an assault, had, however, been made by the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. D.), and Mr. B. would be unfaithful to his duty if he did not repel it. In discharging this duty, he would lose no time in going over the gentleman's calculations about the expense of getting a member of Congress from the Oregon to the Potomac; nor would he solve his difficulties about the shortest and best route; whether Cape Horn should be doubled, a new route explored under the North pole, or mountains climbed, whose aspiring summits present twelve feet of defying snow to the burning rays of a July sun. Mr. B. looked upon these calculations and problems as so many dashes of the gentleman's wit, and admitted that wit was an excellent article in debate, equally convenient for embellishing an argument, and concealing the want of one. For which of these purposes the Senator from New Jersey had amused the Senate with the wit in question, it was not for Mr. B. to say, nor should he undertake to disturb him in the quiet enjoyment of the honor which he had won thereby. Leaving all that out of view, he would proceed directly to expose and confute those parts of the gentleman's argument in which he had favored the pretensions of Great Britain at the expense of the rights and interests of his own country. These parts are—

1st. His admission of title, on the part of Great Britain, to the right bank of the Columbia River.

2d. His declarations that the United States were precluded from occupying the country on the Columbia River by the third article of the London convention of 1818.

3d. His menace of a conflict with Great Britain if we presumed to occupy it.

It is now, Mr. President, continued Mr. B., precisely two and twenty years since a contest for the Columbia has been going on between the United States and Great Britain. The contest originated with the discovery of the river itself. The moment that we discovered it, she claimed it; and without a color of title in her hand, she has labored ever since to overreach us in the arts of negotiation, or to bully us out of our discovery by menaces of war.

In the year 1790, a citizen of the United States, Capt. Gray, of Boston, discovered the Columbia at its entrance into the sea; and in 1808, Lewis and Clarke were sent by the Government of the United States, to complete the discovery of the whole river from its source downwards, and to take formal possession in the name of their Government. In 1798, Sir Alexander McKenzie had been sent from Canada by the British Government to effect the same object; but he missed the sources of the river, fell upon the Tacoutche Tasse, and struck the Pacific about five hundred miles to the north of the mouth of the Columbia.

In 1808, the United States acquired Louisiana, and with it an open question of boundaries for that vast province. On the side of Mexico and Florida, this question was to be settled with the King of Spain; on the north and northwest with the King of Great Britain. It happened in the very time that we were signing a treaty in Paris for the acquisition of Louisiana, that we were signing another in London for the adjustment of the boundary line between the northwest possessions of the United States and of the King of Great Britain. The negotiators of each were ignorant of what the others had done; and on remitting the two treaties to the Senate of the United States, for ratification, that for the purchase of Louisiana was ratified without restriction; the other with the exception of the fifth article. It was this article which adjusted the boundary line between the United States and Great Britain, from the Lake of the Woods to the head of the Mississippi; and the Senate refused to ratify it, because, by possibility, it might jeopard the northern boundary of Louisiana. The treaty was sent back to London, the fifth article expunged; and the British Government, acting then as upon a late occasion, rejected the whole treaty, when she failed in securing the precise advantage of which she was in search.

In the year 1807, another treaty was negotiated between the United States and Great Britain. The negotiators on both sides were then possessed of the fact, that Louisiana belonged to the United States, and that her boundaries to the north and west were undefined. The settlement of this boundary was a point in the negotiation, and continued efforts were made by the British Plenipotentiaries to overreach the Americans, with respect to the country west of the Rocky Mountains. Without presenting any claim, they endeavored "to leave a nest egg for future pretensions in that quarter." (State Papers, 1822-'8.) Finally, an article was agreed to. The 49th degree of North latitude was to be followed west, as far as the territories of the two countries extended in that direction, with a proviso against its application to the country west of the Rocky Mountains. This treaty shared the fate of that of 1803. It was never ratified. For causes unconnected with the questions of boundary, it was rejected by Mr. Jefferson without a reference to the Senate.

At Ghent, in 1814, the attempts of 1803 and 1807 were renewed. The British Plenipotentiaries offered articles upon the subject of the boundary, and of the Northwest Coast, of the same character with those previously offered; but nothing could be agreed upon, and nothing upon the subject was inserted in the Treaty signed at that place.

At London, in 1818, the negotiations upon this point were renewed; and the British Government, for the first time, uncovered the ground upon which its pretensions rested. Its plenipotentiaries, Mr. Robinson and Mr. Goulbourn, asserted, (to give them the benefit of their own words, as reported by Messrs. Gallatin and Rush,) "That former voyages, and principally that of Captain Cook, gave to Great Britain the rights derived from discovery, and they alluded to purchases from the natives south of the river Columbia, which they alleged to have been made prior to the American Revolution. They did not make any formal proposition for a boundary, but intimated that the river itself was the most convenient that could be adopted, and that they would not agree to any which did not give them the harbor at the mouth of the river in common with the United States."—Letter from Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, October 20, 1820.

To this the American Plenipotentiaries answered, in a way better calculated to encourage than to repulse the groundless pretensions of Great Britain. "We did not assert, (continue these gentlemen, in the same letter,) we did not assert that the United States had a perfect right to that country, but insisted that their claim was at least good against Great Britain. We did not know, with precision, what value our Government set on the country to the westward of these mountains; but we were not authorized to enter into any agreement which should be tantamount to an abandonment of the claim to it. It was at last agreed, but, as we thought, with some reluctance on the part of the British Plenipotentiaries, that the country on the Northwest Coast, claimed by either party, should, without prejudice to the claims of either, and for a limited time, be opened for the purposes of trade, to the inhabitants of both countries."

The substance of this agreement was inserted in the convention of October, 1818. It constitutes the third article of that Treaty, and is the same upon which the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. DICKERSON) relies, for excluding the United States from the occupation of the Columbia.

In subsequent negotiations, the British Agents further rested their claim upon the discoveries of McKenzie, in 1793, the seizure of Astoria, during the late war, and the Nootka Sound Treaty of 1790.

Such an exhibition of title, said Mr. B., is ridiculous, and would be contemptible in the hands of any other power than that of Great Britain. Of the five grounds of claim which she has set up, not one of them is tenable against the slightest examination. Cook never saw, much less took possession of, any part of the Northwest coast of America, in the latitude of the Columbia River. All his discoveries were far north of that point, and not one of them was followed up by possession, without which, the fact of discovery would confer no title. The Indians were not even named, from whom the purchases are stated to have been made anterior to the Revolutionary War. Not a single particular is given which could identify a transaction of the kind. The only circumstance mentioned applies to the locality of the Indians supposed to have made the sale, and that circumstance invalidates the whole claim. They are said to have resided to the "South" of the Columbia; by consequence they did not reside upon it, and could have no right to sell a country of which they were not the possessors.

McKenzie was sent out from Canada in the year 1793, to discover, at its head, the river which Captain Gray had discovered at its mouth, three years before. But McKenzie missed the object of his search, and struck the Pacific five hundred miles to the north, as I have already stated. The seizure of Astoria, during the war, was an operation of arms, conferring no more title upon Great Britain to the Columbia, than the capture of Castine and Detroit gave her to Maine and Michigan. This new ground of claim was set up by Mr. Bagot, his Britannic Majesty's Ambassador to this Republic, in 1817, and set up in a way to contradict and relinquish all their other pretended titles. Mr. Bagot was remonstrating against the occupation, by the United States, of the Columbia River, and reciting that it had been taken possession of, in his Majesty's name, during the late war, "and had since been considered as forming a part of his Majesty's dominions." The word "since," is exclusive of all previous pretension, and the Ghent Treaty, which stipulates for the restoration of all the captured posts, is a complete extinguisher to this idle pretension. Finally, the British negotiators have been driven to take shelter under the Nootka Sound Treaty of 1790. The character of that treaty was well understood at the time that it was made, and its terms will speak for themselves at the present day. It was a treaty of concession, and not of acquisition of rights, on the part of Great Britain. It was so characterized by the opposition, and so admitted to be by the ministry, at the time of its communication to the British Parliament.

[Here Mr. B. read passages from the speeches of Mr. Fox and Mr. Pitt, to prove the character of this treaty.]

"Mr. Fox said, What, then, was the extent of our rights before the convention—(whether admitted or denied by Spain was of no consequence)—and to what extent were they now secured to us? We possessed and exercised the free navigation of the Pacific Ocean, without restraint or limitation. We possessed and exercised the right of carrying on fisheries in the South Seas equally unlimited. This was no barren right, but a right of which we had availed ourselves, as appeared by the papers on the table, which showed that the produce of it had increased, in five years, from twelve to ninety-seven thousand pounds sterling. This estate we had, and were daily improving; it was not to be disgraced by the name of an acquisition. The admission of part of these rights, by Spain, was all we had obtained. Our right, before, was to settle in any part of the South or Northwest Coast of America, not fortified against us by previous occupancy, and we were now restricted to settle in certain places only, and under certain restrictions. This was an important concession on our part. Our rights of fishing extended to the whole ocean, and now it, too, was limited, and to be carried on within certain distances of the Spanish settlements. Our right of making settlements was not, as now, a right to build huts, but to plant colonies, if we thought proper. Surely these were not acquisitions, or rather conquests, as they must be considered, if we were to judge by the triumphant language respecting them, but great and important concessions." "By the third article, we are authorized to navigate the Pacific Ocean and South Seas, unmolested, for the purpose of carrying on our fisheries, and to land on the unsettled coasts, for the purpose of trading with the natives; but, after this pompous recognition of right to navigation, fishery, and commerce, comes another article, the sixth, which takes away the right of landing, and erecting even temporary huts, for any purpose but that of carrying on the fishery, and amounts to a complete dereliction of all right to settle in any way for the purpose of commerce with the natives."

—British Parliamentary History, Vol. 28, p. 990.

Mr. Pitt, in reply. "Having finished that part of Mr. Fox's speech which referred to the reparation, Mr. Pitt proceeded to the next point, namely, that gentleman's argument to prove, that the other articles of the convention were mere concessions, and not acquisitions. In answer to this, Mr. Pitt maintained, that, though what this country had gained consisted not of new rights, it certainly did of new advantages. We had, before, a right to the Southern whale fishery, and a right to navigate and carry on fisheries in the Pacific Ocean, and to trade on the coasts of any part of Northwest America; but that right not only had not been acknowledged, but disputed and resisted; whereas, by the convention, it was secured to us—a circumstance which, though no new right, was a new advantage."—Same—page 1002.

But, continued Mr. BENTON, we need not take the character of the treaty even from the high authority of these rival leaders in the British Parliament. The treaty will speak for itself. I have it in my hand, and will read the article relied upon to sustain the British claim to the Columbia River:

Article 3d, of the Nootka Sound Treaty.

"In order to strengthen the bonds of friendship, and to preserve, in future, a perfect harmony and good understanding between the two contracting parties, it is agreed that their respective subjects shall not be disturbed or molested, either in navigating or carrying on their fisheries in the Pacific Ocean, or in the South Seas, or in landing on the coasts of those seas in places not already occupied, for the purpose of carrying on their commerce with the natives of the country, or of making settlements there, the whole subject, nevertheless, to the restrictions and provisions specified in the three following articles."

The particular clause of this article, relied upon by the advocates for the British claim, is that which gives the right of landing on parts of the Northwest Coast, not already occupied, for the purpose of carrying on commerce, and making settlements. The first inquiry arising upon this clause is, whether the coast, in the latitude of the Columbia River, was unoccupied at the date of the Nootka Sound Treaty? The answer is in the affirmative. The second is, whether the English landed upon this coast while it was so unoccupied? The answer is in the negative; and this answer puts an end to all pretension of British claim founded upon this treaty, without leaving us under the necessity of recurring to the fact that the permission to land, and to make settlements, so far from contemplating an acquisition of territory, was limited, by subsequent restrictions, to the erection of temporary huts for the personal accommodation of fishermen and traders only.

The truth is, Mr. President, continued Mr. B., Great Britain has no color of title to the country in question. She sets up none. There is not a paper upon the face of the earth in which a British Minister has stated a claim. I speak of the King's Ministers, and not of the Agents employed by them. The claims we have been examining are thrown out in the conversations and notes of Diplomatic Agents. No English Minister has ever put his name to them, and no one will ever risk his character as a statesman by venturing to do so. The claim of Great Britain is nothing but a naked pretension, founded in the double prospect of benefiting herself, and injuring the United States. The fur trader, Sir Alexander McKenzie, is at the bottom of this policy. Failing in his attempt to explore the Columbia River, in 1798, he nevertheless urged upon the British Government the advantages of taking it to herself, and of expelling the Americans from the whole region west of the Rocky Mountains. The advice accorded too well with the passions and policy of that Government, to be disregarded. It is a Government which has lost no opportunity, since the peace of '83, of aggrandizing itself at the expense of the United States. It is a Government which listens to the suggestions of its experienced subjects, and thus an individual, in the humble station of a fur trader, has pointed out the policy which has been pursued by every Minister of Great Britain, from Pitt to Canning, and for the maintenance of which a war is now menaced.

[Here Mr. B. read the following passages from Sir Alexander McKenzie's History of the Fur Trade.]

"The Russians, who first discovered that, along the coasts of Asia, no useful or regular navigation existed, opened an interior communication by rivers, &c., and through that long and wide extended continent, to the strait that separates Asia from America, over which they passed to the American continent. Our situation is, at length, in some degree, similar to theirs: the non-existence of a practicable passage by sea, and the existence of one through the continent, are clearly proved, and it requires only the countenance and support of the British Government to increase, in a very ample proportion, this national advantage, and secure the trade of that country to its subjects." "By the rivers that discharge themselves into Hudson's Bay, at Port Nelson, it is proposed to carry on the trade to their source, at the head of the Saskatchewan River, which rises in the Rocky Mountains, not eight degrees of longitude from the Pacific Ocean. The Columbia flows from the same mountains, and discharges itself into the Pacific in north latitude  $48^{\circ} 20'$ . Both of them are capable of receiving ships at their mouths, and are navigable throughout for boats." "But whatever course may be taken from the Atlantic, the Columbia is the line of communication from the Pacific Ocean, pointed out by nature, as it is the only navigable river in the whole extent of Vancouver's minute survey of that coast; its banks, also, form the first level country in all the southern extent of continental coast from Cook's Entry; and, consequently, the most northern situation, suitable to the residence of a civilized people. By opening this intercourse between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and forming regular establishments through the interior, and at both extremes, as well as along the coast and islands, the entire command of the fur trade of North America might be obtained, from latitude  $48^{\circ}$  to the pole, except that portion of it which the Russians have in the Pacific. To this may be added, the fishing in both seas, and the market of the four quarters of the globe. Such would be the field for commercial enterprise, and incalculable would be the produce of it, when supported by the operations of that credit and capital which Great Britain so pre-eminently possesses. Then would this country begin to be remunerated for the expense it has sustained in discovering and surveying the coast of the Pacific Ocean, which is at present left to American adventurers, who, without regularity or capital, or the desire of conciliating future confidence, look altogether to the interests of the moment. Such adventurers, and many of them, as I have been informed, have been very successful, would instantly disappear from before a well-regulated trade."—"Many political reasons, which it is not necessary here to enumerate, must present themselves to the mind of every man acquainted with the enlarged system and capacities of British commerce, in support of the measures which I have briefly suggested, as promising the most important advantages to the trade of the United Kingdom."

For a boundary line between the United States and Great Britain, west of the Mississippi, McKenzie proposes the latitude of 45 degrees, because that latitude is necessary to give the Columbia River to Great Britain. His words are: "Let the line begin where it may on the Mississippi, it must be continued west, till it terminates in the Pacific Ocean, to the south of the Columbia."

Mr. B. said, it was curious to observe with what closeness every suggestion of McKenzie had been followed up by the British Government. He recommended that the Hudson Bay and Northwest Company should be united; and they have been united. He proposed to extend the fur trade of Canada to the shore of the Pacific Ocean; and it has been so extended. He proposed that a chain of trading posts should be formed through the continent, from sea to sea; and it has been formed. He recommended that no boundary line should be agreed upon with the United States, which did not give the Columbia River to the British; and the British ministry declare that none other shall be formed. He proposed to obtain the command of the fur trade from latitude 45 degrees North; and they have it even to the Mandan Villages, and the neighborhood of the Council Bluffs. He recommended the expulsion of American traders from the whole region west of the Rocky Mountains; and they are expelled from it. He proposed to command the commerce of the Pacific Ocean; and it will be commanded the moment a British fleet takes position in the mouth of the Columbia. Besides these specified advantages, McKenzie alludes to other "political considerations," which it was not necessary for him to particularize. Doubtless it was not. They were sufficiently understood. They are the same which induced the retention of the Northwestern posts, in violation of the treaty of 1783; the same which induced the acquisition of Gibraltar, the Cape of Good Hope, the islands of Ceylon and Madagascar; the same which make Great Britain covet the possession of every commanding position in the four quarters of the globe.

Mr. B. here adverted to the inconsistency, on the part of Great Britain, of following the 49th parallel to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, and refusing to follow it any further. He affirmed that the principle which would make that parallel a boundary to the top of the mountain, would carry it out to the Pacific Ocean. He proved this assertion by recurring to the origin of that line. It grew out of the Treaty of Utrecht, that treaty which, in 1704, put an end to the wars of Queen Anne and Louis the 14th, and fixed the boundaries of their respective dominions in North America. The tenth article of that treaty was applicable to Louisiana and to Canada. It provided that commissioners should be appointed by the two powers to adjust the boundary between them. The commissioners were appointed, and did fix it. The parallel of 49 degrees was fixed upon as the common boundary, from the Lake of the Woods, "indefinitely to the West." This boundary was acquiesced in for a hundred years. By proposing to follow it to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, the British Government admits its validity; by refusing to follow it out, they became obnoxious to the charge of inconsistency, and betray a determination to encroach upon the territory of the United States, for the undisguised purpose of selfish aggrandizement.

Mr. B. would not argue the title of the United States to the same country. He would barely state it, and affirm that it was consecrated by every requisite which gives validity to the claims of nations. It rested upon,

1. Discovery of the Columbia River, by Capt. Gray, in 1790.
2. Purchase of Louisiana in 1803.
3. Discovery of the Columbia, from its head to its mouth, by Lewis and Clarke, in 1805.
4. Settlement at Astoria in 1811.
5. Treaty with Spain of 1819.

By these several titles the United States have collected into her own hands all the rights conferred by first discovery and first settlement, reinforced by all the claims of France and Spain.

The discovery of the Columbia, from the sea, in 1790, was the act of an American citizen. Captain Gray, of Boston, sailing under the flag of the United States, was the first navigator that ever saw or entered that river. He took possession of it in the name of his country, bestowed upon it a name which is national in the United States, which has been recognized by all the powers of Europe, and which, in itself, constitutes a badge of our ownership. The purchase of Louisiana gave us all the rights of Spain west of the Mississippi. If it is objected that Louisiana cannot be pushed to the Pacific Ocean, it may be answered that she may be pushed at least as far as Canada can be. The British push their Canadian title indefinitely to the west; Louisiana can go as far. No American statesman would rest a title to the Northwest Coast upon the naked purchase of Louisiana; but he would present it as a set-off to any British claim founded upon the protrusion of Canada into the valley of the Columbia. The discoveries of Lewis and Clarke were strictly national. They were officers in the service of the United States. They wore its commission, bore its flag, marched at the head of its soldiers, and did all their acts in the name of their country. They followed the Columbia from its source to its mouth, established friendly relations with numerous Indian tribes, took formal possession of the whole country, and bestowed American names, badges of sovereignty, upon every considerable stream and mountain. In 1811, a body of American citizens, sixty or eighty in number, crossed the continent from St. Louis to the mouth of the Columbia, met another party which had come round by sea, and founded the establishment of Astoria. By this act the title of the United States was consummated. Possession, without which discovery would confer no absolute right, now completed her title; and this settlement, as an American post, was attacked and captured by the arms of Great Britain during the late war. Finally, the treaty of 1819, with Spain, by which we acquired all her rights north of 49 degrees, invested the United States with all the claims which that power possessed to the Northwest Coast. Mr. B. would not consume the time of the Senate in tracing the titles of Spain. They were universally known to have been valid against Russia to latitude 58, and against England, throughout its whole extent.

Having disposed of the questions of title, Mr. B. took up the next point of inquiry, that of possession.

On this point he took four positions.

1. That the United States had the right of possession.
2. That Great Britain had the actual possession.
3. That she resists the possession of the United States.
4. That, after the year 1828, the party in possession will have the right of possession until the question of title shall be decided by arms or negotiation.

1. On the first point, the right of possession on the part of the United States, Mr. B. should not have thought it necessary to say any thing to an American Senate, had it not been for the extraordinary position assumed by the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. DICKERSON.) That gentleman maintains that the United States have no right to the possession of this country, and has quoted the third article of the London Convention of 1818, to sustain that idea. On the contrary, I maintain that we have a right to the possession, first, as the true owners of the country; secondly, as entitled to restitution under the first article of the Ghent treaty; thirdly, as having a mutual right of entry with the British for ten years, under the London convention above quoted. The third article of this convention stipulates that any country claimed by either party, to the west of the Rocky Mountains, shall be "free and open to the citizens and subjects" of the two powers, for the period of ten years from its signature. Yet, by a strange process of reasoning, the Senator from New Jersey construes this mutual right of entry, expressly secured to the "citizens" and "subjects" of the "two" powers, as an exclusive privilege granted to one, and that one not his own country, but the "subjects" of his Britannic Majesty. But I will confront that gentleman with authority upon this subject—the authority of a British minister, which will probably have more weight with him than the argument of an American Senator. Lord Cas-tlereagh himself, at the time of negotiating that treaty, admitted our right to the possession. Mr. Rush, in his letter to Mr. Adams, of Feb. 1818, says: "It is proper, at this stage, to say, that Lord Castlereagh admitted, in the most ample extent, our right to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession while treating of the title."

2. That Great Britain now has the possession, is a fact of historical notoriety. The settlement of Astoria, founded by American citizens, and named after an American, has been retained ever since the war, converted into a military post, and its name changed into the royal British appellation of Fort George. There, British cannon are mounted, the British flag flies, and the medals of George the Fourth are distributed to the chiefs and warriors of the surrounding tribes. Five other posts are established at proper distances between the sea and the mountains, so as to form a complete chain, from sea to sea, along the course of the Columbia, to Saskatchiwine and the St. Lawrence. A cord of posts, three thousand miles in length, is stretched along our flank, for a purpose which every citizen, and every Indian of the West, well understands, and to counteract which no effort is made by the American Government. The Columbia River is suffered to be occupied, in its whole extent, by British arms. The mock ceremony of delivering Astoria to Mr. Prevost, in 1818, deceives nobody. The facts are, that a British sloop-of-war touched at Lima, in the fall of 1818, took up Mr. Prevost, carried him to Astoria, (Fort George,) on the 1st day of October, and brought him away on the 6th. While there, Mr. Prevost, under the authority of the American Government, signed a receipt for the delivery of Fort George, and accepted a remonstrance from the British against the delivery, "until the final decision of the right of sovereignty between the two Governments." The possession of the port was not changed, nor intended to be changed, by any act done by Mr. Prevost. He could not man the fort himself, and had neither soldier nor sailor to do it for him. The ceremony of lowering the British flag, and of hoisting the American, was a piece of form, arranged beforehand, for the purpose of satisfying the words of the Ghent treaty, by a nominal restitution, while the post itself remained with the English, in the same manner as if Mr. Prevost had remained at Lima. No attempt has since been made by the American Government to realize the possession, and Fort George, with the whole country drained by the Columbia, remains to this day in the hands of the British. The mouth of that river has become a frequented post in their hands. All the goods for the region west of the Rocky Mountains, are imported there, free of duty; and all the furs taken in that extensive country, including the Rocky Mountains, are thence exported to the great fur markets of China and Japan.

3. That Great Britain resists the possession of the United States, is a fact of which our public documents furnish the proof.

As early as July, 1815, the Government of the United States turned its attention to the re-occupation of the Columbia. Claiming its restitution under the first article of the Ghent treaty, the Secretary of State, Mr. Monroe, conforming to the usages of civilized nations, requested from the British Chargé des Affaires, at Washington, Mr. Baker, a letter of instructions for the delivery. Mr. Baker declined to give the letter, upon the ground that he had no orders from his Government to do so. In 1817, the British Ambassador, Mr. Bagot, made it a subject of complaint and remonstrance that the Government of the United States should propose to re-occupy that country, and treated the proposition as an invasion of the rights and interest of his Britannic Majesty. He denied our right to be restored under the terms of the Ghent treaty, taking a distinction, where there existed no difference, between the case of a post captured by a superior force, and of a post evacuated by an inferior force, at the approach of a superior one. The latter of these cases he alleged to be that of Astoria.

In 1821, when the occupation of the Columbia was first presented to the consideration of Congress, the British Minister at Washington, Mr. Canning, twice called upon the Secretary of State, Mr. Adams, with a view to arrest the progress of that measure. He went so far as to say, that such occupation would conflict with his Majesty's claims in that quarter. Contemporaneously with this interference and threat, was the appearance of numerous essays in the National Intelligencer, evidently from the pens of persons in the employment of England and Russia, attacking and ridiculing all the claims of the United States to the Northwest Coast of America. The essays of anonymous newspaper writers might be deemed unworthy of notice in this chamber, but they derive importance from the fact of the repetition of their contents in the halls of Congress. Yes, Mr. President, these essays have become a magazine, from which gentlemen borrow arms for attacking the rights and interests of their own country; nor is there a weapon of argument or ridicule which has been employed throughout this debate, which cannot be traced to that source.

4. That the party in possession, in the year 1828, will have the right of possession until the question of title shall be decided by arms or negotiation, is a consequence resulting from the terms of the third article of the London Convention of 1818. [Here Mr. B. read the article, and continued.] It is a vulgar error, Mr. President, to suppose that, by this convention, the United States granted to British subjects the rights of trade and passage upon the Columbia River, for the period of ten years. It would be just as correct to say, that Great Britain grants the same privileges to the United States for the same period. The fact is, that neither grants a privilege, and neither accepts one. The title of each is placed upon a footing of perfect equality. Each has the right of trade and entry, by virtue of his own claim to sovereignty; each agrees to tolerate the trade and entry of the other for ten years. Neither surrenders any part of his claim, and the treaty is not to be construed to the disadvantage of the title of either. It results from these stipulations, that the party in possession at the expiration of the ten years, will have the right of possession until the question of title shall be decided. It requires no Vattel to tell us this. The principle is the same in national and municipal law. When the title is disputed, the party in possession of the disputed property, has a right to hold it until the question of title shall be decided—by a court of justice, when the dispute is between individuals; by arms, or negotiations, when it is between nations. In the case before the Senate, the United States have a right of possession as the true owners of the country; another right under the Ghent treaty; and a further right of entry, under the terms of this convention. But the last right is a limited privilege, which has but two and a half years to run. If it is suffered to expire, it will require no spirit of divination to foresee the result. All right of entry or possession will then be denied. Our right as owners will be said to be limited in the convention, which had expired; our right under the Ghent treaty will be said to have been satisfied by the idle ceremony, rather worse than useless, in which Mr. Prevost was an actor; and having the possession of the river, a fleet in its mouth, batteries upon its shores, a line of posts to Canada, and the command of 140,000 Indians, Great Britain may safely take the attitude of defiance, and trust to her arms for the defence of her position. That she will have the disposition to do so, can be doubted by no one who has observed the course of her policy with respect to this river, the increasing boldness of her pretensions, and the "reluctance" with which she agreed to such a modification of the third article of the Convention of 1818, as would leave that country open, "for a limited time," to the citizens of the United States, as well as to the subjects of Great Britain.—Letter of Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, Oct. 20, 1818.

Mr. B. now took up the bill, and complained of the unfair manner in which it had been opposed. He called it unfair, because gentlemen had stated it to be what it was not, and then made war upon the phantoms of their own imaginations. The bill proposed nothing more than the military occupation of the country, in execution of the Ghent treaty. It proposed to put money and troops at the disposition of the President, to enable him to receive the country, and to retain it. The President was bound to execute the treaties of the Union, and he could not go in person, like Mr. John Baptist Prevost, to receive the possession of the Oregon with his own naked hands. Yet gentlemen had represented the bill as a proposition to found a colony, and to establish a territory, and then launched forth into all the commonplace declamation against colonies and territories. Mr. B. would not follow them into that field of idle debate; he would stick to the proposition contained in the bill. He would call for the complete execution of the Ghent treaty. He would demand if that part alone which was made for the benefit of the West, was to remain forever without execution? If a second edition of the retention of the Northwestern posts was to be struck off for the benefit of the Western people? A peculiar fatality seemed to attend upon the execution of the treaties made for the benefit of the West. In 1788, Great Britain stipulated, among other things, to surrender the posts of Niagara, Detroit, and Mackinaw; yet she retained them for thirteen years, in violation of that treaty, and for the avowed purpose of monopolizing the fur trade, and retaining the command of the Northwestern Indians. Two Indian wars, and the desolation of the frontiers of Kentucky and Ohio, were the fruits of that perfidious policy. At length we have another treaty, stipulating, among other things, for the surrender of another Western post; and already ten years have elapsed, and the post is not surrendered! The cause of retention is the same—the fur trade and the Indians; the fruits will be the same—fresh wars with the Indians, and the desolation of the frontiers of Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas.

But gentlemen have put some questions, which I feel myself bound to answer. They have asked, What are to be the advantages of this occupation? What the effect upon this Union? What its effect upon the Asiatic powers?

I answer, the advantages will be—

1. In securing to us the fur trade of the Rocky Mountains, the Upper Missouri, and the Columbia, worth, peradventure, a million of dollars per annum, for a century to come.

2. In preventing the British and Russians from acquiring the control of the Indians on the waters of the Columbia. These Indians are estimated at 140,000 souls, possess the finest horses, and are among the best horsemen in the world. The present age has seen the Cossacks of the Don and Ukraine, ravaging the banks of the Seine and the Loire; the next may see the Cossacks of the Oregon issuing in clouds from the gorges of the Rocky Mountains, and sweeping, with the besom of desolation, the banks of the Missouri and Mississippi.

3. In giving us a naval station on the coast of the Pacific. The want of such a station was fully exemplified in the cruise of Commodore Porter, during the late war. In that cruise, we had the extraordinary spectacle of a naval commander traversing, for three years, a sea infested with enemies, sometimes burning his prizes on the ocean, sometimes hiding them in distant islands, sometimes seeking the enemy, and sometimes flying from a superior force, and at last sustaining a murderous attack, and losing his ship, in a neutral port. The loss sustained on that occasion, in prizes and a frigate, (to say nothing of lives, above all price,) was fifty or a hundred times the amount of appropriation in this bill. And this loss we must expect to undergo, in all subsequent wars, unless we provide a post of our own in the Pacific Ocean. But it is not ships of war alone, and their prizes, which we are to lose for want of such a post. Our merchant vessels need the same accommodation both in peace and war. The numerous vessels engaged in the whale fishery, in the commerce of the Northwest Coast with the Islands of the Pacific Ocean, and even with China and Japan, demand this accommodation; and not a government upon earth, save that of these United States, would hesitate to grant it. To gain a post in the same sea, Russia has endeavored to open a harbor in the frozen region of Kamtschatka, and among the sand-banks of Okotaky. To gain this very Columbia, England is resorting to every trick of diplomacy, to the violation of treaties, and to the audacity of menacing war; yet the Congress of the United States hesitates, delays to take possession of its own, and endangers its title by neglecting to enforce it. In their blind and contradictory opposition, some gentlemen represent the mouth of the Columbia as unfit for the purposes of a naval station; but the report of Mr. Prevost, and the anxiety of the British to obtain it, are conclusive refutations of such objections. Mr. Prevost says:—

Occupation of the Oregon River.

"The bay is spacious, contains several anchoring places in a sufficient depth of water, and is by no means so difficult of ingress as has been represented. Those enjoying the exclusive commerce have probably cherished an impression so favorable to its continuance, growing out of the incomplete survey of Lieut. Broughton, made under the orders of Vancouver, in 1792. It is true, that there is a bar extending across the river, at either extremity of which are, at times, appalling breakers; but it is equally true, that it offers, at the lowest tides, a depth of twenty-one feet of water, [the tide rising eight feet twice in twenty-four hours,] throughout a passage, exempt from them, of nearly a league in width. The Blossom, carrying more guns than the Ontario, encountered a change of wind while in the channel, was compelled to let go the anchor, and when again weighed, to tack and beat, in order to reach the harbor, yet found a greater depth, and met with no difficulty either then or on leaving the bay. The survey marked C, may be relied on for its accuracy. The bearings, distances, and soundings, were taken by Captain Hickey, who was kind enough to lend himself to the examination, and to furnish me with this result. It is the more interesting, as it shows that, with the aid of buoys, the access to vessels of almost any tonnage may be rendered secure. In addition to this, it is susceptible of entire defence, because a ship, after passing the bar, in order to avoid the breaking of the sea on one of the banks, is obliged to bear up directly for the knoll forming the cape, at all times to approach within a short distance of its base, and most frequently then to anchor. Thus, a small battery erected on this point, in conjunction with the surges on the opposite side, would so endanger the approach as to deter an enemy, however hardy, from the attempt. This outlet, the only one between the 88th and 53d degrees of north latitude, embraces the entire range of country from the ocean to the mountains, and its interior unites the advantage of a water communication throughout, by means of the many streams tributary to the Columbia, two of which disembody opposite to each other within twenty-five leagues of the port, are navigable, and nearly of equal magnitude with this beautiful river."

4. In opening a communication between the Valley of the Mississippi and the Pacific Ocean.

This was the object of Mr. Jefferson in sending out Lewis and Clarke to explore the line of the Missouri and Columbia Rivers. That great man, always intent upon benefiting the human race, had conceived the grand idea of a commercial intercourse with India upon this line of communication. But Lewis and Clarke were explorers, without guides, and often fell on the most difficult and circuitous routes. Subsequent adventurers have been more successful. In passing the Ridge of the Rocky Mountains, Lewis and Clarke wandered 1,200 or 1,300 miles, over rocks, precipices, and mountains, in getting from the Falls of Missouri to the Forks of Clarke's River; points which are only 150 miles apart, and between which there is a well-beaten Indian and Buffalo road, over good ground, and through a country abounding with grass, game, and horses. In fact, there is no difficulty in any part of the route. The furs taken in the Rocky Mountains will descend the Columbia to the Pacific Ocean, and thence cross the sea to China. The same vessel can bring a return cargo of East India goods, and can ascend the Columbia to the head of tide water, 188 miles. The Great Falls can be passed by a portage of 400 yards on the left bank, and 1,200 on the right; but, during the periodical floods, in the months of April, May, and June, they can be passed without any portage at all. Vessels may be lifted over the fall by a vast lock, neither made nor filled by the hands of man. Mr. B. explained this phenomenon—one of the most grand and striking in the works of nature. The Great Falls had a pitch of thirty-eight feet perpendicular. Immediately below, the river spread out into a basin of three miles diameter. The river issued from this basin through a channel narrower than that by which it entered. The consequence was, that, in every annual flood, the basin filled up; the reflux current rolled back upon the fall, buried it, and presented four feet of smooth water, where, in the absence of the flood, there was a pitch of thirty-eight. The passage through the mountains was free from difficulty. For eight months in the year, snow and sleighs could be relied upon. From the foot of the mountains issued the Missouri River, navigable, without the slightest obstruction, to its junction with the Mississippi, two thousand five hundred and seventy-five measured miles. Mr. B. then adverted to two circumstances, which would facilitate the introduction of East India goods upon the line of the Columbia and Missouri Rivers: first, the goods to be introduced were of little weight, small bulk, and great value; secondly, the river to be ascended was short, the one to be descended was long: and he expressed the most confident belief, that, within one year after the occupation of the Columbia, the rich productions of the East Indies would flow into the valley of the Mississippi, upon this new and truly national route.

MARCH, 1825.]

5. But the greatest of all advantages to be derived from the occupation of this country, is in the exclusion of foreign powers from it. It is a country too great and too desirable, to remain longer without civilized inhabitants. In extent, soil, and climate, it is superior to the old thirteen United States. In 1804, it was written by Humboldt, "that the banks of the Columbia invite Europeans to found a fine colony there, for its banks afford fertile land in abundance, covered with superb timber." In 1805 Russia attempted to colonize it; but the ship destined for that purpose, and carrying the Emperor's chamberlain, and ambassador to Japan and China, the Count Resanoff, missed the mouth of the river, went down upon the coast of California, and there commenced a settlement. England now has her iron grasp upon it, and it will require a vigorous effort of policy, and perhaps of arms, to break her hold. Even if foreign powers had no desire to aggrandize themselves with this possession, mere adventurers might enter upon it, as Eneas entered upon the Tyber, and as our forefathers came upon the Potomac, the Delaware, and the Hudson, and renew the phenomenon of mere individuals laying the foundation of a future empire. In the mean time, our President has proclaimed the principle, and the whole nation has responded to it, that no part of this continent is open to European colonization; but what signifies the proclamation of a just and noble principle, unless it is supported by money and arms? When have the rights of nations been respected, merely because they were just? When has an individual, or a sovereign power, gained respect or justice for itself, by a pusillanimous desertion of their own rights?

Within a century from this day, a population, greater than that of the present United States, will exist on the west side of the Rocky Mountains. I do not deal in paradoxes, but in propositions as easily demonstrated as the problems in Euclid. Here, then, is the demonstration: Dividing our portion of this continent into five equal parts, and there will be found, in the valley of the Mississippi, three parts; on the east side of the Alleghany Mountains one part, on the west of the Rocky Mountains one part. Population will distribute itself accordingly; three parts in the valley, and one part on each of the appurtenant slopes. Within a century, the population of the whole will be one hundred and sixty millions; of which a hundred millions will drink the waters which flow into the Mississippi, and sixty millions will be found upon the lateral streams which flow, east and west, towards the rising and the setting sun. The calculation is reducible to mathematical precision. We double our numbers once in twenty-five years, and must continue to do so until the action of the prolific principle in man shall be checked by the same cause which checks it in every race of animals—the stint of food. This cannot happen with us until every acre of our generous soil shall be put in requisition; until the product of more than a thousand millions of acres shall be insufficient to fill the mouths which feed upon them. This will require more people than a century can produce, even at the rate of doubling once in twenty-five years; a rate which will give us one hundred and sixty millions in the year 1920: that is to say, twenty millions more than the Roman Empire contained in the time of Augustus Cæsar. A century is but a point in the age of a nation. The life of an individual often spans it; and many are the children now born, who will see the year 1920, and the accomplishment of the great events which their nurses believe to be impossible.

Upon the people of Eastern Asia, the establishment of a civilized power upon the opposite coast of America, could not fail to produce great and wonderful benefits. Science, liberal principles in government, and the true religion, might cast their lights across the intervening sea. The valley of the Columbia might become the granary of China and Japan, and an outlet to their imprisoned and exuberant population. The inhabitants of the oldest and the newest, the most despotic and the freest Governments, would become the neighbors, and, peradventure, the friends of each other. They have the same enemies, and by consequence, should stand together as friends. Russia and the legimates menace Turkey, Persia, China, and Japan; they menace them for their riches and dominions; the same powers menace the two Americas for the popular forms of their governments. To my mind the proposition is clear, that Eastern Asia, and the two Americas, as they have become neighbors, should become friends; that they should stand together upon a sense of common danger; and I, for one, said Mr. B., had as lief see American ambassadors going to the Emperors of China and Japan, to the King of Persia, and even to the Grand Turk, as to see them dancing attendance upon those European legimates, who hold every thing American in contempt and detestation.

Mr. B. concluded with saying, that these were speculations of his own, shooting far ahead of the proposition under debate. The proposition is to execute the Ghent treaty, to expel the British from the Columbia River, to perfect our title, by reducing the disputed territory to possession; and, whatever use we may make of it afterwards, whether we shall hold it as a military post and naval station, settle it as a colony, or found a new Republic upon it, there were certain preliminary points on which Mr. B. believed that both the Senate and the people of the United States would cordially agree, namely, neither to be tricked nor bullied out of their land, nor to suffer a monarchical power to grow up upon it.

[In the course of Mr. BENTON's speech, Mr. DICKERSON denied that he had acknowledged the right of the British Government to any part of the territory of Oregon.]

Mr. LOWRIE moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Branch, Brown, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of Alabama, Lanman, Lowrie, Macon, Parrott, Seymour, Smith, Tazewell, Van Buren, Van Dyke, and Williams—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Boulogny, Cobb, Hayne, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Mills, Noble, Ruggles, Talbot, and Thomas—14.

Reception of the President Elect.

Mr. MILLS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to make such arrangements as may be necessary for the reception of the President, on the occasion of his inauguration.

The resolution was read, and a committee appointed, consisting of the following gentlemen:

Messrs. MILLS, VAN BUREN, and EATON.

The Senate took up, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes.

A considerable time was spent in the discussion of the details of this bill, which was participated in by Messrs. HAYNE, HOLMES of Maine, COBB, CHANDLER, DICKERSON, VAN BUREN, BROWN, JOHNSON of Ken., and TALBOT.

On the question, "Shall the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time?" it was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Bell, Benton, Branch, Cobb, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Alabama, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, Mills, Noble, Parrott, Seymour, Smith, Tazewell, Thomas, Van Buren, and Williams—31.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Dickerson, Macon, Ruggles, and Talbot—6.

WEDNESDAY, March 2.

The committee appointed to make such arrangements as may be necessary for the reception of the President of the United States, on the occasion of his inauguration, reported, in part, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate inform the House of Representatives, that the President Elect of the United States, on Friday next, at 12 o'clock, will take the oath of office required by the constitution, in the chamber of the House of Representatives; and that he also inform the President Elect, that the Senate will be in session at that time."

THURSDAY, March 3.

The Senate having finished the business of the session, Mr. SMITH offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be presented to the Hon. JOHN GAILLARD, President of the Senate pro tempore, for the ability, impartiality, and integrity, he has evinced in discharging the arduous and important duties of his station.

Whereupon, Mr. GAILLARD rose, and delivered the following address:

Gentlemen: The standing of this Body in public estimation, and the character it has to sustain, can never fail to insure to your Presiding Officers an exemption from much of those difficulties and embarrassments that are sometimes to be encountered by those who are called upon to preside over deliberative assemblies; and the experience which I have had of your liberality, furnishes abundant proofs that they may always rely on your patient endurance and indulgent support. Actuated by an anxious desire to endeavor to meet your reasonable expectations, however I might fail in the attempt; and influenced, I trust, by no other considerations than such as would lead to a faithful and impartial discharge of the duties confided to me; the gratification I derive from this assurance of your satisfaction, is only to be surpassed by the profound respect and gratitude with which it is received. In the hope and expectation that most of us may again be assembled together at this place, under the same kind and friendly feelings which have heretofore prevailed within these walls; and with the prospect before us of soon being permitted to return to our homes, families, and friends, and the associations connected with objects so dear and so interesting; the pleasure arising from the termination of our session would have been without alloy—but for the recollection that we shall then have to separate, and, from the vicissitudes attendant on human life and human affairs, perhaps forever, from many valued associates, esteemed for their worth, respected for their virtues, endeared to us by long, social, and friendly intercourse, and who will, I am persuaded, carry with them to their retirement our respect, esteem, and regard.

I avail myself of this occasion to express to them and to all of you, gentlemen, in the utmost sincerity of heart, the high sense of gratitude which I feel for the many acts of kindness and of favor that you have bestowed on me: they have been such as can never be effaced from my memory, and they will ever be to me a source of proud and of grateful recollections. Accept, I pray you, individually, as well as collectively, an affectionate farewell, and my best wishes for your health, happiness, and prosperity.

EIGHTEENTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 6, 1824.

At 12 o'clock this day, the Speaker (Hon. HENRY CLAY, of Kentucky) took the chair; and the roll being called, one hundred and eighty members answered to their names; and a committee was appointed on the part of this House to join with such committee as should be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of both Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communication he may have to make to them.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Maryland, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Honorable the Speaker invite our distinguished guest and benefactor, General LAFAYETTE, to a seat within the Hall of this House, and that he direct the manner of his reception."

This resolution gave rise to some conversation as to what would be the most proper mode of expressing the respect felt by this House towards the illustrious individual referred to, which resulted in the adoption of the following resolution, which was proposed by Mr. A. STEVENSON, as a substitute for the other:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of this House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to consider and report what respectful mode it may be proper for Congress to adopt to receive General LAFAYETTE, and to testify the very high gratification which he has afforded it by his present visit to the United States, made in pursuance of the invitation given to him by Congress, during its last session."

The committee was appointed, to consist, on the part of the House, of thirteen members.

TUESDAY, December 7.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. EVERETT, and read at the clerk's table. (See Senate proceedings, p. 93.)

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Message, with the accompanying Documents, were referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and 8,000 copies were ordered to be printed.

WEDNESDAY, December 8.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, in the chair,) and distributed, by a number of distinct resolutions, the various parts of the President's Message to the proper committees.

The several select committees, established by these resolves, were ordered to consist of seven members each, with the exception of that in relation to a provision for General LAFAYETTE, which was ordered to consist of thirteen.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Joint Committee appointed to determine in what manner General LAFAYETTE shall be received by the two Houses of Congress, asked and obtained leave to report, and presented the following:

"The committee appointed on the part of this House, to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the Senate, to consider and report what respectful mode it may be proper for Congress to adopt to receive General LAFAYETTE, and to testify the very high gratification which he has afforded by his present visit to the United States, made in pursuance of the invitation given to him by Congress, during its last session, report:

"That they have met a committee of the Senate on that subject, and that the committees have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses that each House receive General LAFAYETTE in such manner as it shall deem most suitable to the occasion, and the committee recommend to the House the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the congratulations of this House be publicly given to General LAFAYETTE on his arrival in the United States, in compliance with the wishes of Congress, and that he be assured of the gratitude and deep respect which the House entertains for his signal and illustrious services in the Revolution, and the pleasure it feels in being able to welcome him, after an absence of so many years, to the theatre of his early labors and early renown.

"Resolved, That, for this purpose, General LAFAYETTE be invited by a committee to attend the House on Friday next, at one o'clock; that he be introduced by the committee, and received by the members standing, uncovered, and addressed by the Speaker, in behalf of the House, in pursuance of the foregoing resolution."

The resolutions were adopted unanimously, and so entered on record. The Committee of Invitation was appointed to consist of 24 members, on suggestion of Mr. STEVENSON.

FRIDAY, December 10.

Mr. CONDIOT, of New Jersey, moved that a messenger be sent to the Senate of the United States, inviting that body to attend in the Chamber of Representatives, at one o'clock, to-day, on the reception of General LAFAYETTE.

It was objected to the adoption of this motion, that the Senate had, yesterday, adjourned over to Monday. The question, however, was taken, and the motion passed in the affirmative—ayes 90, noes 69.

Seats were accordingly ordered for the members of the Senate, who shortly after entered, and took the places assigned them.

At one o'clock, according to previous arrangement, General LAFAYETTE appeared, attended by the committee of twenty-four members of the House of Representatives, and was introduced to the House by Mr. MITCHELL, chairman of the committee.

On the General's entry, the members and persons admitted on the floor of the House, rose, and remained standing, uncovered.

Mr. Speaker then rose, and, in behalf of the House, addressed the Nation's Guest in the following eloquent strain, adorned by those graces of oratory for which he is distinguished:

"GENERAL: The House of Representatives of the United States, impelled alike by its own feelings, and by those of the whole American People, could not have assigned to me a more gratifying duty than that of being its organ to present to you cordial congratulations upon the occasion of your recent arrival in the United States, in compliance with the wishes of Congress, and to assure you of the very high satisfaction which your presence affords on this early theatre of your glory and renown. Although but few of the members who compose this body, shared with you in the war of our Revolution, all have a knowledge, from impartial history, or from faithful tradition, of the perils, the sufferings, and the sacrifices, which you voluntarily encountered, and the signal services in America and in Europe, which you performed, for an infant, a distant, and an alien people; and all feel and own the very great extent of the obligations under which you have placed our country. But the relations in which you have ever stood to the United States, interesting and important as they have been, do not constitute the only motive of the respect and admiration which this House entertains for you. Your consistency of character, your uniform devotion to regulated liberty, in all the vicissitudes of a long and arduous life, also command its highest admiration. During all the recent convulsions of Europe, amidst, as after, the dispersion of every political storm, the people of the United States have ever beheld you true to your old principles, firm and erect, cheering and animating with your well-known voice, the votaries of Liberty, its faithful and fearless champion, ready to shed the last drop of that blood which, here, you so freely and nobly spilt in the same holy cause.

"The vain wish has been sometimes indulged, that Providence would allow the Patriot, after death, to return to his country, and to contemplate the intermediate changes which had taken place—to view the forests felled, the cities built, the mountains levelled, the canals cut, the highways constructed, the progress of the arts, the advancement of learning, and the increase of population. General, your present visit to the United States is the realization of the consoling object of that wish. You are in the midst of posterity! Everywhere you must have been struck with the great changes, physical and moral, which have occurred since you left us. Even this very city, bearing a venerated name, alike endeared to you and to us, has since emerged from the forest which then covered its site. In one respect, you behold us unaltered, and that is in the sentiment of continued devotion to liberty, and of ardent affection and profound gratitude to your departed friend, the Father of his country, and to your illustrious associates in the field and in the cabinet, for the multiplied blessings which surround us, and for the very privilege of, addressing you, which I now exercise. This sentiment, now fondly cherished by more than ten millions of people, will be transmitted, with unabated vigor, down the tide of time, through the countless millions who are destined to inhabit this continent, to their latest posterity."

To which address, General LAFAYETTE replied, in a tone in which energy of character, and sensibility of feeling, were most interestingly blended, to the following effect:

"Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

"While the People of the United States and their honorable Representatives in Congress have deigned to make choice of me, one of the American veterans, to signify in his person their esteem for our joint services, and their attachment to the principles for which we have had the honor to fight and bleed, I am proud and happy to share those extraordinary favors with my dear Revolutionary companions. Yet, it would be, on my part, uncandid and ungrateful not to acknowledge my personal share in those testimonies of kindness, as they excite in my breast emotions which no adequate words could express.

"My obligations to the United States, sir, far exceed any merit I might claim. They date from the time when I had the happiness to be adopted as a young soldier, a favored son of America. They have been continued to me during almost half a century of constant affection and confidence; and now, sir, thanks to your most gratifying invitation, I find myself greeted by a series of welcomes, one hour of which would more than compensate for the public exertions and sufferings of a whole life.

"The approbation of the American People, and their Representatives, for my conduct during the vicissitudes of the European Revolution, is the highest reward I could receive. Well may I stand 'firm and erect,' when, in their names, and by you, Mr. Speaker, I am declared to have, in every instance, been faithful to those American principles of liberty, equality, and true social order, the devotion to which, as it has been from my earliest youth, so it shall continue to be to my latest breath.

"You have been pleased, Mr. Speaker, to allude to the peculiar felicity of my situation, when, after so long an absence, I am called to witness the immense improvements, the admirable communications, the prodigious creations, of which we find an example in this city, whose name itself is a venerated Palladium; in a word, all the grandeur and prosperity of these happy United States, which, at the same time they nobly secure the complete assertion of American Independence, reflect on every part of the world the light of a far superior political civilization.

"What better pledge can be given of a persevering national love of liberty, when those blessings were evidently the result of a virtuous resistance to oppression, and of institutions founded on the rights of man and the Republican principle of self-government? No, Mr. Speaker, posterity has not begun for me—since, in the sons of my companions and friends, I find the same public feelings, and permit me to add, the same feelings in my behalf, which I have had the happiness to experience in their fathers.

"Sir, I have been allowed, forty years ago, before a Committee of a Congress of thirteen States, to express the fond wishes of an American heart. On this day I have the honor, and enjoy the delight, to congratulate the Representatives of the Union, so vastly enlarged, on the realization of those wishes, even beyond every human expectation, and upon the almost infinite prospects we can with certainty anticipate.

"Permit me, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, to join, to the expression of those sentiments, a tribute of my lively gratitude, affectionate devotion, and profound respect."

After the General and the members had resumed their seats, and a short pause occurred,

Mr. MITCHELL, the organ of the committee of reception, moved an adjournment.

The motion was agreed to, and the House was adjourned to Monday.

The Speaker then descended from the chair, and most affectionately saluted the General. His example was followed by the members of the House, individually, and some time was spent in this agreeable manner, before the General retired.

FRIDAY, December 17.

Niagara Sufferers.

Mr. TRACY moved to take up the bill authorizing payment for property lost or destroyed by the enemy during the late war; which was carried—ayes 91, noes 42.

The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole on that bill, (Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, in the chair.)

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said, that he considered the question presented by this bill to be of nearly as great importance as any that would occur during the present session of Congress; as proposing to revive the famous act of March, 1816, which had been the cause of greater drain from the Treasury of the United States than had ever been made, upon the same principle, from the Treasury of any civilized Government on earth; for no Government ever had a standing law of the nature of that. The bill now before the House, in effect proposed a renewal of the most important section (the 9th) of that law. At this moment, Mr. W. said he felt himself entirely unprepared to go into such an examination of this question as it might require. He, therefore, hoped the House would indulge him, and others similarly situated, with further time for consideration of the subject. His object was not unnecessarily to delay the consideration of the subject; but he thought it important to have before the House, and in possession of every member, the correspondence which took place between Admiral Cochrane and the Secretary of State relative to the burning of property on the Niagara frontier. There was another document, also, which he wished the House to be in possession of—a document originally brought here to carry these claims through the House, but which, since the year 1818, he had never been able to lay his hands upon. When these claims first appeared before the House, the claimants never pretended to rest them upon the ground that the buildings were occupied by the military authority at the time of their destruction. They then maintained that all these burnings took place on the ground of retaliation by the enemy; and believing that ground sufficient to sustain their claims, they produced all the proof of it that they could. But as the House had refused to allow the claims on that ground, they have now changed their position, and placed their claims on a different one. Mr. W. wished, for his part, to examine fully the pretext upon which a re-enactment of the pernicious law of 1816 was claimed; and with these views he wished the committee to rise, in order to have the papers printed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, said, he hoped that no delay would be interposed in bringing this subject before the House—but that they should be called to act upon it immediately; being persuaded that they were as fully prepared to do so now, as they would be at any future time. He expressed his astonishment that, of all the members of the House, the Chairman of the Committee of Claims should profess any want of information on this subject—since, from his official situation, as well as the able and conspicuous share he had had in former discussions on this matter, he should have supposed him to be better informed of every circumstance relating to it, than any other person. If permitted to proceed, Mr. C. said that he should contend that, on the ground first taken by the claimants, viz., that the injury their property had sustained was inflicted by the enemy as a measure of retaliation, their claim was just, inasmuch as it was in retaliation of injuries first inflicted on the enemy by the express order of this Government, through the late Secretary of War, in the burning of the village of Newark. On this ground, the claim was perfectly sustainable; as, also, it would be on the other ground, viz., that the injuries were sustained in consequence of the occupation or use of the property by the United States. If either ground were established, these claims ought to be allowed.

Mr. WILLIAMS renewed his motion that the committee rise: but once more suspended it, at the particular request of Mr. TRACY, who made some explanation in reply to what Mr. W. had said, as to the disappearance of the document he had referred to. No public paper on the subject had been withdrawn, but, on the contrary, all the papers connected with the general subject, had been printed with the report of the committee.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again; and on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the papers referred to whilst in Committee of the Whole, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. A. STEVENSON, of Virginia, rose to ask the attention of the House to a subject which was interesting to Virginia, and merited an early consideration. It related to the unsatisfied claims of that State, for advances of money made by her for the use of the General Government, during the late war. The subject, Mr. S. said, had been presented to Congress by the President, in a very strong message, at the last session; but owing to circumstances unnecessary to mention, had not been acted on. He wished it taken up, and finally disposed of. It was proper, however, that he should state to the House, that Virginia would press the payment only of that part of the claim which related to interest actually paid by her on moneys borrowed for the use of the General Government, and disbursed in its service. He stated this fact to prevent any misunderstanding as to the character of the claim, and the principles which it involved. Of its merits, Mr. S. said, he would not now speak. At a proper time, he would endeavor to show to the House that the claim asserted by Virginia was founded in justice and authority, and ought to be paid. This, however, he would say, that, whatever the conduct of other States in the Union might have been during the late war, there was not one who had been more steadfast and disinterested in her services than Virginia, or more loyal in the devotion of her resources to the general defence. She now only asked that her claims should be speedily adjusted upon fair and just principles. This was due as well to this Government as to Virginia, and with that view he begged leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for the reimbursement of the amount of interest paid by the State of Virginia, upon loans of money negotiated by her for the use of the General Government, during the late war between Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. SHARPE, of New York, moved to amend the resolution, so as to refer the subject to the Committee of Claims; which was carried—ayes 94, noes 68.

Thus amended, the resolution was agreed to.

Occupation of the Columbia River.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, with a view to take up the bill "for the occupation of the mouth of the Columbia (or Oregon) River;" which was agreed to, and the House went into committee accordingly, Mr. A. STEVENSON in the chair.

The bill was read by sections, and the several blanks were filled.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, so much, Mr. Chairman, has been said and written on this subject, that I will be as concise as possible, as I do not wish to consume the time of the committee. This subject has been so long before the House, that I presume the mind of every gentleman must be satisfied as to the propriety of the measure; I will, therefore, only present a few new ideas and additional facts which are in my possession, and my inferences from those facts, and content myself, with that defence of the measure, to leave the bill to its fate.

I know that it is an opinion much urged, and generally adopted, that we should keep our population as much condensed as possible; that there would be danger in erecting a territory at so great a distance, as protection would be difficult, if not impossible, and that there would be danger of separation; that, in all military operations, the frontier to be protected should be as small as the nature of the case would permit, and that well fortified.

In replying to all these objections, I would not wish to be understood as urging my own opinions. I will candidly state to the House, that, to me, it seems very doubtful, whether military posts and fortified places are at all necessary in a country situated as ours is. Notwithstanding these are my opinions, I am willing to grant any thing in reason which the administration of the country may think necessary to its defence. We often receive opinions from others, and from books, taking the subject up as presented by writers, rather than using them as the means of becoming acquainted with the matter, and, by our own mature reflection, apply them to the existing state of things. This I believe to be the case, as it regards our notions of military defences. It is indeed true, that, in the early ages, Europe was held by some powerful nations, who fortified their cities. At that day, the nation was almost altogether in the city, the country being tilled by the poor sent out for the purpose, or by slaves; and, when it was overrun by the Northern barbarians, they were obliged to defend themselves in these fortresses as they could; it was not war, but conquest and extermination.

The fierce contest was soon over; the country was parcelled out among the barons who followed their daring chief, or king, the great baron of the invading force.

Thus placed amid a new and beautiful country, fertile and abounding in wealth, these fierce and haughty barbarians soon engaged in acts of strife and mutual aggression. It became a matter of importance to each, to secure himself against the sudden attack of his neighbor, which, by means of beacon fires, kindled on the tops of mountains, a blast from the trumpet, or other signals of co-operation, irruptions were frequently made on each other's dominions, without an hour's notice; hence, strong castles or fortresses became necessary, or rather indispensable. Warring with each other, and sometimes with the king, filled up the space of many years. The executive, however, gradually increasing its power, violating the rights of the people, and constantly encroaching on the power of the barons, established itself more firmly; yet, the castles were not finally destroyed on the continent, until about the reign of Henry IV. As the barons were subdued, and their fortresses demolished, standing armies, by degrees, were introduced, and each king maintaining an army, greater perhaps than the actual state of things required, compelled his neighbor to resort to the like means for security and defence; thus the circle of the kingdom was fortified instead of the barony, and the nations of Europe came to fortify themselves against each other, just as the petty barons had done; the frontier was enlarged, but the system not changed; hence, the multitude of fortresses that cover Europe. Here, however, we have nothing of this sort to fear; our country is of such vast extent, that we are protected by it from the broils of petty powers, tormenting by their intrigues, and secure from the unwarrantable ambition of the great states, by being removed from them. We have no enemy, nor can have any, but such as comes from Europe,—Europe, the disturber of the world!

Should we any time, unfortunately, find ourselves involved in war with any power in Europe, we shall always have time enough to prepare for the event; and, as we should have to meet in battle, I believe it would be of little consequence to the American people, how, or where. Our large cities, concentrating much wealth, and attracting the attention of an enemy, ought to be secured by strong and judicious fortifications; for the rest, the arms of the citizens should be their fortresses, as none can doubt, that, in all time to come, should an enterprising enemy come to our shore, and wish to land, he can do so, in despite of all the fortifications raised, or to be raised. Again, might it not be an objection to this vast system of fortifying our frontier, the favorite plan of some, that the fortress might fall into the hands of an enemy, and offer him a safe place to obtain water, and secure their ships, and repair all damage to the army and navy? This occurrence would be a most serious thing to us. He would then have to be beaten out by a much superior force, which would require an expense correspondingly large, nor could these vast fortresses be safely intrusted to a few men; the force ought to be at least sufficient to man the works, which, at one point in Virginia, I have understood, would require from seven to ten thousand men; this, too, at a place, where, during the late war, we had not a man. I repeat it, that, in my opinion, the rifle, and a knowledge of its use, is the best defence for our country, with the exception of the commercial cities, which should be secured by strong forts. Sparta thought so, in days long past; and Napoleon has proved, in the late wars of Europe, how easy it is to march by those fortresses, and conquer his enemy, which had cost so much time, labor, and expense, besides the loss of so many lives, in the fine armies commanded by Saxe, Marlborough, and others.

I am, nevertheless, willing to act prudently upon the plan approved to the country, and continue their plans; yet, admitting the course to be correct, the number of military posts, and the points at which they should be erected, becomes another question. For my own part, in casting my eyes over the country, I cannot perceive that more than twenty-three or four, or, at most, twenty-five, fortified places are necessary; they are these which I hold in my hand, and disposed as follows: Maine, Portsmouth, Boston, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Delaware, Baltimore, Norfolk, perhaps Old Point Comfort, North Carolina, Charleston, Savannah, St. Augustine, Pensacola, Mobile, the Mississippi River, Plattsburg, Niagara, Detroit, some arsenals and deposits. The fortresses on the seaboard might be taken care of by a portion of the infantry and the artillery; the residue might be distributed on the northern and western frontier.

There is, as I understand, a regiment at Sackett's Harbor, at this time, a force, in my opinion, too great for the post; part of that regiment could well be spared, or even a part of those now at the Council Bluffs, and posted at the mouth of Columbia or Oregon River, which would obviate any objection which might arise on that point.

If, however, this should be objected to, which I cannot perceive, from the fact that the army, small as some say it is, nevertheless is deficient by several hundred of its proper number, could be filled by enlistments for that service, or authority might be given to increase the army by law to two hundred common soldiers more, which, organized as our army is, could be done with perfect convenience, by adding a few men more to each company, and not cost more than, perhaps, two thousand dollars.

On the score of economy, this measure can be justified as the army now stands, to even a greater extent. The report originally presented to this House, contemplates also a post at the Mandan Villages, as well as at the mouth of the Oregon; troops at these points would relieve the necessity of intermediate posts, and not lengthen the line of defence; this would give greater security to the country, and, by diminishing the number of posts, diminish also the public expenditure.

It is, at all times, a disagreeable task for me to recur to the scenes which took place in the Western country thirty or forty years ago; none have so deeply suffered by those wars, agitated and produced by British agents and British traders; that country must be secure—these troubles shall cease—the trade ought to be our own.

The Western country, perhaps, fared as well as circumstances would permit; our Government, at the peace of 1783, was in a situation which disposed it to agree to almost any terms of peace which should recognize the independence of our country; I do not mention it in terms of reproach; on the other hand, they were wise and prudent. But the British were on better ground to negotiate; they provided for their trade; they knew well the value of the fur trade of the West, and the immense influence it gave her over the Indian, which, according to her avowed principles, she could use in war. That trade was demanded, and it was wholly surrendered to them. England has shown, in all her treaties, that she knew well the value of this trade, and, from the moment she got possession of Canada until the present time, she has cherished it; and, in her late treaty with us, she has displayed her sagacity and great knowledge of the subject, and the value of the trade of the Oregon. She has driven our citizens from that country; we can no longer trade there; and, by an arrangement with the East India Company, and South Sea Company, their traders are permitted to ship their goods from London and Liverpool direct to the mouth of that river. Our traders, on the other hand, have two shipments to make, paying a duty of from 25 to 37½ per cent., so that, when they come into competition with the Briton, he is only selling at cost that which the Englishman is disposing of at a profit equal to the duty paid by us; the occupation contemplated by this bill, with the aid of a Custom House, at no distant day, would go far to remedy this evil.

It has been hinted by some, that the inhabitants of Oregon, in time, might become strong, and be disposed to separate from us. What, let me ask, could be the inducement to such a measure? With a vast power to the south and to the north pressing upon them, with no reciprocal interest, they would find themselves drawn more closely to the Union, supplying by their industry these powers, and finding an immense country to the east inhabited by their friends and relations, obeying the same laws, and taking from them many of the rich productions of the east, without an increase of expense. Besides, what has their local legislation to do with national affairs? What do we know of the legislation of Maine, or New Hampshire, or of Georgia? Do not our judges expound the laws of Congress as well in those States as in Maryland or Virginia? Would not a judge in Oregon do his duty as well as a judge in Missouri? Does it matter where, or in what place, the laws are made? What is the appearance of things when Congress adjourns, the President retired to his farm, and his Secretaries gone to their homes? All local or State affairs the people of Oregon could transact for themselves, as well as the States on this shore; their obedience to the laws of the Union would be the same; the interest of the people on that side of the Rocky Mountains would be identified with the interest of the people of the whole Atlantic coast, in a stronger degree, in my opinion, than Vermont and Louisiana, and will continue as long.

Notwithstanding this, suppose there should be a separate Government, and they become an independent people, is there any thing very shocking in this? Is it not in unison with our own principles to separate freely and peaceably, when the force of circumstances makes it manifestly necessary? And would it not be better to have our children there, than the Spaniard, Englishman, or the rough Russian? Surely, if we do not occupy it, some foreigner will, as so large, beautiful, and fertile a country, abounding in productions better in the rich markets of India and China, than silver and gold, cannot be left untenanted. Moreover, the law of nations, which we respect, would go far to justify them in taking possession of it. Would we, in that case, wage war to recover it? If so, that war would cost much more than the occupation proposed by this bill. Would you abandon it? Then say so, and let the enterprise of your citizens choose the course. Many now go to Mexico and to Canada, where they get land for the asking; the inducement to Oregon would not be confined to that poor prospect of a piece of land.

Mr. Chairman, this river must be occupied; so noble a stream, watering with its branches a tract of country from the 42d to the 58d degree of north latitude, and from the Pacific Ocean a thousand miles in the interior, with a climate, though north of this city several degrees of latitude, yet as mild as this, cannot remain unoccupied. This country, too, if there is a spot on the face of the globe destined to feel less of the calamity of war than another, it is this place: this, I should think, would be another strong inducement for its settlement.

All the wars which have agitated the world, have been in, or had their rise in Europe—all the wars we have had, and perhaps will have for ages, can only be from Europe. All the defences we have planned, and are planning, is to secure ourselves against the wars of Europe—from all this, Oregon will be comparatively freed. If there is a man, whose religion, or whose judgment or feelings disapproves of war, then let him settle in Oregon, where himself, and his descendants for ages to come, will be unmolested by the din of arms. Russia, from the situation of her capital, her commanding interests, and the mass of her population, will remain a European power—she cannot disturb us at so distant a point. The coast of Asia is too distant, too wild and unimproved, to become the seat of Royalty; and should war arise with that power, Europe and the Atlantic must feel its effects. Should England be the enemy, the result would be the same—that territory is too distant by sea to enable them to fit out any thing like a heavy force: wherefore, the danger of molestation would be small. From the coast of China, we know there is no danger. The experience of many centuries of exemption from war, has taught her the wisdom of peace. She will not, cannot war with us. From Mexico, Peru, Colombia, and Chili, there will be little danger; as the products of the two countries are totally different, we cannot compete in the market; and they have no timber to become a naval power: from that quarter we are safe. If, however, the Republic should be plunged in war, it must be on the Atlantic shore, where it can defend itself; that coast would ask no protection. The whole shore of the ocean is almost a perpendicular rock, only approached through the mouths of the rivers, easily secured, and easily defended, which leaves all at ease within, tranquillity and peace.

There is, Mr. Chairman, another point of view in which this subject presents itself, still more important to us, and one which ought to engage the most serious attention of the Republic.

This river is the largest which empties itself into the Pacific Ocean on the whole coast of America, or on the coast of Asia, as far, at least, as China. It has soil and timber to any extent, fine harbors, and much health. From this point, the whole Pacific Ocean can be commanded; and is the only point on the globe, where a naval power can reach the East India possessions of our eternal enemy, Great Britain. It is well known to every member of the House, that through all her struggles with Napoleon, and amidst all the gigantic schemes and exhaustless resources of that great man, her trade to India remained untouched and secure. It is well known that he had planned a descent upon her East India possessions; but as he himself declared in his conversations with Mr. O'Meara, at St. Helena, a book all have seen, the truth of which, none doubt, that he was never able to accomplish it: because, on consultation with his ablest naval commanders, and on various calculations, he found that the fleet would be deficient, as he observed, in one month's supply of water. If, then, we secure the possession of Oregon, and avail ourselves of the fine harbors and ship timber which we know how to use, which fact, the English, at least, ought not to doubt, we take the strongest and surest security of Britain, for her future good behavior. She will be very cautious how she evinces that wantonness and injustice, and utter disregard of the rights of this Republic, which led to the last war with her, when she knows that, in thirty or forty days, we can, at any time, strike a blow on her East India possessions, which, of all others, she would feel the most sensibly and sorely. This would be a better guarantee for our future peace, than her faith in the observance of treaties, or her impressions of justice. We should, too, obtain the entire control of that ocean, where we have, even now, annually, eight or ten millions of property. Mexico, Peru, Chili, and Colombia cannot, and Britain, in those seas, must forever remain too weak to cope with us. We will be in good ports at home; they have all the dangers of a voyage round a cape proverbial for its storms, and two oceans, making a distance of perhaps thirty thousand miles. If, in any future war, a ship should be taken from the enemy in that sea, instead of burning it, or suffering it to rot, as was done by the intrepid Porter, we would have a near and safe port to enter, where all prizes could be secured, and, by a court of admiralty, the property changed, which could be sold to the merchants of any, or all of the powers below, or even to the Russians. This, then, gives us the command of that ocean, from the Bay of Bengal, to Cape Horn, and to Behring's Straits, Kamtschatka and Ochotak.

From this bill will result all these important considerations: We procure and protect the fur trade, worth to England three millions of dollars a year. We engross the whale trade, a most valuable branch of commerce, so plenty on that coast, that Portlock, an English navigator, states, that in 1787, when in latitude 57° he saw the ocean covered with whales as far as the eye could see. We control the South Sea trade, as it is called—the trade in seals, and in the islands of the Pacific. We must govern the Canton trade. All this rich commerce could be governed, if not engrossed, by capitalists at Oregon, making it the Tyre of America, to supply the whole coast below, and thus obtain the silver and gold of those rich countries on that coast, more valuable to us than the mines themselves; for the nation which works in iron, and labors in commerce, has always, and will forever, govern those who work in gold. Here is a way, then, to supply the market of Canton with all it wants, without a dollar in specie from the Republic. What flour, and cotton, and tobacco, is taken from the United States, by ships in that trade, on what they call indirect voyages, are first disposed of in Europe or the Mediterranean, for silver, opium, &c., and these are shipped to China, where the opium is better than silver. The ginseng of the Oregon, the fur of that river and that sea, with sandal wood, and other valuable productions of the islands, will purchase all we want, not only to supply our own wants, but to dispose of in Europe, and return the proceeds to our own country. Much can be taken to Oregon, and from thence, shipped to the Governments below, or furnished to the merchants of Mexico, Guatemala, and others, as they may find it convenient to apply for them, by so short a voyage—from ten to twenty-two days.

The trade to Canton has never been properly regarded by us; when viewed in a proper light, it is of great value to the United States, and ought to be cherished, or, as sometimes happens, the best thing that can be done, is, to do nothing; and this is emphatically one of these cases. If proof of this were wanting, it would only be necessary to compare our commerce with Great Britain. Her East India Company, her South Sea Company, and other charters granted to monopolists, will, if persevered in, ruin their country, or soon rank them below the United States, or give employment to many tons of American shipping; to carry that which their own subjects cannot do.

The idea has been pretty generally spread abroad, that nothing is taken in the Canton market but gold and silver, ginseng, and furs. This I explained on a former occasion, that, owing to the bulk and low prices of bread stuffs, &c., and their liability to spoil from so long a voyage, through a hot country, that they would not pay the expense of freight. But, from the mouth of this river, the voyage is short and safe, which will afford a good profit for flour, and all other articles the products of agriculture. Cotton, too, has been sold there for a good price; broken glass, leather, gin, brandy, and candles. What a prospect for the tanner! in a country abounding in timber, of oak and spruce pine, affording bark of the best quality, as containing much of the tanning principle, with skins in inexhaustible abundance from the plains below.

If the House will indulge me a few minutes, I will now make some exposition of the whale trade, and the trade to the Western Ocean. For all I shall say, I have the documents in my hand, and if there is an error, it is, I know, in making the exposition less than the real fact; but I deem it prudent to present the least favorable view it is susceptible of. It is proper further to observe, that this part of the subject may be better understood, that the number of vessels here stated, regards the departures and arrivals each year; though it is believed that in some years there may be more at sea than in other years, which, of course, would not be noticed that year, which may, on the other hand, be counterbalanced by the arrival of a vessel which that year cleared; yet it is pretty accurate.

In the year 1819, there cleared from Boston, 8 ships, engaged in the whale fishery, and commerce of the Western Ocean, &c. The tonnage of these ships amounted to 2,171, navigated by 164 seamen. Their particular places of destination were Ohili, Lima, Valparaiso, Sandwich Islands, Western Coast, &c. New Bedford, twenty-eight ships, tonnage 7,879, seamen 552. Edgartown, fourteen ships, tonnage 3,908, seamen 281. Newport, one ship, tons 366, seamen 23. Providence, three ships, tons 520, seamen 27. New London, four ships, tons 845, seamen 74. New York, one ship of 168 tons, and 21 seamen. There entered that year, 83 ships, 7,968 tons, and 557 seamen, making 118 ships, 20,428 tons, navigated by 2,199 seamen. In the year 1820 there cleared 108 ships, 25,118 tons, navigated by 2,068 seamen; and arrived 58 ships, 18,581 tons, and 946 seamen, making 161 ships, 33,649 tons, and 3,009 seamen.

In 1821 there sailed 162 ships, tonnage 41,550, navigated by 3,192 seamen. There arrived that year, 53 ships, 12,908 tons, seamen not known, making 215 ships, tonnage 54,450. In 1822 there sailed 161 ships; tonnage 43,515; seamen 3,174. There arrived 80 ships, tons 18,127; there is no note of the seamen who entered, save 180 in New York; making that year, 241 ships, tons 61,612. In 1823, there sailed ninety-five ships, tons 25,079, and arrived 80 ships, tons 20,833; making 175 ships; seamen not ascertained. In the year 1817, it is to be remembered, there was brought to Nantucket, by 28 ships, tonnage 5,153, and 409 seamen, 5,771 barrels of whale oil; 15,401 barrels of spermaceti; 6,818 of head matter; 19,444 of whale bone. In 1818, brought by 21 ships, 384 seamen, 5,492 tons, 13,426 barrels of whale oil; 10,496 spermaceti; 4,878 head matter; 65,448 whale bone. In 1820, there were 21 ships, 5,249 tons, and 891 seamen, bringing 11,687 barrels of whale oil; 11,885 spermaceti; 5,027 head matter; 59,794 whale bone. In the succeeding years it was much the same. One of the vessels arriving in 1823, reported a list of 86 ships then in the Western Ocean, though they did not know of any cargo, except 85,200 barrels of whale oil.

I have the authority of a respectable newspaper for saying, that, within the period of three years, viz., in 1820, '21, and '22, there arrived at Nantucket, 2,101,292 gallons of spermaceti oil; and, for the same three years, at New Bedford, 1,407,797 gallons, this being but one item in the trade. During these years there went to Canton, in furs and sandal wood, from that coast and sea, including some fur likewise shipped from N. York, that which sold for the incredible amount of 1,494,397 dollars!

DECEMBER, 1834.]

Occupation of the Columbia River.

There was exported to that sea, in that year, 17,554 dollars' worth of domestic fabrics, and 9,417 of foreign merchandise. To the Western Coast, 118,946 domestic and 198,868 foreign merchandise. We have, from the year 1805 to 1822, inclusive, shipped to the Pacific, in domestic and foreign merchandise, 520,295 dollars; and, to the Western Coast, in the same articles, for the same period, 4,557,078 dollars; making 5,077,371 dollars; yet, by this trade we obtain the valuable furs, sold for such enormous amounts in China; our exports to that coast amounting, in twenty years, to 5,077,371 dollars.

Why should we not protect and cherish this trade? Was there ever a nation on earth which bought so much, with so little? The fisheries, which have occupied so large a space in our negotiations for many years, only yielded us, in the year 1816, the sum of 1,881,000 dollars, employing — tons of shipping; this also included — tons of shipping engaged in the whale trade.

Under this view of the subject, I think, Mr. Chairman, you will agree with me, that "our interests on the Pacific Ocean are not so minute" as to be unworthy of investigation, as has been said in a recent negotiation, by a personage in no very subordinate station. This trade, yielding such vast sums upon the capital and labor employed; giving employment to 45,000 tons of shipping, and upwards of 3,000 seamen; ought to be looked to with care, and fostered with solicitude. Besides bringing us great wealth, it is the finest nursery for seamen in the world. An ordinary whaling voyage is from two to three years. I have it from authority that cannot be doubted, that ships have been absent for four or five years, and, in one instance, even seven years; it is this which makes the real seaman.

But, sir, why should we not have our own ships built on that sea, and fitted out from our own port on the Oregon? Why send ships of war from this coast, from Washington City, to cruise in the Pacific Ocean, when we can there build them, and keep on that coast a fleet, for that ocean?

Much has been said concerning the difficulty of establishing the post, and subsisting those who might embark in the enterprise. It is true, we will not, for a few years, find as much wealth and splendor as is found in the saloons and drawing-rooms of this magnificent counterfeit of European royalty; neither would we find what is very common here, a heartless intercourse, and aping etiquette of miserable pretenders to the "monthly fashions, just from Europe."

First, As to subsistence. I think myself well justified, from the concurrent testimony of all travellers and voyagers; in stating, that the salmon of the Oregon River alone, would subsist fifty thousand men a year. The potato grows wild there, on which the natives feed, not only those who live on the river, but those of the neighboring nations. Portlock and Dixon say, and their testimony is strengthened by Messrs. Lewis and Clarke, that the gooseberry is to be found there in abundance; so is the red and black currant, strawberries, mulberries, raspberries, onions, and peas. Portlock also states, that, high up that coast, a shrub is found, the leaves of which is so good a substitute for the tea of China, that he could hardly tell the difference. Moreover, wheat, and all kinds of grain, can be had in a few days from Mexico, at very reduced prices. Hogs, sheep, goats, black cattle of every description, can be had, with ease, and in abundance, in a short time, from California, or the Sandwich Islands. The difficulties to be overcome in a voyage or journey to that country, are ideal, and for some years unknown to the enterprising citizens of Missouri, who, I had almost said, were daily in the habit of planning and executing trips to Oregon and to Mexico, yielding a profit in furs, peltries, money, and mules, beyond any thing known to us. The journey is safe and easy, and requires, from Franklin, in Missouri, the space of fifty days, by their present slow mode of travelling, to perform the trip. So frequent are their journeys, that I should almost feel myself justified in saying, that there is a constant intercourse between Missouri, Mexico, and Oregon.

Much of the reluctance which is felt by gentlemen, arises from a recurrence to the difficulties experienced by Messrs. Lewis and Clarke, when visiting that coast; their difficulties proceeded, not from the country, but from their entire want of knowledge—which is now possessed, gained by a residence among the Indian nations who inhabit the country near the Oregon mountains.

The course now travelled to pass those mountains, lies far to the south of that formerly travelled, and a journey can now be made without meeting any obstructions of a serious character. Much of this information has been imparted by Mr. Farnham and Mr. Crooka, gentlemen to whom I am much indebted for many interesting facts relative to this country, who have had an intimate knowledge, from having been there engaged in the trade of that country with John Jacob Astor, who is well known for his skill, experience, and extensive knowledge in the fur trade, and is ready to vest in that pursuit, several hundred thousand dollars, fixing his establishment at the mouth of the Oregon, so soon as this republic will extend to her citizens the same protection which even the Kings of Europe, particularly England, grant to their subjects. I am also informed, that other large capitalists in the Western country, and in Virginia, are willing to embark in the same pursuit; among these may be named Louis A. Tarascon, of Shippingport, Ken., known in Bordeaux and Philadelphia as one of the most accomplished merchants; who has been among the first to open the trade from the Ohio to the West Indies, and built the first ship which descended that river, for that purpose, and whose commercial views have been useful, and deserve the most respectful attention of the Government.

The great difficulties which Lewis and Clarke met with, induced adventurers to search for a more practicable route, which was soon discovered, to the south of that pursued by these early travellers. Others went still further southwardly, and continued up the Yellowstone River, taking the fork of that river, called the Big Horn, pursuing it to its source, thence through the mountain, falling upon the waters of Lewis River, one of the principal branches of the Oregon. At this point the waters interlock; and present very few difficulties, as the whole chain of mountains differs from those known on the Atlantic shores, inasmuch as the mountains here are composed of one unbroken chain; they are composed of a number of detached hills, though large, and of great height from the base to the summit, resembling a chain of tumuli; through these you pass with ease and safety, so much so, that I have the most perfect confidence, that even now, a wagon, with its usual freight, could be taken from this capital to the mouth of Oregon.

I shall, Mr. Chairman, close the few remarks I have to make, by an appeal to the House, to consider well our interests in the Western Ocean, on our Western Coast, and the trade to China and to India; and the ease with which it can be brought down the Missouri. What is this commerce? Has it not enriched the world? Thousands of years have passed by, and, year after year, all the nations of the earth have, each year, sought the rich commerce of that country; all have enjoyed the riches of the East. This trade was sought by King Solomon, by Tyre, Sidon; this wealth found its way to Egypt, and, at last, to Rome, to France, Portugal, Spain, Holland, England, and, finally, to this Republic. How vast and incomprehensibly rich must be that country and commerce, which has never ceased, one day, from the highest point of Jewish splendor, to the instant I am speaking, to supply the whole globe with all the busy imagination of man can desire, for his ease, comfort, or enjoyment! Whilst we have so fair an opportunity offered, to participate so largely in all this wealth and enjoyment, if not to govern and direct the whole, can it be possible that doubts, on mere points of speculation, will weigh with the House, and cause us to lose forever, the brightest prospect ever presented to the eyes of a nation?

I will conclude my observations on this important subject, with one other remark, which I beg the House to bear in mind, and give it such weight as it deserves. The idea of extending our military frontier, or posts, to the mouth of that river, seems to have created alarm in the minds of some gentlemen; but, when it is well considered, all cause of fear will vanish. It is not so important as to the number of military posts, as it is that they should be properly placed. I am thoroughly persuaded, that England governs the commercial world more by the advantageous positions she occupies in it, than by her physical strength or powerful marine. In addition to the strength which she derives from her insular position, which is as a bastion to the coast of Europe, she has Gibraltar and Malta, and other islands in the Mediterranean, which hold all Europe in check. On another side, she has a position in the West Indies, in Africa, in India, and the South Seas; all chosen with the same intent, and all in completion of her schemes; she wants nothing now to give her the entire control of all the commerce of the world, for ages to come, but a position on our Western Coast, which she will soon have, unless you pass this bill.

Mr. POINSETT, of South Carolina, offered an amendment to the bill, the effect of which would be to leave it discretionary with the President at what point on the Pacific the military post should be established, and supported his amendment by some remarks, the substance of which was understood to be, that the information in possession of the mover, as to the geographical and topographical advantages of the position at the mouth of the Oregon, was adverse to that just laid before the House by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD.) He was not very confident of the accuracy of either, and thought it best to leave the matter to the President, who was, or doubtless would be, in possession of the best intelligence which was to be had in the case.

On motion of Mr. TRACY, of N. Y., the day being somewhat advanced, the committee then rose.

Mr. COOK moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the farther consideration of this bill, with a view to its reference to the committee to whom so much of the President's message as refers to this subject had already been committed. This course appeared to him to be proper in itself, and, particularly so, as there were manifest defects in the bill, which made it advisable that it should undergo revision by a committee.

Mr. TENNILE, of Kentucky, felt some regret that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois had been made. He did not see the necessity for it, even to the attainment of the mover's own object, and there was, in the meanwhile, a weighty reason why the House should act upon the bill at the present session. The bill had, as had been observed, two leading features—first, the establishment of a military post, and, secondly, the establishment of a territorial government at such time as the President shall judge it to be proper. The object of the gentleman from Illinois would be fully answered by striking out the latter feature, to which alone his objection seemed to apply; for, certainly when he talked of sending topographical engineers to survey the country, he did not mean to turn those gentlemen out defenceless among savages: he would surely send a military force of some description to accompany and protect them. But it was needful that the House should act upon the subject, and for this reason: By the terms of the British treaty, England and the United States are to trade in common throughout that country; and the treaty stipulates that the rights possessed by each at the time of the treaty, are to remain as they then were for fourteen years. Now, it was well known that an agent of the American Government had gone round to Astoria, the settlement at the mouth of the river Oregon, immediately after the conclusion of peace, and demanded that the British flag should be lowered and the American flag hoisted, as a signal of the possession of that part of the coast. Well, said Mr. T., the lion accordingly came down and the eagle went up; but, no sooner did the American agent turn his back, than down went the eagle, and up went the lion again. Under such circumstances, we made the agreement contained in the commercial treaty; and, if we shall leave the territory in possession of Great Britain until the fourteen years shall run out, at the end of that time it will be hers by right of possession, and she may expel our traders, &c. The possession which may now be obtained and secured by a small military force, say of two hundred men, may not, after that time, be obtained by a much larger force, and at a much greater expense. He was, therefore, opposed to the recommitment of the bill. Whilst up, he begged leave to return his thanks, those of the people whom he represented, and, he believed, of a great portion of the American people, to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) who had so long, and with so much assiduity, labored to collect and present facts for the information and guidance of the House, in a matter of so great national importance as that which was now before it, and which he had at successive sessions brought forward.

The question was then put on Mr. COOK's motion to recommit the bill, and lost by a large majority.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 21.

Remuneration to General Lafayette.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the orders of the day be dispensed with, in order to take up the bill concerning General Lafayette. Mr. BRECHER hoped the House would not consent to do so—but, the question not admitting debate, it was put, and carried by a large majority.

The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole on that bill, Mr. MARKLEY in the chair; and the bill having been read,

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, rose, and said, that it might appear uncourteous in any gentleman to oppose the passage of a bill having such an object as that now before the committee; yet, under present circumstances, brought in as that bill had been, suddenly upon the House, and called, as gentlemen were, to act upon it, without the opportunity of consultation, or a moment's reflection, he felt it to be his duty to oppose its farther progress. This might, perhaps, be considered as his reproach; but he felt it to be his duty, and he must fearlessly discharge it. He could have wished that the gentleman who introduced the bill had cultivated a little more of the virtue of patience. He did expect that, in presenting such a bill to this House, the merits and claims of the individual for whose benefit it was intended would have been stated, and the reasons which had induced the committee to fix upon this amount of compensation would have been disclosed. He was far from being insensible to the merits of that distinguished individual; and if, upon a deliberate statement of all the facts of his case, he should be convinced that his claims, even to such a large amount of remuneration, were founded in justice, he would go as far as any member of the House in allowing them, and in voting an appropriation. Whatever might be thought of his present conduct, Mr. C. declared that he was neither insensible to the services of General Lafayette, nor ungrateful for them; but he disapproved of the manner in which the bill had been attempted to be hurried through the House; and, though he might not succeed in preventing its passage, he should certainly, in this public manner, enter, for one, his protest against it.

Mr. TRACY, of New York, then rose, and observed, that it must now be evident to all, that there existed in the House a difference of opinion as to the form of the measure proposed by the bill. To the measure itself, he was persuaded, no gentleman on that floor was opposed, and he presumed that the friends of the bill, as reported, would not think, under such circumstances, of pressing the bill through the House while the minds of members were in a state so unprepared to act with unison upon the subject. He confessed, that to himself it had appeared somewhat extraordinary, that a measure of this kind had been introduced and pressed with so much precipitancy. For his own part, he would not say that he was either in favor of the bill or opposed to it in its present form. He had deputed to no committee the right of graduating his feelings on this subject, nor would this House submit to have the measure of its gratitude dictated to it by any committee. It must have time to think and to act for itself. Such time had not been given. He would not say the amount was too large—others might think it was, and others, again, might consider it too small: opportunity must be allowed to gentlemen to express their views. No committee could gauge in a moment the feelings and sentiments of the House on such a subject, and he was opposed to such precipitate legislation. Our judgment, said he, is to be consulted as well as our feelings—and, hoping that the friends of the bill would themselves be sensible of the impropriety of attempting thus to hurry it through the House, he should move to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was taken on Mr. TRACY'S motion, which was carried in the affirmative—ayes 98, noes 84.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

Settlement of the Northwest Coast.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, the House went again into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "for occupying the mouth of Columbia River," Mr. A. STEVENSON in the chair.

The amendment offered yesterday by Mr. POINSETT, to insert, after the clause which empowers the President "to erect a fort on the Oregon River, in the region of tide water," the following, viz: "or at such other point as, after an accurate survey of the coast and adjoining country, shall be found most advantageous for the establishment of a military post," was again read, and adopted; when the committee rose, and reported the bill as amended.

In the House,

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to strike out the 4th section, which is as follows: "That the President be, and he is hereby, directed to open a port of entry within the said territory, whenever he shall deem the public good may require it, and shall appoint such officers as may be necessary for the same; after which, the revenue laws of the United States shall extend to, and be in full force in said territory;" to which (though on all other grounds highly approving it) he objected, as interfering with the treaty with Great Britain. By that treaty, a free and open trade is guaranteed, in common, to both powers, for a certain term of years, which is diametrically in opposition to the establishment of a port of entry, and the consequent demand of duties from British traders to the Oregon.

Mr. GAZLAY thought that, as the treaty was the supreme law of the land, the establishment of a port of entry would only cause duties to be collected from other powers, the treaty stipulation protecting the trade of Great Britain from those duties.

Mr. FLOYD explained. The gentleman would perceive, if he looked once more at the section, that the establishment of a port of entry was only to take place, when the President shall "deem that the public good may require it." It did not interfere with the enjoyment of an equal trade by both parties, during the period stipulated by the treaty, but was intended to put our citizens, as early as possible, on an advantageous footing for the prosecution of commercial enterprise.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, then rose, and moved to amend the bill by striking out the whole of the 5th section, [which empowers the President to appoint a Governor, Judges, &c., for the territory, and defines their powers, emoluments, &c.] He approved of that part of the bill which provides for the establishment of a military post, but he thought that the erecting of a territorial Government was matter of high legislation, which the House should not put out of their own hand, without special and urgent reason. He saw no such reason in this case. A territorial Government would not be wanted on the river Oregon for many years to come, and would be attended, at present, only with unnecessary expense.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, addressed the Chair, and said, that he had intended to offer some amendments to the bill, which, that his object might be understood, he would now read to the committee. [These were to strike out all the sections except the second and last, and to amend the second, so as to authorize the President to occupy "the territory of the United States on the Northwest Coast of America," without giving it a name as one of the territories of the United States.] It might, he said, be expected that he should explain why it was, that he, though chairman of the committee on that part of the President's message which relates to this subject, had not convened the committee. He thought it due to his friend and colleague, (Mr. FLOYD,) who certainly would have been appointed chairman had he been present, who had, with so much industry and ability, investigated the subject, that he should take the lead in bringing it before the House, and that it should be decided on his bill and report, already in possession of the House. I have (said Mr. S.) some remarks to make which may be now properly made, on the motion to strike out the 5th section of the bill. My colleague has shown the expediency of establishing a military post; but I differ with the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. TRUMBULL,) as to the expediency of establishing a post at the mouth of Columbia River. The surrender of the post at that place, to our agent, at the close of the war could not affect the right of either nation. The surrender was made in compliance with a stipulation of the treaty of peace, that all places taken by either party during the war, should be given up; but it left the question of right to the territory undecided. Great Britain has, at this moment, a military post on the Columbia River, which, under the convention, I presume, she has a right to retain until the expiration of the ten years. The spot whereon a British post is now situated, is a very improper one to select for placing one of ours. I therefore approved of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. POINSETT.) But the principal question to be now settled is, Shall the plan of my colleague, to establish a territorial Government, be adopted? or, Shall we adopt the proposition of the President, to establish a military post only? This question ought to depend on the answer to be given to another. Do we contemplate the eventual establishment of a State Government on the Northwest Coast of America? This depends on another question of importance, and worthy of serious consideration, to wit: Where shall the western limits of the United States be fixed? I do not mean the limits of their territory or the extent of their power. We may have establishments on distant shores; but where shall the limits of the States, the members of this confederacy, be fixed? The institutions of nations should be adapted to their extent, and other circumstances. The federative system offers advantages for governing well an extensive nation; but there is some limit, beyond which it should not be extended. It will not be contended, that this system of government is adapted to include the whole earth, nor the whole continent of America; perhaps not even the whole of North America. There was evidently a limit to it, in the very nature of things. The representatives of the States and people, under this system, must meet together once a year for the purpose of legislation; and the confederacy might be so extended that this would be impossible. All the institutions of this country depend on the will of the people, and cannot exist a moment but by the approbation of a majority. Our system may be properly extended to include all who have a mutual interest in remaining united; but no further. Beyond this there is no bond of union sufficiently strong to keep the confederacy together. He conceived that this principle of union from mutual interest, might bind together all those who inhabit the waters of the Mississippi; as their products would seek one seaport; and that country would be bound to the Atlantic States, by commercial interests, and especially for naval protection. But I apprehend, that if this union included Mexico, it would be dissolved by mutual consent to-morrow. There would be no tie of mutual interest to hold us together. The exact point to which the confederacy might be extended, for the mutual advantage of all, it might be difficult to ascertain. Perhaps we may safely include one or two tiers of States beyond the Mississippi; but, in my judgment, we ought not to extend our federative system further; and I would particularly recommend it to the gentlemen who represent the Atlantic States, to consider the possible effects of a further extension, when the Western States shall become filled with people.

There is another consideration to be taken into view. We have a considerable Indian population, which it is not intended to exterminate. We have a large population of another description, which it is not intended to exterminate. These, on failure of other plans, might be removed to the country beyond the limits of the States, and let the population of the States be homogeneous. On the whole, I think that, if a line is drawn far enough beyond the Mississippi, to include two tiers of States, it might be wise and proper to declare it unchangeable. Those beyond this line might be in alliance with us, or under our protection, and live under Governments of their own, suited to their circumstances, but form no part of our confederacy. The effect of a too rapid increase of States, and bringing too much land into market, is already severely felt by the old States on the seaboard, which are perpetually drained of the flower of their population. That must continue to be so, and the evil will increase, the further we extend our limits. If we open, on the western coast, a fertile country, offering temptations to emigrants from among us—it will carry off many of our enterprising and valuable people; the country will rapidly increase in population, until it will drop off and become a separate nation.

All that was asked for by the President, was the sanction of Congress to the establishment of a military post. He did not ask for an appropriation of money, and it was not important whether it was made or not. The measure recommended by the President would be a proper one—possession would strengthen our claim in our negotiations with foreign powers. In our arrangement with Russia, we gave up all claim to the country north of 54 degrees 40 minutes. Perhaps we might have justly claimed as far as the 58th degree north. We have succeeded to the claim of Spain, who held by the right of first discovery. Humboldt, who, when at Mexico, investigated the subject, speaking of the voyage of discovery the Spanish navigator Perez made in 1774, he says, "On the 9th of August they anchored, the first of all the European Navigators, in Nootka road, which they called the port of San Lorenzo, and which the illustrious Oook, four years afterwards, called King George's Sound." He also tells us, that, in the following year, 1775, the Spanish navigator, Quadra, discovered the mouth of the Columbia River, and Mount Edgecumbe; and he adds, "I possess two very curious small maps, engraved in 1788, in the city of Mexico, which give the bearings of the coast from the 17th to the 58th degree of latitude, as they were discovered in the expedition of Quadra."

Sir, (said Mr. S.,) let the post which we establish, be purely military; a navy yard might constitute a part of the establishment. So far I deem it wise and fit to go; but let not our citizens be invited to that country by grants of land, or the expectation of a State Government being established there.

The question was then taken on striking out the fifth section of the bill, and carried.

The question then recurring on the amendment offered by Mr. A. SMYTH—

Mr. FLOYD rose in reply to the remarks of that gentleman. He recapitulated some of the reasons before urged by him, against placing the numerous and mixed population on the Oregon River, under the control of a military commander. He appealed to the gentleman himself, (one of the most uniform republicans this country had ever seen,) whether it was possible that so many ships, with their crews, stopping, and refitting, &c., at the post to be established, involving the interest of a property afloat of ten millions, a mass of 1,000 or 2,000 traders, farmers, and fishermen, would, with propriety, be placed under the despotism of military law? He had all due confidence in the officers of our army; but he knew it was so easy to feel power and forget right, that he did not like to confide too much to them. So difficult was it for citizens to conform themselves to army regulations, &c., no American would submit long to be put under martial law. As to the danger of erecting distant States, Oregon was not further from the seat of Government under the improvements of navigation, &c., than Louisiana was when she was erected into a State; and not much further than Maine is; and he knew no reason why Oregon should be less attached to the republic. He was very sure that her interest bound her to us, especially in a time of war.

It mattered little, as to the obedience to the laws, in which State the place was situated where they were made; and he believed it would puzzle even a skilful lawyer to say in what State our laws are made at present. He dwelt on the value of the China trade, and the whale fisheries—and contrasting this with the appropriation called for by the bill, he took occasion to state that he had received a letter from a merchant of high standing and large capital in Boston, who had examined the estimates on which the sum in the bill had been predicated; and, although he pronounced them not too high, considering that Government must charter the vessels to be employed, he offered to transport what was necessary at a price considerably less; which he could afford to do, because he already owned a number of vessels in the Northwest trade. As to the danger of spreading our territory, and of the future State of Oregon separating from the confederacy—suppose it should be so? What then? Was it not better that this tract of country should be settled by us than by foreigners? And did the gentleman suppose that all the nations of the earth could stand by and see the vast region to the west of us, lie for centuries unoccupied? If we did not take possession, they would; and, by the law of nations, they would have a right to do so. If we forbade them, and they disregarded the prohibition, we must go to war with them; so that the gentleman's argument was as broad as it was long. Unless the territory was our own, we might look for war at any rate. It was, besides, of importance to give this vast country the blessings of free government. Even the patriots of the South found it hard to teach their people how to be freemen—and as to the Russians, he had long believed that, with them, the thing was simply impossible. Let the population of the West be free from the outset.

Mr. SMYTH now withdrew his amendment, and, instead of it, offered another, which was, to strike out the whole of the third section, [which offers bounty land to settlers in the territory.]

The motion was opposed by Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, who said that the section proposing to establish civil government in the Oregon at a future day, was not very essential, and he had voted to strike it out, under a hope that the other features of the bill would be more acceptable. The present section, though not absolutely necessary, ought, in his opinion, to be retained; and he would assign one or two plain reasons in its favor. But before doing this, he would ask leave to correct his friend from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) in his construction of the treaty of Ghent. He says that the treaty left the rights of the parties as they were before its date; and so far, agreed. But he says further, that the British are now in possession, and have therefore a right to hold the country until the expiration of the ten years stipulated in the treaty of London. If this is true, it would follow that the treaty has reversed the rights of the parties; and the gentleman's construction of it will place the interests of this Government in a most perilous predicament. Let me show him, said Mr. T., how our rights stood before the treaty, and how they will stand in October, 1828, if his view of the subject is correct. We claimed the country before the late war, England claimed it, and Russia claimed it. Their titles were, of course, mere pretences. We sent out Lewis and Clarke to explore the country, and make a demonstration of our right, and our intention to occupy and hold it. Not long after they returned, our fur traders went out across the mountains, and around Cape Horn, and took possession near the mouth of the Oregon or Columbia River. In 1810, a town, consisting of a few trading houses, was built there, and called Astoria. After the late war was commenced, the British traders, aided by the Indians, drove our traders from the country, and held it and traded there until the treaty of Ghent. By that treaty, a mutual restoration of rights and territories was stipulated, except the Grand Menan, and the islands in Passamaquoddy bay, the sovereignty of which were agreed to be in contest. In pursuance of the treaty, Mr. Prevost was ordered up from Lima, as agent of the United States, to receive possession from the British. He arrived at the mouth of the Oregon River, on the 1st of October, 1818, and on the 6th, took possession of the British post near the bay. It was surrendered in due form, but not without a protest by the English settlers against our right to take it. Mr. Prevost sailed on the 9th or 10th of the same month, and as soon as he left the river, the British flag was again hoisted, and the country occupied as British territory. This must have been about the 10th of October, if we may believe Mr. Farnham and Mr. Crooks, both of whom are men of veracity. On the 20th of October, the treaty of London was signed, so that in point of fact, the British were in actual (though wrongful) possession of the country when that treaty was concluded. The treaty declares "that any country claimed by either party, on the Northwest coast of America, west of the Stony Mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open for the term of ten years, from the date of the convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers. It being well understood that this agreement (the treaty) is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of the said country." And now, the important question is this: What will be the practical result if we leave the British in possession until the ten years are ended? That Government may then hold this language to us:—Your mutual right of trade and navigation has been accorded to you, and you have enjoyed it for the full term stipulated; but now the rights of both parties are remitted back to their actual condition at the date of the treaty of London. At that date, (Oct. 20th, 1818,) we were in possession, and your mutual privilege being now ended, you must cease to trade with the Indians, or navigate these waters, until the King shall grant you a renewal of the favor in another treaty. Thus our rights will cease at the end of ten years; and, instead of our people having the exclusive right to trade there after October, 1828, we shall be excluded from the trade entirely. This shows that the practical effect of the gentleman's construction of the treaty will be, to place our rights on that coast, and in that territory, on the footing of a lease for ten years, after which they are to cease unless renewed; whereas, if we take possession now, as we ought to do, and have a clear right to do, the rights of the British traders and navigators there, will cease in October, 1828. The establishment of a military post, therefore, to occupy the country, is of the first importance to us, because it revives and brings forward our rights, as they were before the treaty. The real state of the fact is, that England has only the color of claim, but to this she has wrongfully superadded an actual possession, and we must speedily re-occupy the country, or we shall have to treat for its reclamation at an obvious disadvantage.

So much for the treaty, he said, and now for the bill. By the establishment of military posts at the mouth of the Oregon, and on the bay of St. John de Fuco, we may command the trade of China, Japan, the East Indies, and the North Pacific. That ocean is the richest sea in the world, and is as yet without a master. He would not discuss the value of the trade there, nor speak of it as a nursery for our seamen. It was enough to know that, for the last 800 years, the nation that has held the control of the East India and China trade, has had the supremacy of naval strength and maritime power. But, said he, that side of the subject belongs to our exterior interests and foreign policy, which I do not intend to examine. I wish to look at it only as a question of domestic regulation and interior police. The proposed military post, with trading houses in the territory, and in the Rocky Mountains, will command the fur trade, and we all know that the fur trade and the fur traders will command the Indians. The fact is proven by experience. This consideration, the best and surest way to preserve peace with the Indians, must, for the future, be a primary object in framing our territorial regulations, because we are about to make a radical change in our Indian policy. The President, we recollect, has called our attention to the subject, and has suggested a new system. Formerly, our policy was to separate the tribes, thrust our settlements between them, disunite them, and treat with them as independent nations; but now we are called upon to consolidate the tribes, embody them, and concentrate the entire united mass upon some portion of our western territories. This may be a wise scheme. It deserves serious consideration; but whether it be good or bad policy, if we embody the Indian tribes upon our western frontiers before we acquire the exclusive control of the fur trade, we shall have to embody an army to protect our settlements and look down all hostilities. This was Tecumseh's scheme of Indian policy. He was the inventor of it, and doubtless, under the direction of a chief like him, it would increase their power tenfold, and give new vigor to their hostile councils. Col. Dixon embodied some tribes last war upon the same plan, and so did Tecumseh; and we all recollect the impression they made upon our frontiers, and the destructive and distressing results, wherever they assailed us. If we adopt this new scheme of policy, we must begin by securing the exclusive command of the fur trade; we must disperse our traders throughout all the trapping districts. The fur traders are the best peace-makers; because they unite with the Indians, and form a common bond of interest. The first step in the introduction of this new system, would be to establish a military post in the Oregon territory, to protect the traders. But would that be enough? Could the soldiery discharge their military duties, and at the same time provide subsistence for themselves, and the concourse of traders and Indians who would assemble near them at particular periods? Such a post ought to be surrounded by a hardy population to till the ground, and provide the necessities of life in abundance, and thereby give confidence to the people, and durability to the settlement. If you locate a mere post there, without an auxiliary population to sustain it, some artful trader, jealous of our growing interests, and of his diminished profits, will not fail to bring down the Indians on the fort, and invest it, and we shall hear of nothing but sieges and massacres. And after all, what is the value of the land proposed to be given as a bounty to the first settlers? In that remote region, the land as yet is worth nothing; it has no value. The gentleman from Virginia fears that we shall spread too far, and hopes that the limits of the Republic will not be extended beyond the Rocky Mountains. Those who observe nations from their closets, and look at men and things through the medium of books, may throw out useful hints, and make wise observations; but it is practical men alone, that are relied upon to manage the affairs of nations. What may be the fate of the Federation if it should be extended beyond the Stony Mountains, and what good or ill fortune may betide the people of the Oregon two centuries hence, does not concern us much just now. Doubtless, posterity will know how to take care of itself, and provide for its own dangers, as we do for ours. The period is too remote for legislation; but, in the meanwhile, give your people the bounty land, and let them go and make a settlement and form a nucleus, around which other emigrants may collect, and time will gradually consolidate them into a powerful community, and your treasury will be relieved from the annual expense of maintaining the proposed military post.

A motion was now made for adjournment, and, being carried,

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 22.

Claim of Maison Rouge.

The resolution, offered by Mr. BRENT some days since, in relation to the claim of the representatives of the Marquis de Maison Rouge, to refer that claim to a committee, was taken up.

Mr. BRECK spoke in opposition to the resolution, on the ground that the claim in dispute had been submitted by Mr. Cox, the present holder of the vast tract of land concerned, to a judicial tribunal; in which case, he thought all legislative interference, on the part of this House, would be highly improper. Mr. B. stated a number of facts, in support of this view of the case.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, (Chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims,) replied to Mr. BRECK; and understanding that the suits instituted by Mr. Cox, are only against persons settling on the land without any title at all, (squatters,) thought that these suits, however decided, could not settle the question between the claim of the Marquis de Maison Rouge, and that of the United States.

Mr. BRENT followed, in support of the resolution. He went at some length into the facts of the case, and denied that any suit had been instituted, or, if any, none which could try the claim. No suit could be instituted against the United States, without a law of Congress expressly for the purpose. He knew the settlers personally, and he asserted that not one of them held under any title derived from the Government of the United States; they held under titles from the Spanish Government, and no suit against them could settle the question of Maison Rouge's claim. If Mr. Cox wished to bring his claim before the courts of the United States, his proper course would be, not to oppose the interference of this House, which alone could enable him to accomplish that object, but rather to invite it to act upon the subject.

Mr. RANKIN replied to Mr. BRENT, and detailed the history of the claim, as it had been for five years successively presented to Congress, together with the different general acts of the Government in their application to the land in question. He thought that the suits now instituted would operate to try the question, inasmuch as they would give to Mr. Cox an opportunity to prove his title; and he deemed it a right of the present holder to have his claim fairly investigated by law, provided that, in pursuing it, he interposed no unnecessary delay.

The debate was farther continued by Messrs. BRENT, RANKIN, BRECK, and CAMPBELL; but, as it turned chiefly on the minutiae of the land laws, it was not reported with particularity.

[The lands involved are of great extent and value, occupying almost the whole of the county of Ouachita, in Louisiana. They remain unsettled—have never been exposed to sale, on account of the claim of the Marquis de Maison Rouge. The tract is in possession of Mr. D. W. Cox, of Philadelphia, who holds under the marquis.]

The hour devoted by the rules of the House to the consideration of resolutions having elapsed, the debate was cut short by the Speaker's calling the orders of the day.

Gratitude to Lafayette.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, of Maryland, the House resumed the consideration of the bill yesterday reported by a committee of the House, "concerning General Lafayette."

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, rose, as one of the members of the committee who reported the bill, to speak to the merits of it. The delay in doing so, which had taken place on the part of the committee, would not have occurred if it had been thought necessary to offer to the House any explanation on the subject. The committee, however, thought it would have been only necessary to echo the voice which is heard from one end of the country to the other. They thought the importance and value of the services of General Lafayette had been so generally known, that it was unnecessary to report the facts, in regard to the services of General Lafayette, on which they thought it expedient to recommend the passage of the bill now before the House. They hoped that the proceedings of this House, when, by a unanimous vote, at the last session, they acknowledged the value of those services, would have made such a report unnecessary. By that vote, Congress subjected the country to an expense, nearly, if not quite, equal to the amount of the proposed appropriation, by agreeing to send out a ship of the line to convey General Lafayette to this country. The committee did not calculate, after having done so, and his declining to put the United States to that charge, there would have been any objection to remunerating General Lafayette, in some degree, for his services and sacrifices in the cause of the United States. When, more recently, the Speaker of the House had been directed by an equally unanimous vote, to present the acknowledgments not only of the nation, but of this House, of the important services rendered to the country by General Lafayette, the committee would not have supposed themselves deficient in their duty if they failed to report facts or a statement of accounts in regard to that distinguished man. Speaking for myself, said Mr. L., I considered the proposed appropriation not as an affair of account—not as the payment of a debt due to General Lafayette, but as the expression of a national sentiment, which would do honor not only to this House, but to this people—as an act which would, as far as it goes, serve to take away from us the reproach that Republics are ungrateful. I thought it would not be doing justice to our constituents, if we made this award a matter of valuation—an affair of dollars and cents: I thought a different mode of treating it most respectful to the House—most befitting the dignity of this Government. Other gentlemen, it appears, entertain different views: perhaps they are more correct views. I do not stand here to set up my sentiments against those who think the matter ought to have been treated in a different way. Some think, and I have no doubt they very honestly and sincerely think, that they have no power to express the national gratitude in the manner proposed, or to vote away public money in any case to which a claim to it could not be substantiated on such evidence as would establish it in a court of justice. It was not for the want of such evidence, that the committee did not report it. The evidence in their possession was such as would, if duly weighed, satisfy the most scrupulous, of the justice of giving not only the amount proposed by the committee, but even double that amount.

The services of General Lafayette during the war of the Revolution, Mr. L. said, were known to, and must be acknowledged by, every one. He came to this country at the commencement of the Revolution. He continued his personal services until very shortly before the termination of that war by the treaty of peace. He ceased those personal exertions here, only to render them in the same cause where, at the time, they were more useful. He was, indeed, very instrumental in bringing about that peace so important to us. At that time, yet in prosperity, he would have refused any compensation for his services and sacrifices, had they even been greater than they were. When oppressed by adversity, after the confiscation of the remainder of his princely estate, he accepted from the United States, what he would never before receive, the pay of a Major-General, the rank which he held during the war. But, besides that, he was entitled, upon every principle of strict justice, to the half-pay of a Major-General for life. Owing to the civil mission, which had already been referred to, General Lafayette was not in service at the close of the war, and had not a legal title to this half-pay, but his right to it, on every principle of equity, could not be questioned. To the representatives of another distinguished officer, (General Hamilton,) similarly situated, Congress granted the amount of half-pay which would have been due to him, and that without commutation. The two cases were nearly parallel. The officers had, generally, the option, and almost, if not quite all, availed themselves of it, of receiving a commutation in lieu of half-pay. General Lafayette had not this option, however, from the circumstance already mentioned, of his absence in Europe at the conclusion of the treaty of peace. What would be the amount of half-pay for the more than forty years that have since elapsed, and the long life, which, Mr. L. said, he trusted this venerable man would still live to enjoy? Twenty added to the forty years already expired, would not be deemed an extravagant estimate: these sixty years of half-pay, without calculating interest, would alone amount to something like eighty thousand dollars. Would any gentleman in this hall say, that General Lafayette was not as well entitled to his half-pay as the family of General Hamilton were, after his decease?

But was this all? No, said Mr. L., it is not all. It is known as a public historical fact, that Lafayette, when he came to this country, brought also important and very necessary supplies to a large amount—an immense amount, considering that it was the offering of a single individual. What was the cost of those supplies, is information which chance alone has thrown in our way. Every one knew that it was great; but a mere fortuitous circumstance led a gentleman, lately at Paris, to inquire into what had been the pecuniary sacrifices of Lafayette in the cause of the United States, during the Revolution; and he obtained a document which shows precisely what money Lafayette did expend in our cause at that time. [Mr. L. here made a statement corresponding with that yesterday made in the Senate, by Mr. HARRIS, establishing that the expenditure of Lafayette, for the use of the United States, during the war of the Revolution, was 700,000 francs, or 140,000 dollars, besides sums modestly kept out of the account, which would have increased that sum.] Add this amount to that which is justly due to him for half-pay for life, said Mr. L., and say whether a fair, honest, and equitable settlement of the account between him and the United States, would not leave us in debt to him, interest included, more than double the amount which the committee had reported in his favor. Here then, sir, is an account of dollars and cents, since gentlemen desire it: here is something to satisfy the most scrupulous.

When you offer to General Lafayette these two hundred thousand dollars, you do not pay the debt—you do not pay what you justly owe to him. I am very much afraid, sir, that, in going through this detail, I may wound the delicacy of the gentleman concerned; for I am persuaded that no circumstance would have induced him to bring forward, as a debt, what he owes to us. Half of his princely estates he freely spent in our service, without any other recompense than the secret satisfaction of aiding the cause of liberty, to which he from his cradle had devoted himself.

Mr. L. said he would not press upon the House arguments drawn from the feelings of the people of the United States on this subject. Those feelings, said he, are well known: and from what I know of the temper of this House, and of the feelings of the gentlemen who compose it, there is not one of them who will not regret that any consideration of what he believes to be his duty will prevent him from giving his assent to this bill. I yet trust, however, that the vote on this bill will be unanimous. I hope it will be seen that the whole House is moved by one consentaneous feeling, of obedience to the wishes of our constituents—one desire of expressing the sentiment of national gratitude which we owe to the nature of the Government under which we act—one wish to satisfy our own feelings. I do not believe there is one gentleman in this House who will not excessively regret, that any notion of his duty, or regard to the disposition of the funds of the country, would prevent his giving a vote for this bill.

One circumstance there was, in relation to General Lafayette, which, though it did not come strictly into account, as forming a demand upon this Government, furnished an argument which could not but strongly appeal to this House, in favor of that distinguished individual. [Mr. L. here stated the circumstance of the location of part of General Lafayette's land in the vicinity of New Orleans, and his giving it up to the city, &c., substantially as stated in the Senate yesterday by Mr. HAYNE. Mr. L. had the advantage of personal knowledge of the facts, and of having been the medium of communication with General Lafayette on that subject.] General L. declared, on that occasion, he would enter into no litigation with any one in regard to a grant which the United States had thought proper to make to him. He withdrew the location he had made on a most valuable land, now worth 400,000 dollars, and transferred it to land hardly worth a dollar an acre. Mr. LIVINGSTON said he knew an idea had been held out, that the remainder of the land granted to the General by Congress had been sold very well. What had been obtained for it, he did not know; but he could say, for certainty, that, if anybody had given one dollar an acre for it, they had made a bad bargain. That part of it which he was acquainted with he would not have for a gift. The lands which the General yet held were of no value, as the expense of raising the levee, &c., on the bank of the river, would be greater than the value of the land after it should be so improved.

Knowing a good deal of the circumstances connected with General Lafayette, and having been a member of the committee who reported this bill, he had thought proper to state them, and he hoped what he had said would serve to remove whatever doubts existed on the minds of gentlemen on this subject.

The SPEAKER here corrected an error into which he had fallen, in supposing that a motion for indefinite postponement took preference of a motion to postpone to a day certain. The question being then stated to be on Mr. SLOANE'S motion to recommit with instructions, &c.—

Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, addressed the Chair. He repeated the terms of the motion, to recommit with instructions to report a statement of facts and accounts, &c., because it more clearly indicated the genius of the opposition to this bill, and the principles on which that opposition was based, than any illustration could do. The motion involved the principle that Congress was about to render compensation to General Lafayette under the obligation of a bond. Put it upon that footing, said Mr. McD., and I shall vote against the bill. Put it upon that footing, and General Lafayette will disdain your offer of payment. What were the services which he rendered to this country, and what the motives upon which they were rendered? Did he render those services, and make those disbursements, upon any calculation of future retribution? Did he enter into a computation of what benefits he was thereafter to derive from them? Not so, sir: they were the magnanimous sacrifices of a heart devoted to liberty, reckless of consequences, succoring a people struggling for liberty. When we come to consider these services, rendered under such circumstances, shall we enter into a cold calculation as to what was the actual amount of the sacrifices of General Lafayette, and hold out to the world that we are rendering him this tardy tribute, not as a voluntary offering of the heart, but as the obligation of a bond? I admit, sir, the extent of the services of this individual; I am perfectly satisfied, indeed, that, upon a fair calculation, the interest alone of the money which he spent in our service up to this time would more than double the amount which this bill proposes to appropriate for his use. The extent of his services might well be a motive of this grant; but to refer this bill back to a committee, to make a minute calculation of the money he advanced for us, would be an act of ingratitude and disrespect to his higher and more elevated claims upon the country. Do you expect to obtain vouchers, said Mr. McD., for what was a grant to you, which the generous donor never wished nor intended to reclaim?

Mr. McD. did not intend to express any thing disrespectful to the supporters of the pending motion, but he must be allowed to say there was a degree of indelicacy in it which would shock the sensibility of any honorable mind, and particularly of him whom it was proposed to call upon to be an agent in a case so nearly affecting himself. I very much doubt whether, if he heard this discussion, he would receive your donation. I trust we shall put this offer of an expression of our gratitude on such grounds, that he will be induced to receive it: that we shall not render it as a debt due to him, but as a gratification of our own feelings, and of the feelings of this nation. And, notwithstanding what has occurred here, I trust he will accept the offer, not as his right to receive, but as ours to give, as a gratification to ourselves, and as a small testimony of the gratitude of the nation. Mr. McD. trusted that the House would not attempt to investigate what cannot be proved, and will not; that it would not descend to the investigation of facts which are known to the whole world, and are interwoven with the most interesting and important parts of our own history.

Mr. MANGUM, of North Carolina, expressed his deep regret that, at this stage of a business which must for three weeks past have occupied a considerable portion of the attention of the members of this House, a motion should have been made to recommit this bill to investigate facts in the case: and he said he could not view the present motion in any other light than as one which was in effect to test the success of the present measure. On this subject, Mr. M. said, he most heartily concurred in the views of the gentleman who had just taken his seat. What, said he, is the object of this reference? To go into a calculation of pounds, shillings, and pence, with our distinguished benefactor, which he would reject with disdain, and which could not but fill his breast with scorn at the proposition. Such an investigation would be, besides, absolutely impracticable, except by submitting the private concerns and feelings of this distinguished person to a scrutiny which he would shrink from, and which we ought not to require. Are we to call upon that individual to lay before us his vouchers for voluntary donations for our benefit forty years ago? Are we thus to compensate those services which are known even to every schoolboy in our country? I should deem such an examination, if its institution was thought necessary, fatal to this bill, because the objects which it would profess to seek after could never be obtained. And is it believed, by the mover and supporters of this proposition, that General Lafayette, his fortunes being reduced, has been invited to our shores in the imposing manner we have seen; that he has been received everywhere with an enthusiasm which does honor to the sons of heroes—to be called upon here to produce vouchers for his claims upon our gratitude?

I have great respect, said Mr. M., for the scruples of gentlemen on the score of precedent; but, for myself, I believe that such a case as this can never again occur; and, if it shall, will this people shrink from meeting it? The gentleman from Louisiana has given an exposition which, it appears to me, must satisfy every one who heard it as to the right of General Lafayette to receive compensation from the United States for services and sacrifices. But, sir, are we to spread a Procrustean bed for the feelings of that distinguished individual to be tortured upon? Are we to give the exact pound of flesh, without one jot of blood? Is such the feeling in which the proceeding towards General Lafayette originated? If it is, the reproach is yet just, the adage is ratified, that Republics are ungrateful. I hope, sir, that the bill will not be recommitted, and that this House will not undertake to render justice to merits and services such as Lafayette's under the influence of a pettifogging disposition, adapted to no higher vocation than litigation in small affairs before inferior courts. I could wish, for the honor of the American name, and still more for the honor of this House, that no such affair as this should have been meditated, unless we get out of the discussion of it in a manner more reputable than I begin to apprehend we shall.

Mr. M. said he did not understand, from what had been said, that any opposition was made to this bill on the score of principle. If we turn over our records, said he, we shall find divers instances of appropriations in a much stronger manner impugning the principles advanced against this bill, than this bill does—instances of money granted merely in the way of gratuity, the present case being by no means one of that character. Was it, at this day, to be seriously argued, that General Lafayette stood, in relation to our Revolution, on the footing of one of the people whose liberties were asserted by it? The correct distinction between the two cases had been drawn elsewhere, that, where a foreign enemy invades a country, all its inhabitants are equally embarked in the contest, and must abide by the consequences of it, it not being in the power of the Government to indemnify all individual losers in such a war. But was that the case with a generous foreigner, whose fortune and talent are liberally embarked in the defence of the oppressed party in the contest? Surely not. It never can be the feeling of America that we should deal to him precisely the measure of strict right. But, let the present case be put even on that ground: it was proved by the exposition of the gentleman from Louisiana, and by facts of historical notoriety, that the proposed grant would still be inadequate to the demands of justice. Mr. M. therefore expressed an earnest hope, that, as General Lafayette had set up no claim in his case, inasmuch as he was not a plaintiff in this action, and the case was not to be tried upon technical pleadings, that the services which he rendered in the morning of his fortunes, would be met by this nation in a corresponding spirit, now that he is in the eve of his life.

The present motion, said Mr. M., I must consider as testing the strength of the bill; and sure I am, that, if we listen to the voice of all these people, who, in their person felt the horrors and privations of the Revolution, or of the true descendants of their fathers who did feel them, we shall very much misrepresent them if we refuse to make the old age of Lafayette easy and comfortable. As one of the committee, I have felt it my duty to say, that I decline a technical examination of the services of this veteran, because his services were never rendered in that spirit, and the people do not wish to meet them in it.

Mr. HERRICK, of Maine, then rose, and said, that from the motion that he had submitted to the House, it might be supposed that he was in favor of the indefinite postponement of the bill, as being opposed to the bill itself. He was glad to have an opportunity to explain his views, and remove any false impression which might have been made in this particular. So far from being opposed either to the principle or to the form of the bill, he was, on the contrary, prepared to vote for almost any sum which the House should think fit to give, and had flattered himself that the bill, as introduced by the committee, would have passed the House without opposition: he did hope that there would not even be one word of discussion on the subject; but, from the course which things had already taken, he felt apprehensive that any thing which the House might now do would be ineffectual, as he greatly doubted whether, after what had happened, the individual concerned would accept the donation, should it be made. This was one of those acts, of which it might emphatically be said, that, if done at all, it must be done quickly. If we are to sit, in cold debate, discussing and disputing the minutiae of such a bill, our passing it, he feared, would be in vain. Yet, still, if gentlemen shall conclude to pass this bill, they might rely upon it that he, for one, would never oppose its passage, when that question was fairly presented to him.

Mr. BARTLETT said that he rose, not to discuss the measure before the House, but to submit a proposition, which he hoped would render discussion unnecessary. He should regret deeply to see the Journal burdened with records of yeas and nays, motions and amendments, in a case like this. He had hoped that this bill would have passed in a manner as spontaneous as unanimous. He had hoped that, when we sent for General Lafayette, and invited him, by a public act, to our shores, it was not to ask who he is, what he has done, and why we have called him; he had supposed that we knew who General Lafayette was, and that none needed to ask what he had done. But he had had reason, since the delay and opposition which had occurred to such a bill as this, to think that it would be more honorable to the country, that yet further delay should now take place, in order, if possible, to give unanimity to its act on the subject. I cannot but remember, said he, that it is scarce ten days since we passed, with great unanimity, a bill to reward our own services, and I did suppose that the services of Lafayette were at least as well known, and as highly estimated, as ours. He was desirous that the bill should pass, not as a forced, but as a deliberate measure. He was unwilling to press it against an opposition which, if persevered in, must operate to take away all the grace of our gratuity. And, under these impressions, he was desirous of postponing the motion to recommit, and this whole subject, till Monday next.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, then rose, and observed, that having yesterday had the courage, perhaps some would say the audacity, to make some little opposition to this bill, which had been precipitated into this House like a comet through the atmosphere, it might be expected that he should give some explanation of the reasons which had influenced him. He did not rise to oppose the resolution for postponement, for he was himself in favor of it. He wished, for himself, some further time for reflection, and he could not but say that there was some little ill-nature in the remark of the gentleman from North Carolina, (and he was sorry to say so, for no gentleman on that floor was, in general, more decorous in debate,) that two weeks had already been spent in this subject. But why had this time been allowed the committee, unless to give them opportunity, by reflection, to mature the measure they should present to the House. The gentleman should remember, that to the House nothing like this time had been allowed—indeed no time at all. And though the minds of the gentlemen of the committee might be fully made up, yet they were not to expect that, therefore, the minds of other gentlemen must also be so. It was not strange that, on a subject like this, there should exist some diversity of opinion. For his own part, Mr. C. said, he had never been opposed to the principle of the bill, and he would candidly state how far he had felt willing to go. He would have been in favor of granting a sum of $50,000, and allowing General Lafayette the pay of a Major General for life. Had this been done, would it not have been quite as decorous, as attempting to force the bill through the House in its present form, without one word of explanation from the committee? Let us, said Mr. C., have time to commune with each other, and with the gentlemen who brought in the bill, as they have had time to commune with each other; but, if we must be taken by surprise now, I, for one, shall oppose the bill, and am willing to meet the consequences of that opposition, be they what they may—even though I may be so unhappy as to incur the displeasure of the gentleman from Louisiana, whose good opinion I confess I value as much as that of any other citizen I know. I feel that I have a duty to perform; I certainly shall perform it, nor can any power of man prevent me from doing it. With these observations, Mr. CAMPBELL expressed a hope that the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. BARTLETT) would prevail, for a postponement of this question for a few days.

After some explanations from the Speaker, as to the point of order, Mr. TUCKER, of Va., moved to lay the bill on the table, his object being to give time for conciliating a unanimous vote on the bill. The question being taken, this motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, then rose, not, he observed, to wound the feelings of the House, by debating the principle of the bill before them, for, on that topic, he was persuaded there existed within those walls but one sentiment. He rose chiefly with the view of corroborating some of the statements which had been submitted to the House by the honorable member from Louisiana, (Mr. LIVINGSTON.) In doing so, he thought he should be able to win to the support of the bill the honorable member from Ohio, (Mr. CAMPBELL;) and, in so designating him, he did not use the language of ordinary courtesy, for he cherished habitual respect for his honorable friend. He rose, Mr. M. said, with no faint hope, however feeble his resources for the task, that he should prevail on all the gentlemen, who, to his great regret, differed from the majority of the House on the details of the bill, and for whose scruples he entertained the most indulgent respect, to unite with the friends of the bill in a unanimous vote. The question presented by the opponents of the bill, admitted of but two doubts, of the facts or the inferences from them, on which the assertion is grounded, that the grant proposed by the bill, to our illustrious guest, falls short of his pecuniary claims upon our justice.

Having been himself the medium through whom the manuscript which had been just read, had passed into the hands of the honorable member from Louisiana, he felt it to be incumbent on him to verify its authenticity.

On its very face, which bore marks of antiquity correspondent with its ancient date, it carried strong internal evidence of its truth, which was corroborated by a knowledge of the highly respectable channel through which it had very recently reached America. It moreover referred to a prior document submitted by the writer, who had charge of the estates of General Lafayette, to the Bureau of Emigrants of the Department of the Seine, early in the year 1793; at a time when the Revolutionary government of France sought to accomplish two purposes by inquiring into the condition and the causes of the dilapidation of the estates of General Lafayette, then proscribed, and driven from France by their crimes and their injustice.

This agent, Mons. Morizet, with a modesty derived from the example of the amiable man he served, reduces the sum of those expenditures which General Lafayette had incurred in the service of the United States, the cost of two voyages to France, and had in this account stricken from the entire sum of 1,038,000 francs, 388,000. But, as these voyages, attended at the time with peculiar hazard, were undertaken at the request of General Washington, and for the obvious benefit of the United States, these expenses, instead of being deducted, should be added to the account. To a sum, therefore, exceeding two hundred thousand dollars, should be added the interest for the forty-three years which have elapsed since the last expenditure of this long account, which would swell it to thrice the amount of the proposed appropriation.

The honorable member from Louisiana very justly computed the half-pay equitably due to General Lafayette, for the same period; but, in omitting to notice the interest as equitably due on it, he left out a sum which would have swelled that single item to an amount equivalent to the object of our present debate.

With respect to the generous release, by General Lafayette, of the land which he had acquired near New Orleans, under our own grant, Mr. M. said he was perfectly acquainted with all the circumstances attending the transaction, through the voluntary communication of the Commissioner of the Land Office; and that they left no doubt on his mind of the validity or value of the title which General Lafayette had released, with equal generosity and delicacy.

The United States granted to General Lafayette, in part as his legal bounty, and in part as a manifestation of their esteem, 11,540 acres of land, to be chosen out of any of the public lands of the United States. He chose, for the location of a part of it, to use a term borrowed from our laws, an ungranted territory, which nearly environed the city of New Orleans. A large part of this location has since become the heart of the city. In the midst of it stands the custom house; it is the theatre of extensive trade, and covered with numerous and splendid edifices. The title of General Lafayette to this land, under our own grant, was indisputable. Some years after he had appropriated it to his use, the Corporation of New Orleans petitioned Congress to grant to them the portion of the public territory within a distance of six hundred yards around their city, and the National Legislature, unapprised of the claims of the prior occupant, conceded what they asked. Of the superior title of General Lafayette to the land covered by this subsequent grant, there could be no doubt. Why he did not prosecute and maintain his claim to this estate, so honorably and justly acquired, has been already fully stated to the House. This donation had been made him without his knowledge, in the fulness of our hearts, touched as they were with a knowledge of his wants, as a token of our sympathy, esteem, and gratitude; and he felt that it did not become him to question the precise extent of such a grant.

The value of the land which he so magnanimously relinquished, has, doubtless, not been overrated, at four hundred thousand dollars.

Can there remain a question, then, but that the equitable claims of General Lafayette upon the United States, were he disposed to substantiate them, would exceed a million of dollars?

For himself, said Mr. M., he had hoped that the stock which the Senate had proposed to issue—and he greatly preferred their bill to that which had originated in this House, instead of being made redeemable among the last debts of the nation, would have been irredeemable forever, that it might forever remain a memorial of the gratitude of the American people to their illustrious benefactor. He had hoped that the land presented with the stock, instead of being limited to a poor township, would have reached such an extent, as to realize, in its future appreciation, to the descendants of General Lafayette, the entire debt of this nation to their generous ancestor.

He did not mean to comprehend our debt to this, our benefactor, for his services, but for his pecuniary advances and their accruing interest.

As to his services to our cause—the cause of freedom in Europe and America, their value is immeasurable. There is not a man who now, or may hereafter tread our soil or breathe our air, with the elastic spirit of liberty, who is not, or will not owe him an inestimable debt,—a debt to be felt, not to be computed. I defy the united powers of Euclid and Archimedes to calculate or measure the height and depth, the length and breadth of the obligation of America to her benefactor. It is here, said Mr. M., (laying his hand upon his heart.) It belongs to the soul, and no gauge can graduate it.

Are gentlemen alarmed at what is called the example, the precedent, we are about to offer to our successors? I have labored, said Mr. M., with all the powers of memory, to recall to my mind an example of disinterested and heroic benevolence which can form a parallel to the conduct of Lafayette; and if the history of the past affords none, why need we not trust the future? The only spirit of prophecy which is not of divine inspiration, exists in the analogy which infers the future from the past.

But what is the character of the example from which this unfounded apprehension arises? Was it not to our fathers, is it not to us, and will it not be to our posterity, invaluable? Need we go back to the crusades to demonstrate the influence, the contagion of chivalrous enthusiasm? No sooner was the consecrated banner of Peter the Hermit unfurled for the recovery of the Redeemer's sepulchre from the infidel Saracen, than one spark of inspiration electrified all Europe; one common soul pervaded all Christendom, and poured her armed nations on the plains of Asia.

Contrast the heroism of that age with the solitary self-devotion of Lafayette! When I look back to the early period of our Independence, and behold our own unrecognized ministers in France, with a tenderness which does them immortal honor, remonstrating with the young enthusiast on the hazard and hopelessness of his projected enterprise in our behalf—when I hear them, in a tone of generous remonstrance, tell him that our cause was sinking, and they had not even a vessel to offer him for his perilous voyage, and hear him reply, "I have, then, no time to lose!" I cannot, turning from this scene to that before me, bring myself to believe, that gentlemen, who differ from the obvious majority of this House, need to rest three nights upon their pillow, before they can arrive at unanimity upon this bill. I cannot but believe, sir, that when we come to the vote, we shall do it with one heart, and that we are now as well prepared as we shall be on Monday next. We have now met our opponents in the spirit of friendly explanation; we have complied with their wishes—stated, recapitulated; and, I fervently trust, they are ready to act with us for the honor of our common country.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, then rose, and said that, as one of the members of the committee to whom this subject had been confided by the House, he felt it his duty to that committee, and to himself, to say a few words in vindication of the course which had been pursued in relation to this bill. Complaints had been urged by some members of the House, that no statement had been produced of what seemed to be considered as "the accounts" of Gen. Lafayette. The committee had never insulted that individual by asking, in any quarter, for such things as his accounts. After the President of the United States had, in his solemn address to both Houses of Congress, recommended the services and sacrifices of General Lafayette as worthy of legislative regard, and had advised that such a provision would be made for him as "might correspond with the sentiments of the American people, and be worthy of the character of this nation," what had a committee to whom that recommendation was committed by this House, to do with his accounts? Were they to erect themselves into a Committee of Claims where no claim was made; and what was more, where no such thing as a claim would be endured by that House, as violating the feelings of a man whom it wished to honor? Ask for his accounts! Sir, I would not perform such a task. Not even were you to order me, could I do it without insulting him. No, sir, we had no such matters as the accounts of General Lafayette to lay before the House.

Sir, let us remember that the eyes of Europe are this moment upon us. Her monarchs, her people, are anxiously waiting to see how we shall act. The despots of the Old World are anxious to know whether, after inviting Lafayette to our shores—after offering to send a national ship to bring him over—after welcoming him from city to city, we are about to send him back and subject him to the sneers of royalty, and with him, to expose ourselves and the cause of free government to their reproaches. The question we are called to decide is, whether America, for whom he shed his blood, devoted his fortune, and dedicated his talents and his virtues, is about to send back her benefactor in the face of Europe, to be the object of their scorn, and leave the record of our proceedings as a monument of the feelings of the American people. The question before us is, whether we will support the principles of our own Government in our conduct towards one who has been considered on both continents as the great Apostle of Liberty, and justly so considered; for, next to the great Apostle of the Gentiles himself, has this man served the best interests of mankind. Next in value to those which the one disseminated, are the blessings which the other has labored to spread among the nations of the world. The question is, whether his services are worth a memorial? This, it is true, is not needed for his character; as has been well said on a public occasion, "history has already taken charge of his fame;" but, as was justly observed by the presiding officer of this House, General Lafayette now stands among posterity, and our act this day is to be the judgment of posterity on his merits and his fame. Are we then here to record our value for civil liberty and all the blessings it bestows, or is it that we may send one of the greatest benefactors her cause has ever known, back to his country as a witness of the ingratitude of Republics? But I said I would not speak of his services, nor will I. Whoever has known or read our history can be no stranger to what he has done for us. It is to be known to-day what we think to be due at least to our character as a nation.

The question was then taken, on the motion of Mr. SLOANE, and decided in the negative.

The question was then taken, on the motion of Mr. GAZLAY, to strike out 200,000 dollars, the amount proposed to be paid to General Lafayette, and to insert 100,000, and decided in the negative by a large majority.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

It was then ordered that the bill should be read a third time to-day.

The bill was then read a third time, accordingly, and the question thereupon decided, on request of Mr. BENOHER, by Yeas and Nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander of Virginia, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Allison, Archer, Bailey, Bayles, Barber of Connecticut, P. P. Barbour, J. S. Barbour, Bartlett, Bartley, Bassett, Blair, Breck, Brent, Brown, Buchanan, Buckner, Cam-

When the yeas and nays had been called and recorded, the SPEAKER rose, and observing that, having been precluded by the place he held, from the expression of his sentiments in relation to either the principle or the form of the bill, he requested of the House that he might be permitted so far to give expression to his feelings, in relation to both, as to record his vote with those of the other members; and, leave having been promptly given, the Clerk called the Speaker's name, and his vote was recorded in the affirmative.

The engrossed bill "To provide for occupying the Columbia or Oregon River," was read a third time.

And the question then recurring on the final passage of the bill, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 118, noes 57.

So the bill was passed. Its title was altered, at the suggestion of Mr. FLOYD, by omitting the words "Columbia or" before the word Oregon, and then the bill was sent to the Senate.

MONDAY, December 27.

Niagara Sufferers.

On motion of Mr. TRACY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, in the chair,) on the bill "further to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, rose in opposition to the bill. The principle of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TRACY,) is, that, though the house should have been occupied on the first day of the war and destroyed on the last, the Government is bound to indemnify the sufferer, because the war is its own act. Sir, I not only deny this position, but I greatly doubt if the Government is answerable in any case. I know that, on this point, writers on national law differ in their opinions. But I hold it to be the sentiment of the best of these writers, that Government is not liable for any destruction of property by an enemy. The gentleman says, that the citizens on an exposed frontier are, or ought to be, the objects of peculiar protection to their Government. I question this. Sir, is not every citizen under this Government free? Does he not choose for himself the place of his abode? Does he not know that, on a maritime frontier, especially, he will enjoy advantages peculiar to that situation—advantages of marked—advantages of easy and cheap transportation, which the citizens in the interior cannot possess? And does he not know, on the other hand, that in case of the recurrence of a state of war, the frontier will, of course, be most exposed to danger; and if, in his opinion, the advantages to be enjoyed do not fully compensate the danger to be incurred, is he obliged to go there? The citizen in the interior is forced to march many miles to defend him, and also has to pay taxes for the same object—and would we compel him, after the war is over, to pay all his losses too? Sir, the Government of a country ought to be just, not only before a war, but during the war, and after the war. If the citizen in the interior must pay what he on the frontier suffered by the war, why ought not the citizen on the frontier to pay him of the interior for his expenses in coming to aid him? It is a bad rule that will not work both ways. The gentleman from New York well knows that citizens on the frontier have commonly an active part in occasioning the wars of a country, (especially wars on a commercial question,) and yet he tells us that if you do not give them special protection, they will be in danger of making terms with the enemy. Sir, let them do it—and then let them see whether their Government will not know how to punish such behavior. They call on Government just as if they had had no hand or part in bringing on the war—as if it were the doing of the interior exclusively—yet we all know, and so do they, that the reverse is true.

It is in the nature of things impracticable, that a Government should pay for every loss its citizens may sustain by a state of warfare. All such as are merely incidental must be borne by the sufferers.

And, as the Government is not bound in equity to repay losses of this kind, so neither is it a dictate of sound policy that they should do so. Once adopt this practice, and you render yourselves assailable at once. Especially if you have an extensive seaboard, and a maritime foe, you invite him to aggression; you make it his policy to depredate; you give him the strongest temptation to transfer the war from your person to your property; you take from war every thing of a brave and noble character, and make it a mere game of burning and pillage. Surely this one consideration is enough to warn us against sanctioning such a bill as is now before the committee. Refuse to pay such losses, and what will be the effect? The effect will be that the frontier citizen will do his utmost to defend himself and his property. You call in the aid of two passions instead of one. If a man is sure of being repaid for the devastations of the enemy, his only motive to resist them will be his patriotism; but, if he knows he is to receive no indemnity, he will fight not only from patriotism, but from self-interest. The gentleman cannot be so unacquainted with the nature of the human mind, as not to perceive the effect of bringing in such a principle to aid the arm of the citizen soldier.

I must now say a few words on the doctrine of retaliation. The gentleman seems to think that the burning of Newark, by the American troops under McClure, was a wanton and improper act; and, in his report at a former session, he charges it on our Government, and maintains that the enemy had a right to retaliate. Sir, I deny his position in toto; I say, and I hope to prove, first, that the destruction of Newark was not a wanton act; and, secondly, that the enemy had not the least right to retaliate it. If the gentleman had directed his views a little farther on this subject, he would have been able to perceive and to trace the same predatory spirit which led to the devastation of the Niagara frontier, prevailing through both our wars with England. In the war of the Revolution, as well as through all the stages of our late contest, they were actuated by the same temper towards us. [In support of this position, Mr. W. went into a series of quotations from the history of both wars, referred to the conduct of the British army under Cornwallis, and when led by the traitor Arnold—to the burning of Falmouth, the ravaging of New Jersey, and the cruelties on board the Jersey prison ship, in which eleven thousand men were said to have perished. He then proceeded to the conduct of Admiral Cockburn at Frenchtown, Havre de Grace, Georgetown, Fredericktown, and Hampton, interposing comments as he proceeded, and arguing, from the whole, the prevalence of a mean, dastardly, malignant spirit of revenge and personal cruelty.] Now, (said Mr. W.,) I put it to the gentleman from New York to say, after all this series of conduct, from February to May, 1818, whether the destruction of one village, eight months afterwards, could be considered as a wanton act of aggression? No, sir—no; if the American army, instead of burning the village of Newark, had laid waste with fire and sword the whole Canadian frontier, they would have inflicted an act of retaliation well merited by the barbarities perpetrated at Hampton alone. But was this an act of our Government? The Government disavowed the act the moment they heard of it. Was this an act of wanton destruction done for its own sake, and a parallel to the British murders and ravishings in the Chesapeake? It was a purely military movement, necessary to the destruction of Fort George; deliberate notice was sent to the inhabitants, and time allowed them to remove their persons and effects. As a pretended retaliation for such an act, the enemy landed on the 19th, burnt Lewistown, Youngstown, Manchester, and even the little village of the Tuscarora Indians. No notice was given—no time for removal of goods, or even for personal escape; and so far was the injury from being confined even to all these villages, that the whole country was fired and laid waste; they burned, they ravaged every object they could reach; but I cannot preserve a due command of my feelings when I reflect on those scenes. Sir, we find the same thing from '76 to 1815, the same conduct, the same spirit; and, with facts like these within their knowledge, the Committee of Claims did right in denying, as I now deny, all right on the part of the enemy, to waste that frontier on the principle of lawful retaliation, and the consequent right of the claimants on that ground. The law says that, in order to indemnity, it must be shown that the occupation of the property for military purposes was the cause of its destruction. Now, sir, let me put a case. Suppose the enemy in the Potomac, within cannon shot of this city; and suppose one of the houses here was occupied as a barracks for troops, and in a bombardment of the city with red-hot balls, that house should with others be destroyed, would the owners have a just claim, under the law, to be repaid its value? No, sir; the Government would be bound to no such thing. It was not the occupation of the house as a barracks that caused it to be destroyed—the enemy was not to know of such occupation; the house was destroyed with others not so occupied; it was a casualty, and the sufferer must bear his loss.

On these grounds, Mr. Speaker, I am decidedly of opinion that this bill ought not to pass. If it does, it will not only make a destruction of your treasury, but it will be an act without a parallel in the history of legislation. I will venture to assert that such a law is not to be found within the lids of any code among civilized nations. The gentleman, indeed, says the Emperor of Russia has made a similar allowance to his citizens—subjects I would say—he has no citizens; but the case is widely different from that before us. The damage for which Alexander made allowance was made by his own authority—the burning was his own act. But that for which we are called to empty the treasury is the act of an enemy. If, indeed, these losses had been occasioned by the act of an American force, acting under legitimate authority, I should say, under my present impressions, pay the demand. But the case is widely different. I was always opposed to the act of 1816—but when it had passed and became a law, the Committee of Claims, so far from impeding its operation, honestly endeavored to carry it into effect, not viewing the claim of the sufferers as a right which the Government had been forced to allow, but as a claim of suffering fellow-men to whom relief had been extended as an act of compassion and charity.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, said that, however widely the gentleman from North Carolina differed from him, as to the justice of these claims, he was glad to find there was no difference of opinion as to the atrocious character of the enemy's conduct during the late war. It was impossible to forget the horrors of Hampton and Havre de Grace—the Vandalism here; or the massacre of our countrymen on the Raisin. These were acknowledged to be contrary to the usages of civilized war; and retribution for these losses was due from the enemy, and not from our own Government. But the case now before the committee was of another character—one, as he thought, strictly within the rule laid down by the gentleman from North Carolina; that wherever, by military occupation, the property had acquired a military character, it was rendered liable to destruction by the enemy; such he considered to be peculiarly the case on the Niagara frontier. But, on this subject he would quote an authority which could not be objected to—[Mr. C. then read the evidence of General Porter, to establish the military character of the frontier generally throughout the war; the houses upon it being almost without exception occupied for public stores, arsenals, barracks, quarters, &c.] There were other depositions, Mr. C. said, all in accordance with this, which it was unnecessary to detain the House by referring to. If ever there was a case of military occupation, this appeared to be completely so. If a Government was, in any case, bound to indemnify its citizens for losses, this certainly was one. Mr. C. said he should not contend that Government was bound to indemnify its citizens for the value of all the towns and villages falling within the track of an invading army, nor for all the losses incidental to war; but he should contend that, as far as the ability of the nation extends, it ought to indemnify its citizens for losses occasioned by military occupation; and he did not doubt the ability of this nation to pay all such losses.

With regard to the question of retaliation, he differed with the gentleman from North Carolina. He had never before heard that the burning of Newark was on our part a measure of retaliation. He had always thought that, as the villages on each side of the frontier were occupied by the troops of both nations—and as they could not remain on this frontier during the winter without the use of these villages—they were throughout the war at all times liable to destruction on both sides, as they were absolutely necessary, both to us and to the enemy. It was, he presumed, for that reason these villages were destroyed. The enemy had no such justification for other atrocities. It was doing injustice to our country to attribute the burning of Newark to a motive of retaliation.

Whatever might be the usages of European nations as to making indemnity for losses, he could not think these rules applicable to our condition—they were better designed for nations surrounded by warlike and powerful neighbors, liable to continual invasions, rendering indemnity almost out of the question, if not impracticable. Our condition was different. In looking forward to future wars, he had no apprehension of invasion, if the Government persisted in the policy it was now pursuing. Indeed, if the same policy had been pursued at an earlier period, our country never would have been invaded. He could not think that any alarming principle would be established by the bill. Our future wars—the theatre of our future wars, would be carried far beyond our boundaries—they must be upon the ocean. Our country will never be again invaded. The spirit of invasion, and the record of our disgrace, perished together in the flame of Orleans.

TUESDAY, December 28.

On motion of Mr. TRACY, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill "further to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR said that his design in rising was not to oppose the details of the bill now before the committee, but to offer a proposition superseding them altogether. He wished to test the sense of this House on the principle of the bill, and with this view he moved to strike out the enacting clause. It was not his intention to detain the committee by any prolonged discussion; he wished to direct them at once to the principle of the measure, and, in doing so, he should submit to their consideration some general principles of national law, and a few facts which he thought had a bearing on the question before them.

It had been his fortune to be a member of this House when the subject of these claims was first brought before Congress, and he had at that time borne some small share in discussing it. He now begged leave to recall some of the considerations he had at that time urged, and in doing so he should be very brief. The great question to be settled is this—What is the nature and character, and what is the extent, of the obligation which a whole community owes to its individual members for losses sustained during a state of warfare from acts of the enemy? (for in this case a broad distinction was to be preserved between acts of an enemy and the acts done by the authority of our own Government.) Now, said Mr. B., it seems to me that, as to the obligations of the Government in such a case, there can be but one sound general principle assumed. Whenever a war is declared, the immediate consequence of such declaration is to place every individual of each Government, together with the property of every individual of each, in a relation reciprocally hostile to each other; and, according to the original principles of international law, each nation had a right to do the other all the harm it could, indiscriminately, without respect to any distinction of persons or property. But such a principle has long been abandoned by all civilized nations—and the rule which has by general usage been substituted in its place, seems to be that, as to persons, non-combatants shall be as exempt from danger or injury as if the two nations were in a state of perfect amity—and with respect to property, unless in certain extraordinary circumstances, that it shall not be subject to destruction or injury, unless it be immediately connected with and used for the purposes of war. From these doctrines of international law, as held by all civilized nations, it results, as a general principle, that, for all the losses which the people under either Government sustain in consequence of the declaration of war, they have no demand upon their Government for indemnification, because all share in one common fate. The law presumes a tacit stipulation among the members of a community, that they shall share its fortunes whether of good or evil; but if, by any act of the Government, property which otherwise would have remained in a state of safety, is withdrawn from its pacific character, under which it was not liable to injury by an enemy, and invested with a warlike character, a character which exposes it as an object of hostility, the Government shall be bound to indemnify the owner for any damage it may sustain in consequence of such change of character. This rule will apply to property of every description. If a house, for example, be taken by the Government, and made a place of deposit for troops or for military stores, and while thus occupied is destroyed legitimately by the enemy, so that that occupancy was the cause of its destruction, the Government is bound—the individual who owned the house has suffered from a new character induced upon his property by the act of the Government.

On this principle, the act of 1816 directed that when such a state of facts should be proved, the amount of their loss should be paid to those who suffered under such circumstances. But are we to go farther? Are we to allow claims for all the ravages which an enemy may perpetrate contrary to the law of nations? Surely not. I can, indeed, suppose a case where a whole extensive district of country is laid waste by an incursion of the enemy, and all its inhabitants reduced to ruin. How far such a case might address itself to the sympathy of the Government—what appeals it might make to compassion and humanity—how far it might melt our feelings or call for our charity, is a question wholly different from the question we are now arguing. We are now speaking of what has for distinction's sake been called a perfect obligation. Such as might arise from the case I have supposed, can only amount to what is called an imperfect obligation. A man is under such imperfect obligation to give to any miserable fellow-creature whom he can without impropriety relieve. But he cannot be forced to do so. There exists nothing like that sort of obligation by which a man is bound to pay his debts. The appeal, in one case, is to liberality, to pity, to compassion; in the other case it is to strict and naked justice. The difference is immense. The one obligation is tangible—it can be measured—it can be reduced to a fixed and definite limit. The other is of a nature which can neither be limited nor measured—it eludes our scrutiny—it is a thing of feeling merely. Now, what one individual may justly force another individual to do, he might, with the same justice, force a Government to do—but, as its sovereignty interposes to render this impossible, the Government ought, and is bound, to do it of its own act. In the case of a perfect obligation, there is no choice, no limit, or restriction; the thing must be done, and to the whole extent of such obligation; but, in case of an imperfect obligation, we may pause, we may inquire into circumstances, we may consider our means, we may listen to the dictates of policy, and act as we make up our free choice upon the whole case when considered. But this bill proceeds on the principle that the Government is bound to make compensation, and it is on that principle that I wish to try the sense of the committee by a motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. I may illustrate my idea by an example taken from the municipal law. Suppose a case of larceny; is the Government bound to pay the loser? Certainly not. But it is bound to punish the thief, if it can catch him. So, if a foreign nation has inflicted lawless injury on a citizen, his Government is bound to punish that nation, if it can, but not to indemnify the citizen out of the public chest. [Here Mr. BARBOUR quoted the bill, and urged and enforced the objection which had yesterday been made to it by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) viz: that it would provide for payment, should a house have been occupied but a night upon a march, in the first week of the war, and not destroyed by the enemy till the last week of it.] The principle I advocate would repudiate such an allowance. The occupancy alone removed the house from its ordinary condition, and, by giving it a military use, rendered it liable to attack and destruction, on the principles of civilized warfare. But that occupancy has ceased—the house returns to its ordinary character—it is now not lawful to destroy it, and if it is destroyed, the Government is not bound to pay for it.

Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, said he did not rise for the purpose of extending the debate, nor should he have risen at all, had the principles by which he should be governed on this occasion been enunciated with sufficient distinctness. He cordially agreed with the learned gentleman from Virginia, on most points, but thought he had not fully explained the reason of the distinction he had made. Mr. B. said he was not aware of any instance in which a Government was bound to indemnify for a belligerent act, considered simply as such, and most of the difficulty which had occurred arose from cases where property was destroyed by the enemy, when in possession of the Government. But Mr. B. begged the committee to remember that no difference existed in these cases, whether the property was destroyed by the enemy or the Government itself. And the reason was this: every well-regulated Government, when it takes the property of the citizen, is bound to pay for it; and if it is taken for a temporary use, to return it in a state as good as it received it. When, therefore, it is destroyed by the enemy, the Government is deprived of the power of performing the moral obligation under which it labors, and can only make compensation in money, which it is bound to do. Nor can it take advantage of the same defence, as an individual, for the non-performance of its contract. For the private lessee defends on the ground of inevitable necessity—a necessity against which he could not by possibility defend—but the Government being intrusted with the whole power of the nation for its defence, is not permitted to avail itself of this excuse. For this reason, Mr. B. said, his vote would be entirely regulated by the proof how far the property in question was in the actual possession of the Government; and, if it was not in such possession, he conceived the petitioners had no greater claim than every individual subjected to the vicissitudes of war.

Mr. TRACY, of New York, then took the floor, in support of the bill, and had been addressing the House for some time, when,

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, the committee rose; and, having obtained leave to sit again,

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 29.

Georgia Militia Claims.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, according to notice, moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs on the claim of that State for compensation for services performed by her militia in 1798-'4.

The motion was carried—ayes 68, noes 56.

Mr. THOMPSON then moved to recommit the report to the same committee, with instructions "to report a bill making an appropriation for the payment of the said claims; the appropriation to be conformed to the report of the Secretary of War, made to this House upon the subject of those claims, in the year 1803, and to embrace each class of claims respectively, as described in that report."

In support of this motion, Mr. THOMPSON rose, and addressed the House as follows:

It becomes my duty, said Mr. T., as a Representative of the people of Georgia, to urge upon the attention of the House the consideration of the claim which is exhibited in the report now before you. It is with some hesitancy I make this attempt, not because I doubt the strength or fairness of the claim, but because so just a claim has been so long neglected by the United States. Unused, as I am, to address the ear of this House, and notwithstanding the embarrassment under which (I am conscious) I in some sort labor, I dare believe that, if I am so fortunate as to have the indulgence of an attentive hearing, for a few minutes, I shall be able to satisfy the House, not only of the justness of these claims, but that they ought to be paid by the United States.

It may be thought that I have, in the prosecution of my object, to combat prejudices which are, perhaps, supposed to exist against these claims, in consequence of the several rejections of them by committees of this House, to whom the subject has been heretofore referred. No, sir, I will not insult this House by supposing that such rejections have dictated to them a decision upon this subject. I intend no disrespect to the committees who have heretofore reported against these claims; on the contrary, I cherish towards the gentlemen who composed those committees, sentiments of proper respect; indeed, I anticipate, with some confidence, that some of those gentlemen will review their decision upon this subject. If such rejections, however, are considered as amounting to an argument against these claims, in reply to such argument, I will only say, (and I presume it is admissible to say,) that the fact of the very favorable reception these claims have heretofore met in the Senate, together with the several reports made in this House, favorable to the claimants, should be received as a counter-vailing argument. The only ground upon which the Committee on Military Affairs found their rejection of these claims, is the assumption that these claims were adjusted by the Treaty of Cession entered into between the State of Georgia and the United States, on the 24th day of April, 1802, which is a virtual admission that they were originally just. If, on a full investigation of this subject, it shall appear to the House that the expenses which were consequent on the services upon which these claims are predicated were not incurred by Georgia, then it will be acknowledged that they do not come within the description of expenses referred to in the Treaty of Cession, as that treaty referred distinctly to expenses which were incurred by Georgia. If they do not come within that description, they could not have been adjusted by that treaty. In the investigation of this subject, I propose to show to the House, that the Governor of Georgia, when arranging the defence of that State, (by which these claims were created,) acted under the authority and control, and as the agent of the President. If I succeed in this, it will be conceded by all, that the United States were bound to pay the expenses which were incurred during the continuance of such agency. I propose to show, also, that the United States are bound by constitutional principles, to defray all expenses incurred (subsequent to the adoption of the Federal Constitution) by military operations necessary to the defence of an individual State; and that, under the operation of the constitution, an individual State cannot be charged with such expenses.

And, finally, that the State of Georgia did, prior to the adoption of the constitution, incur expenses to a much greater amount than the sum stipulated in the Treaty of Cession, which expenses come much more properly within the description of expenses referred to in that treaty, than these militia claims, which were created subsequent to the adoption of the constitution by Georgia. If I succeed in either of the two last propositions, the motion now pending before the House must prevail. These militia claims are founded upon services alleged to have been rendered to the United States in the years 1792, '3, and '4, by certain detachments of the militia of Georgia, in defence of that State, against the Creek and Cherokee nations of Indians. At that time, Georgia presented to several warlike tribes of hostile savages, a thinly inhabited frontier of about four hundred miles extent; those savages had long cherished a hostile disposition towards the infant settlements of Georgia, and had frequently, before that period, indulged their savage thirst for blood, by desolating those young settlements, and butchering the defenceless inhabitants. At length, excited by their hope of plunder, and fired with jealousy and rage, by the artful representations of a few designing, discontented chiefs amongst them, the Creek Indians, especially at the commencement of the period to which this inquiry is directed, attacked the frontier settlements of Georgia with such fury, as seemed to threaten a total destruction of those settlements. The Governor of Georgia represented to the President of the United States the then critical situation of that State, which representation was supported by satisfactory evidence, that murders and depredations had already been committed on the defenceless frontier inhabitants—and in consequence of such representation, the Secretary of War, on the 27th day of October, in 1792, wrote to the Governor of Georgia, which communication contains this unequivocal passage: "If the information you may receive, shall substantiate, clearly, any hostile designs on the part of the Creeks against the frontiers of Georgia, you will be pleased to take the most effectual means for the defence thereof, which may be in your power, and which the occasion may require." Thus, the Executive of Georgia was clothed with full discretionary powers, and was constituted the judge of the necessity of calling out the militia, and of the force necessary to be employed. And in the exercise of such discretionary powers, we present to you conclusive evidence, that several detachments of the militia of Georgia were ordered into service, for the defence of the frontiers of Georgia, against an enemy common to the United States. The evidence on which the claimants rely for the support of their claims, is embodied in documents printed under an order of the House, and laid on your tables yesterday. The House will there find the correspondence between the Secretary of War, in the year 1798, and the then acting agent for the supply of the troops in Georgia, which shows that the agent had caused rations to be regularly issued to the militia, who now claim compensation for their service. And the report of the Secretary of War, made to this House upon this subject in 1808, informs us that regular pay and muster rolls, showing the service of these militia, have been received at that department under the direction of the President of the United States.

[H. or R.]

The evidence submitted must, I think, satisfy the House, as it has the Committee on Military Affairs, that the militia did perform the service for which compensation is now asked; and the amount due is not a matter of speculative opinion, for the estimates prepared and forwarded by the then acting agent for the War Department in Georgia, and now on file, ascertains the precise amount. Then, the service was performed. The individuals who performed it were, therefore, entitled to compensation. Such compensation has not yet been made, but is now due, and it is due from the United States; because, the Governor of Georgia, when arranging the defence of that State, acted under the authority, and as the agent of the President. The service was, therefore, rendered to the United States, especially as it was against a common enemy. Consequently, the United States are bound to pay the expenses which were incurred by that service. But I contend that the United States are bound, by constitutional principles—principles perfectly independent of any agency which the President may have had in arranging the military defence of Georgia—to pay these claims.

On motion of Mr. TRACY, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill further to amend the act authorizing payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, in the late war with Great Britain, and for other purposes—Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, in the chair.

Mr. TRACY rose in reply to the speech of Mr. BARBOUR, yesterday. He observed that it was not his intention to have entered further into the debate on this question, than he had already done on the present as well as at former sessions. He did hope that of those who thought with him on the subject of this bill, there would have been enough on every side to have sustained its cause. He was well aware that his situation, as the representative of the sufferers, detracted much from the weight of any thing he could advance on the subject; but, as he found himself left alone to sustain this controversy, he could only regret that the task had fallen on one so very inadequate to do it justice.

Mr. T. then went into a consideration of the principles of national law, as they had been laid down by the gentleman from Virginia, with the most of whose positions he felt inclined to coincide. He did not think, he said, of maintaining that Government was bound to pay for all losses suffered in a state of war—but only in the very case in which the gentleman from Virginia had admitted this obligation, viz: when the character of property was changed in consequence of military occupancy. He might, indeed, object to the gentleman's doctrines, that a Government such as ours is not bound by the same rules as the ancient despotisms of Europe. But this was not necessary. He would meet the gentleman on his own ground. If Government changed the character of the property, and in consequence of this change, it was afterwards destroyed, the Government is bound to pay. On this ground he was willing to rest the claims of the Niagara sufferers. He here referred to the report of the committee printed at a former session on this subject, as containing evidence that the destruction was in consequence of the connection that Government had with the property. He insisted that the sufferers were not bound to show that the destruction was on the allowed principles of civilized warfare; and to sustain the title to indemnity by individuals who suffered loss, it was sufficient to show that it was caused by the public use of their property. He confessed himself unable to discover, with any precision, what the usages of civilized war were, as applied to this subject. He understood the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) as maintaining that the destruction of Newark by the American troops was a justifiable act. [Mr. WILLIAMS explained, that he had only referred to the report of Gen. McClure.] But whether it was, or was not, the enemy themselves had avowed that they destroyed the buildings because they had been used and occupied by our army.

He would, however, endeavor not to be diffuse in what he had to advance. His object had yesterday been, and still was, to show that the principle of the measure contemplated by the bill was defensible on two grounds: 1. That the Government was, in this case, bound by that sort of obligation which had properly been stated by the learned gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) as an imperfect obligation, and which, though it certainly did not go to the extent of a perfect and legal obligation, was nevertheless to be recognized as binding to a certain extent. But, secondly, and principally, that the Government was bound by an obligation in all respects perfect; so perfect, that, if the same obligation existed between two private individuals, it might be pursued and enforced in a court of law.

On the first of these points, he felt assured that the peculiar circumstances of those whose cause it was his duty to plead, and for whose sufferings a remedy was proposed by the bill, must, when duly considered, be owned to create an obligation which, though it might not be of a legal kind, was nevertheless something more than a mere appeal to humanity. Were it, indeed, no more, it ought not to be disregarded; for a Government is in this respect, in the same situation as a private individual—it must be humane, if it can, even where no connection whatever has previously existed between the sufferer and its own acts. Suppose, for illustration, that the Niagara frontier, instead of being wasted by a savage enemy, had suffered equal injury by an earthquake. Could there be a question, that, in such a case, there would exist an obligation on the Government to afford what relief was in its power? Could he not refer to more than one example in which the Government had done this, not only to its own citizens, but even to foreigners? The people of New Madrid, in Missouri, when suffering from the effect of earthquakes in that portion of the Union, had received relief from the Government; and even the people of Venezuela, who resided at a distance from our boundary, had been relieved by the Government, in a still more liberal manner. Would any one deny that the Government in this case performed a duty? The principle, then, of abstract benevolence, had attached to it a certain degree of obligation.

He presumed it was unnecessary for him to go into a long detail of facts to prove to the committee that the sufferings on the Niagara frontier had been of a most poignant, severe, and aggravated kind. Whoever had the least knowledge of the history of the war, could not entertain a doubt on that subject. So far as extent of human misery could go in giving validity to any claims, these were most abundantly established. The gentleman from North Carolina had, indeed, said, (he took no notes of his speech, but quoted from it as reported,) that he had been credibly informed that that frontier had been, on the whole, rather benefited than injured by being made, to the extent it was, the seat of war. Now, the gentleman might have been credibly so informed, but he could assure him not correctly. There could be no greater mistake than to say that that region had been benefited by the war. If the gentleman gave the least credit to history, he could not but know that the reverse was true—that, instead of being benefited, it had suffered the utmost injury and distress by the war. The gentleman had said, that great opportunities were enjoyed of making money there—that the highest prices were obtained for commodities, and large amounts of public money expended. He would not deny that, as to a certain portion of the country in the neighborhood of that which was the immediate scene of war, this, to a certain extent, might be true; but this fact, unhappily, increased instead of diminishing the suffering of these claimants. It was the highest aggravation of their sufferings. The highest prices were given for produce—but these persons were not agriculturists. Flour was, indeed, selling at forty dollars per barrel—but they raised none. Those of them who owned farms had their farms immediately on the border utterly wasted. All pursuits of agriculture were interrupted, and the dearer provisions were, the worse it was for them. They had to buy—not to sell. There was, it is true, a great influx of public money—but they got little or none of it. The country farther back from the enemy might be enriched—but they, instead of being enriched, were ruined.

The argument, that payment for such losses would induce an enemy to make universal desolation of private property, in order to ruin the financial means of the Government, was equally unfounded. In addition to the fact, that the Government would make the indemnification after the war was closed, and when the revenue resources would justify, it might also be observed, that the motive which restrains an enemy from acts of wanton desolation, is not, that the loss by the citizen is not as distressing to the country as a loss by the Government, but the fear of retaliation, the abhorrence of the whole civilized world, and, he hoped, a proper sense of human rights, which civilization and Christianity had produced, afforded the only protection against such outrages which a Government could rely upon.

In illustration that this principle of indemnification was not so altogether new as the gentleman had supposed, Mr. T. alluded to the fact, that the British Government had given to their Canadian subjects on the Niagara frontier, about $800,000, and had adopted other measures, by which a remuneration to the full extent of their losses was making. He then proceeded to show why the claims of our citizens on this Government were much stronger than the Canadians were on theirs. In their case, there was no pretence of a perfect obligation; it was never pretended that the destruction of their property was occasioned by its occupation by the British; they had spent millions to defend them, had not brought the war to their doors, and had had no connection with them, except for the purpose of defence. But, with our Government, the case was totally different. Is the obligation of this Government to our citizens less, or its sympathies more cold, than the British Government, to its remote colonial subjects?

Niagara Suffrage.

Adverting to the debate of yesterday, Mr. T. quoted the observation of Mr. BARBOUR, that if, by any act of the Government, individual property was withdrawn from its pacific position, by the Government, or invested with a warlike character, the Government was bound to indemnify the owners for any loss they might sustain by that act. So far the gentleman from Virginia—who had thus acknowledged, that if the pacific character, which personal and individual property has attached to it, is changed, there is created, on the part of the Government, a distinct obligation, which he called a perfect obligation—such a one as, between individuals under similar circumstances, could be enforced in a court of justice. Now, I do firmly believe, said Mr. T., that the case of the Niagara claims is altogether sustainable upon this position of the gentleman from Virginia. That gentleman has come to the conclusion, indeed, that these claims do not come within his definition, but without any reference to the facts to see whether they do so or not. The proposition which I make is affirmative, that they do come within it, and I expected that the gentleman would have endeavored to show that they do not. But he did not do so. He seemed, after establishing his case of perfect right, to take it for granted that these cases had nothing to do with it, whereas, the circumstances of them do refer them to the very principle which the gentleman laid down.

The true question for the House to determine, in regard to these claims, said Mr. T., is, was there any act of this Government, relating to the property destroyed, which induced a change of its pacific character, and clothed it with a warlike character, and did that change produce its destruction? If this change was thus effected, it is a rule, prescribed by common sense and justice, admitted by the gentleman from Virginia himself, that the claimants ought to be indemnified. It is not for us to dive into the recesses of the human heart, to search for the motives which led to that destruction of property. For, if there was a just cause for this destruction of property by the enemy, we ought not to advert to other transactions, in other times and places, to account for it.

In regard to the general nature of the operations on the Niagara frontier, during the late war, Mr. T. proceeded to show, that they were such as to change the character of the whole of the property on that frontier, from a pacific to a belligerent character. The House ought to bear in mind always, that our military operations on that frontier were of an offensive character, because he thought that consideration placed these claims on ground to make the argument in their favor conclusive. Our troops were not carried there to protect the frontier from invasion by the enemy. That was not the purpose, nor the object of the collection of the troops there. If the Government had not, for its own purposes—wise ones, no doubt—chosen to make that border the theatre of war, there was no human probability that there would have arisen there any of the consequences which did actually occur. Of one fact in regard to this matter, there could be no doubt, namely, that the Government was, as a Government, totally destitute of any public property on that frontier. They had neither barracks, nor hospitals, nor arsenals, nor warehouses for the deposit of public property. Yet the Government chose to carry on offensive war from that frontier, by a continued series of invasions of the territory of the enemy. For all the purposes of hospitals, barracks to shelter the soldiers at all seasons of the year, depositories of public stores, &c., they had to rely on the buildings of the inhabitants, which they made free and general use of. When these things were considered, Mr. T. said that it would be discovered that the notoriety of this fact must have established, in the mind of the enemy, a positive conviction, that the offensive movements on the part of our troops, were entirely dependent on the use of individual property, and that measures of defence against this warfare must include the destruction of that property. It was thus that property on that frontier acquired a belligerent character. If the Government had had, as, in theory at least, it ought to have had, places for the protection of its property, and barracks to shelter its troops, whenever it carried on its military operations, and those places had been occupied, instead of the private buildings, by the troops and stores of the army, then the destruction of the private buildings would have assumed a very different character. The policy of the Government, however, having made this ground the scene of war, without these ordinary appendages to a military frontier, the houses of individuals were made to serve the purposes of public buildings.

What, Mr. T. asked, was the natural conclusion of the enemy from this state of things? They reasoned to themselves, that, in destroying these buildings, thus used, they would not merely destitute that frontier, but protect their own territory. This was the unanswerable conclusion to which, upon the facts before them, military men would necessarily come.

In this view of the subject, a character was given to the property thus occupied for offensive purposes, different from that which it would have borne, if occupied for defensive purposes only. If, for example, said Mr. T., the enemy had come to invade the city of New York, and we, for the defence of the city, had taken possession of private buildings, I should say that the right of the enemy to destroy those buildings, would be very different from that which he held in regard to those buildings on the Niagara frontier, which our troops occupied for offensive purposes.

Mr. T. closed by observing that, in relation to the motion to strike out the first section, he hoped, if gentlemen were determined nothing should be done for these claimants, that they would vote for the motion, and put them out of their pain. In regard to this bill, though he felt the common affection of paternity for it, he was not tenacious of its particular features: he was willing that it should be amended if desired. His constituents, these claimants, had been tantalized so long with hope and expectation of relief, that he hoped a final decision would now be pronounced on the case. If, in defiance of justice, reason, and equity, gentlemen were disposed to refuse the claimants any indemnity whatever for their losses, Mr. T. hoped they would vote for the pending motion, and at once put an end to the bill.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, the committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, December 30.

Communication to Lafayette.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to unite with a committee from the Senate in announcing to General Lafayette the passage of the act concerning him, which has just been approved, and to express to him the respectful request and confidence of the two Houses of Congress, that he will add his acceptance of the testimony of public gratitude extended to him by this act, to the many and signal proofs which he has afforded of his esteem for the United States.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, moved the following:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what provision it will be proper or practicable to make to aid the State of Illinois in opening a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan and the Illinois River; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. COOK, by way of explanation of his views in moving this resolution, as it was rather out of the usual course to propose to refer such a subject to a select committee, made one or two suggestions. A year or two ago, he said, Congress passed a law granting to the State of Illinois certain privileges in relation to land through which the proposed canal is to pass. The State took all the necessary steps to avail herself of these privileges. But it was not likely that the State, from its ordinary means, could carry this measure into effect. Congress have given to the State of Illinois a certain proportion of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands, for the encouragement of learning; and a portion of the public lands within the same State for the same purpose. If no better means should present themselves; if the Government of the United States should not consider this canal, in a national view, of so much importance as to construct it at its own cost, the State might be allowed to convert its school lands into a fund for the purpose of making the canal, and to apply the toll from the canal to the school purposes, thus merely changing the land into a canal stock, the profits of which to be applied to the same purpose as the land is to serve—of encouraging learning. There were a variety of views which Mr. C. said he could present to a committee on this subject, and to the House upon a proper opportunity. This canal was really a national object, worthy of the employment of the national means. But, if this House should not consider it so, means to execute it might be placed at the disposal of the State by the measure which he had suggested.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, was opposed to the reference of the resolution to a select committee. He thought that it properly appertained to the Committee on Roads and Canals, who were perfectly competent to dispose of it; and he moved, as an amendment, to substitute the Committee on Roads and Canals for the proposed select committee.

The question was then put on Mr. ALLEN's motion for amendment, and carried—ayes 63, noes 57.

The House having resumed the consideration of the bill on this subject—

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, then rose and said, that it was with reluctance that he presented himself before the House on this subject—and his doing so might perhaps demand from him some apology to those gentlemen, who, coming from the State where these claimants resided, were more particularly connected, by their situation, with the present bill. But he had risen, because he had had, in his own person, some opportunity of an acquaintance with the facts of the case, and such was their impression upon his own mind, that he felt confident there was not a man on that floor, let him come from the North or the South, from the East or the West, who, if he knew the sufferings of these claimants, would not be in favor of granting them relief. The assertion might be thought a bold one, but he felt no hesitation in making it, and he now repeated that, had gentlemen been eye-witnesses to what was suffered on that frontier, not one would refuse to relieve the sufferers. On most subjects, he felt as much disposed to economize the public resources as any member of this House; but he could never consent that, when he who had thrown open his door to receive a suffering, perishing American soldier, and in consequence of his hospitality he had had his house burnt to the ground, asked compensation from the American Government, he should be sent away unaided. Mr. V. said he felt his inadequacy to do justice to the subject, or to his own feelings, and he well knew that, after the able speeches which had been made in opposition to the bill, from men of the first standing in the country, whoever rose to advocate it, must expect to row against a strong current. But if the arguments of those gentlemen are not more specious than sound, he was greatly mistaken.

But, sir, has the gentleman (Mr. WILLIAMS of N. C.) forgotten our federal character? Is each part of this country, and is each man in it, to protect himself? Is such a doctrine as this preached to us by the gentleman? Is the interior to be paid for marching to defend the frontier? Sir, if that gentleman should march from Norfolk to defend the most distant part of our frontier, he would only be marching, in effect, to defend himself. It is an acknowledged maxim, that it is better to fight an enemy in your neighbor's ground than on your own; and if the gentleman refuses to march to defend the frontier, when it is attacked by an enemy, he will soon find the frontier at his own door. The war which he refused to combat at a distance, will come home to his own threshold.

The next argument of the gentleman was, that the people on the frontier were not so much to be pitied as they would have it believed; that they have not suffered so very much—nay, have rather been benefited by the war. Sir, I will say, that if that gentleman knew what was the true state of facts on the N. W. frontier generally, he would never have uttered such language. But, sir, he does not know it—the country does not know it—the country never will fully know it—the truth was withheld at the time from motives of policy—and, except to eye-witnesses, it can never be known. I might appeal to the first men of this nation for my truth when I say, that while the American army was lying at the French Mills, three men out of five who had slept in one tent, were more than once drawn out in the morning dead, being literally frozen to death for want of covering. The gentleman from North Carolina lives, himself, in a mild climate; but if he had seen that army encamped in the midst of snow more than three feet deep, and not half clothed, he would talk and feel differently. Sir, it was as necessary to give that whole district a military character, (so far as admitting the troops into the private houses could do this,) as it was to provide clothing or subsistence for your army; and the enemy had as much interest in the destruction of the houses, as in that of your magazines. And, if losses sustained under such circumstances, do not call upon us for relief, I do not know what does, or can.

tion. But I appeal to that gentleman, himself, to say, whether there may not be some cases where an imperfect obligation is stronger and more perfect than perfection itself? Yes, sir, I repeat it—more perfect than perfection itself. I think, after the vote that gentleman gave in the case of Lafayette, he cannot deny this. Let me say to that gentleman, that, in the village of Buffalo, he might on one day, have found a family well housed, well clothed, surrounded with every comfort of life, who, from its hospitality in throwing open its doors to the American soldier, was the next day houseless and homeless, destitute of all things; if he had chanced, eight months afterwards, to be wandering on the flats of the Ohio, he might there see a family scarcely covered by a wretched hovel, in squalid poverty, one day shivering with ague, and the next consumed with raging fever; if his compassion should lead him to enter and inquire into their situation, he would hear them say, our father lived in plenty and comfort on the Niagara frontier—he saw the American soldiery ready to perish—he opened his door to take them in—and for that we are here, ruined, and in wretchedness. Sir, the sufferings of the French, on their retreat from Moscow, present not too strong a picture to convey a just idea of what was endured while the whole country on the Lakes was converted into one wide cantonment. Other districts suffered as well as Niagara, but none, by any means, in so great a degree. Had the gentleman seen an American regiment on that frontier drawn up on a frosty morning, and supporting arms while their limbs were chilled to the bone, standing, in their thin cotton dress, in snow two and three feet deep; had he seen these claimants opening their houses to receive men in immediate danger of perishing, (many of them did perish,) and afterwards turned out of house and home for doing it, he would not, he could not, deny that something ought to be done for their relief. I will not undertake to say how much, or in what way, but I do say that this House ought to do something. Sir, if we can get nothing from perfect obligation, we will accept it from imperfect, from charity if you please, but I do hope you will give it in some way.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Tennessee, next rose, and observed, on rising, that it had not been his fortune to witness the scenes which had been so handsomely depicted by the gentleman from Ohio; yet he had feelings and principles, and though he did not attempt to urge his own opinions as arguments upon the House, he thought it proper to assign his reasons for voting in favor of the bill. Much complaint, said he, was made of the law of 1816, and we were told that, in that act, the House had gone beyond all principles of the law of nations; and on similar grounds, we are warned against the present bill because a similar one is not to be found in the codes of foreign nations. But, admitting such to be the fact, our own statute books furnish a sufficient precedent. Look, said

Mr. R., at the horses, the bridles, the saddles, for which we have paid in the West; look at the negroes for which we have provided indemnity in the South. Are we to stop here? Shall we not provide something for the case of these suffering claimants in the North? We are told that the act of 1816 has impoverished the Treasury—but where, asked Mr. R., has the money gone? It was the people's money, and it has gone back to the people—it circulates at home. What injury has it done? Is not the country as flourishing at this moment as any country on the globe? Look at the condition of the Treasury. Can we not, through the able management of that Department, boast of a balance of three millions? It was the object of the law of 1816, not to reward the services of the citizen; it did not attempt that—but only to repair the losses he had endured in the service of his country. By carrying that law into effect, we shall hold out to the world that our country is grateful to those who serve her, and pities their distress. We shall enable the old warrior to say to his son: I have fought for a grateful country—go and do likewise.

Those who suffered from the military occupation of their premises, during the war, were surely as much entitled to relief as those who lost a horse or negro.

Here Mr. R. adverted to the evidence of the sufferings on the frontier as already placed before the committee—to whole villages occupied by our own troops, and by the burning of Newark, exposed to the vengeance of an irritated and powerful enemy. Adverting to the letter of Secretary Armstrong authorizing that act, he said, let us not stand on names—he was the organ of the Government—the head of the War Department, and, as such, his letter authorized the burning of that village.

Mr. R. said he had had the honor of participating in the passage of the act of 1816—for he had witnessed all the steps of this claim since its first introduction—he had heard his friend from Kentucky say, and with too much truth, that the privilege of those sufferers to present their claims to this House, would be a privilege to have their claims rejected. Sir, the event showed that he had spoken like a prophet. We have lately done one act of justice to a foreigner—an act in which I am proud to say I had the honor and happiness of participating by my vote—let us now do another to our own citizens.

Mr. NEALE, of Maryland, then rose, and said, that as he had been one who assented to the present bill, it might not be deemed an intrusion upon the time of the committee, to state some of the reasons that had governed him in doing so—and, as the law of nations had been frequently referred to by the gentlemen who were opposed to the bill, he asked to be permitted to read from an approved writer, what was the language of the law. [Mr. N. here quoted Vattel, to show, that where property was destroyed by a nation's own Government, or its order, houses are removed to erect a fortification, it must be paid for by the Government—as also what that writer says respecting injuries by an enemy, and debts of imperfect obligation.] This, Mr. N. observed, was national law, as recognized by European nations; and here a distinction was made between injuries inflicted deliberately, and those by accident—the one created a perfect obligation on the Government for remuneration, the other appealed to the charity of the nation. By referring to the acts of 1816 and '17, it would clearly be perceived that the principle was established, viz: that if the Government occupied property, and made use of it for military purposes, and it was then destroyed, the United States must pay for it. Those acts created a perfect obligation. And was not this a just principle? And if it were not enacted then, ought it not to be now? Whether the United States destroyed the property itself, or by its act caused the enemy to destroy it, was immaterial. Such a case does not come under that clause of Vattel, which refers to accident. The occupancy is a deliberate voluntary act, and the law of 1816 and '17 says, that the Government must pay for the loss in such case. The reason of the law is, as has been stated, that property, while possessing a private and pacific character, is not liable to injury by the enemy, according to the rules of civilized warfare, but, as soon as the Government gives it a public and belligerent character, it is. Now it is necessary that the motive of the enemy in the destruction of any particular portion of property should, in some way, be established. But the acts of 1816 and '17 do not allow that the fact of its public occupation by Government shall be presumed to be of sufficient proof of this intention or motive of the enemy; the present bill does allow this: it remedies, in this respect, the great defect of the former laws. If the occupancy and the destruction are proved, it is enough—the one is presumed to be the reason of the other. In many cases it would be impossible to prove the motive of an enemy in any other manner.

Mr. BUCK, of Vermont, said, that he did not rise to debate the general principle of the bill, but to correct a material error in point of fact. The error was so important, that, when it was shown, it would appear that the advocates of the bill had been going wholly on an assumed state of the facts, which in reality had no existence. The gentleman who introduced the bill went so far as to say, that he rested the cause of the claimants on this one point, viz: that the reason of the destruction of property had been its occupation by the Government; and, having established the fact of such occupation, he seemed to conceive that the claim was made out. But, Mr. B. said, he had in his hand a document to show conclusively that the ravages of our frontier were not caused by the occupancy by our army, but were inflicted entirely on a principle of retaliation, in consequence of the burning of Newark. This document was the proclamation of Gen. Prevost, the officer who commanded the British forces at the time, and who, he believed, directed, and in person superintended, the work of destruction. [Here Mr. Bux quoted the proclamation, in strong terms denouncing the conduct of this Government, and justifying the devastation of the Niagara frontier.] Thus it appears that we are not driven to presume the motive of the enemy; we have it in express terms, declared by himself. He should not attempt to discuss the subject at large—he thought such a representation of facts as was contained in the testimony, coming almost wholly from parties interested, was not to be put in competition with a public document such as that he had just quoted. This changed the state of the question. It was not now to be settled, whether this Government was bound, because its acts had changed the character of the property—but whether it was bound to remunerate the sufferers for injuries inflicted by the enemy on a principle of retaliation. On this discussion, Mr. B. said, he should not enter, but only observe, that, if we admit that payment is to be made on the principle of retaliation, we, having been the beginners, by burning Newark, are of course bound to pay.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, rose to call the attention of the House to what were really the facts of the case now before it, however perverted by the document which had just been quoted. It was true, he said, that, in that proclamation, the pretext for the devastation of the Niagara frontier was the destruction of Newark, but, in his judgment, it never was the real cause of it. Whoever looks to the situation of that frontier, and the history of the war with Great Britain to that period, must be satisfied that that document deserves no other character than that of mere hyperbole. It was not issued until after the burning of the Niagara frontier, when it had become necessary to give to the civilized world some plausible pretext for such an act as burning that frontier. Mr. S. reviewed the facts which attended the destruction of Newark, &c. We had considered the Niagara frontier generally as a point from which the Canadian frontier could be most easily invaded. We had made the experiment, not without the loss of blood. The enemy had similar objects on the Northwestern frontier. Our advances on the Niagara country were in some instances intended to create a diversion—to distract the attention of the enemy, and turn him from the invasion of the frontier of Ohio, to the protection of his own territory. One great object of the invasion by us of the Niagara frontier, he had always understood, was to protect the frontiers of Ohio, and of the States west of it: and he had himself no doubt that one great object of the devastation of the Niagara frontier by the enemy, was to prevent its occupation as a military station, from which Canada might be invaded. When Newark was burnt, the British commander, who sought for a pretext for the destruction, thought he had found it in the burning of Newark; by availing himself of which, he could throw the odium of his conduct on the United States, whilst his real motive was very different from his avowed one. That, said Mr. S., was the real history of the proclamation, which was relied upon as an argument against the claimants now before the House. Their object was to secure themselves from our incursions. They accomplished it: they did, by the devastation of the Niagara frontier, secure themselves, until a larger and better appointed force penetrated their frontier, &c.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again; and The House adjourned to Monday.

Lafayette.

Mr. ARCHER, of Va., from the Joint Committee appointed to communicate to General LAFAYETTE the act passed for his benefit, asked and obtained leave to report—when he submitted copies of a letter from the committee to the General, and his reply, (as will be seen in the account of the Senate proceedings,) which, on motion of Mr. CONDIOT, were entered at large on the Journals of the House.

Niagara Sufferers.

The House then proceeded to the order of the day, and went again into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, in the chair,) on the bill for the relief of the Niagara sufferers.

Mr. CADY, of New York, then rose, and observed, it was but seldom that he obtruded himself upon the attention of this House, but being a citizen of the State of New York, and having had an opportunity of knowing something of the merits of the petitioners in this case, he could not consent to give a silent vote. I once, said Mr. C., entertained an opinion nearly similar to the one expressed by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina. I once believed that exaggeration had magnified the sufferings and multiplied the losses of these petitioners—but, sir, that day of ignorance has gone by. It was once my duty, in the Legislature of New York, to examine this subject, and I do assure the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, and this committee, that, as regards the losses of these petitioners, and the miseries they endured, the truth has never been half told. I am not now disposed to enter into a disquisition whether this claim is to be classed under the head of a perfect or imperfect obligation; the black-letter reading of Coke or of Blackstone, will have but little influence in determining my vote. Nor, sir, shall I consult the musty pages of Grotius or Puffendorf, to know for what losses those gentlemen are pleased to say, Governments are bound to pay. But, sir, I have asked my conscience whether I believe this Government ought to do something for these claimants, and whether we are prohibited from doing it. I have also read the constitution of my country, and in the preamble I am told that it was adopted "to promote the general welfare." I believe our right to do something has not been disputed. Why not then do it? One honorable gentleman seems to suppose that the occupancy by our army of the buildings destroyed, was not the cause of their destruction. What then, supposing it to be true, will you furnish no relief?

I have been instructed by the Legislature of New York, of which I am a citizen, to advocate these claims. I do it most cheerfully, regretting only my feeble powers. She asks you to alleviate, in some degree, the losses of a portion of her citizens. She has long since extended her charitable hand—she asks you to do equal and exact justice—she has seen you pay for losses in the West and in the South—she has seen your western dragoons remounted, and the negroes of the southern planter restored. Will you now listen to her application? Are there any more "constitutional objections" in the way? I well remember the time when she applied for your assistance, in the formation and completion of a work which history has already recorded as the proudest monument of the age. But, sir, I do not wish to digress; rest assured, that, in the State of New York, from Erie to Long Island, there is a universal prayer that we shall do something for these Niagara sufferers. If gentlemen suppose the bill to be too broad, let us amend it in the spirit of charity—let us say, "come let us reason together," but do not let us any more, with a cold tombstone charity, say to those suffering petitioners, "be ye fed and be ye clothed." The honorable gentleman from Ohio has, in a warm, vivid, and glowing manner, peculiar to himself, described some of the sufferings of these petitioners. About two hundred inhabited dwellings were entirely consumed; they contained, probably, upon an average, from six to eight souls. From 1,200 to 1,800 hundred human beings, with the aged father, the helpless mother, the infant in the cradle, were involved in one promiscuous labyrinth of woe. At that most inclement season, when the cold northern blasts of winter chill to the very soul, were these claimants bereft of a home, without a shelter but the broad canopy of Heaven, the cold earth their bed. Their sufferings may be imagined—they cannot be described. Many, to be sure, have gone to their long home, but many still remain looking up to us, and fervently imploring us to alleviate, in part, their distresses. Let us do it; we need not fear the consequences. No nation ever suffered by doing great, humane, and generous acts. They tend to engage the affection, and rivet the attachments of the people. Let us, then, sir, do something worthy of this nation, and rest assured that the American people will not only hail you as upright and able statesmen, but also as noble, generous, and charitable.

Mr. STORES moved to amend the bill by striking out that clause which grants indemnity, provided the property "had been at any time during the war" in the occupation of the United States, and substituting the proviso, that it was in such occupation "at the time of its destruction, or immediately before."

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, observed, that he did not think he correctly understood the object of the amendment. He went into a recapitulation of what had previously been done on this subject—the act of 1816—the powers of the commissioner—his decisions—the interposition of the President, and the subsequent act of 1817. By this act, it was required to be proved that the property was occupied by order of an officer of the United States; and, as he understood, all the claims which had been brought under the provisions of this act had been paid. The object of the claimants now seemed to be to undo the restrictions of the law of 1817, and restore them and their claims to the same state as they were under the act of 1816. Now, the act of 1816 had been extended by the commissioner to all property occupied with or without an order of any United States officer—and, if such was, in any way, the object of the present bill, or of the amendment, he should be opposed to it in toto, knowing, as he did, the abuses to which the extraordinary decision of the commissioner would have led.

Mr. MARVIN, of New York, rose, in reply, and said that it was not the object of the present bill, or of the amendment, to establish any new principle. He thought the gentleman from Georgia had not stated the case quite fairly. It was true that the commissioner's proceedings had been arrested, and that a new law was passed, establishing a different rule of adjudication, and empowering him only to examine and report. Under this law, a new commission issued to two members of this House, and another gentleman of great talents, to whom was added an agent of the United States. These gentlemen repaired to Niagara, and, in their examinations and report, were governed by the law of 1817. They took ample testimony—they made a detailed report—they did both by the authority of this House; but there their powers stopped, and there this House stopped also; for, after receiving that report, nothing had been done—not a dollar was granted for settling the claims. Last session, a committee, indeed, had been appointed to inquire what it was proper to do in the matter, and the report of that committee is before the House, and they propose the present bill, not to set up any new principle, but merely to carry the former acts into effect. Why did the House order them to report, if it was not intended to follow up their report with some corresponding measure? Not one of these claims had been paid since 1817, and they were so numerous that it was utterly impracticable for Congress to deliberate upon them singly. Some general act was requisite to carry the rule the House had laid down into some practicable effect. Such was the simple object of the present bill. Its friends, indeed, did wish to get rid of an objectionable phrase in one of the former acts on this subject, which provides that the occupancy of the property must have been the cause of its destruction. Under that law, if a claimant comes and proves both the occupancy of his dwelling by United States troops or magazines, and its destruction by the enemy, he is answered, "Ay, but you have not shown that the one was the cause of the other." If he attempts to prove this by inference, it is objected that the destruction was on a principle of retaliation for the burning of Newark. If he attempts to show that whole villages were burnt, he is again told that neither the occupancy by United States troops, nor the burning of Newark was the cause, but only the predatory character that marked British warfare in former wars as well as the present. The claimant is sent to examine the mind, and to probe the conscience of the enemy, and tell what his true motives were. It was from such a requirement that the present bill sought to free these unhappy sufferers, many of whom had endured a second desolation in consequence of the legislation of this Hall. The acts of 1816 and 1817 led them to expect indemnification; and the expectation was a just one; it was founded in their confidence in this House, and the execution of its laws. In consequence, they had begun to rebuild their burnt buildings, and had incurred responsibilities by doing so. The execution of those acts was suspended; the time of payment for their repairs came round. The same citizen who had once been stripped by the enemy, had to see his property a second time swept away by judgment and execution.

Mr. MEXOKER, of Virginia, said, upon the question whether the laws of civilized war justified the destruction of the Niagara frontier, he expressed the decided opinion that the usage of civilized nations did not justify it. He defied any one to put his finger on any passage in any esteemed writer on National Law, or on any page of history, in which such a transaction was reconciled to the principles of lawful warfare. So far from a belligerent being entitled to destroy private dwellings because of their being or having been occupied by its enemy, Mr. M. maintained the reverse to be the law. The most fertile and populous countries of Europe, he remarked, had been most frequently the theatres of war—Flanders and Lombardy, for example, the cock-pits of Europe, in which France and Germany had so often contended for empire. Of the ravages which would have been made of these beautiful countries, if the principle now suggested had been acted upon, he drew a vivid outline, concluding by saying that, by the conduct of her commanders on the shores and frontiers of this country during the late war, the arms of Great Britain had been stained with a disgrace which it would take a century to wipe off. There existed, he argued, no such right on the part of a belligerent, as the right to destroy private houses, or individual property, from which an enemy has been driven. If such a right had been admitted and acted upon in Europe, what would have become of the splendid buildings dedicated to military purposes, or of the private buildings occasionally employed for them? He expressed his surprise to find gentlemen in this discussion transferring themselves to the Niagara frontier, as if their general principles applied there only, instead of sweeping the whole continent. He illustrated the principle which had been laid down on this subject, by applying it to the city of New York, if, in any future war, an enemy should obtain possession of it; and demanded if the right to ravage that city with fire could be derived from the fact that troops called in for its defence were quartered in private buildings. Upon the whole, he concluded that it would be neither just nor wise for this Government to recognize any such principle as the right of an enemy to destroy private property because it may have been employed, for a time, either for military deposits, or for barracks.

With regard to the distinction which had been drawn, as to the right of the enemy to destroy private property, that the war on the Niagara frontier was, on our part, an offensive war, Mr. M. remarked that, whether a war was offensive or defensive, must be determined by its origin, and not by any particular incident of the war.

Mr. DWIGHT, of Mass., said he did not rise to enter into the discussion of the general question upon the merits of the bill, as it originally stood; to that bill, unmodified, he was himself opposed. But, limited, as it now was, by the amendment of his honorable friend from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) to the destruction of buildings or other property in the actual occupation of our own Government, at the time of the destruction, he gave his most hearty co-operation. He rose merely to point out an error of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MEXOKER,) who had just taken his seat, and upon which the argument of the honorable gentleman against the present bill seemed entirely to be founded. That is, that the laws of 1816 and 1817, in behalf of persons who had property lost, captured, or destroyed, by the enemy during the last war, were not founded in principle, and went further than the Government were bound to go in relief of individual distress. To show that the error was in the laws of 1816 and 1817, and not in the administration of them, the honorable gentleman from Virginia had attempted to show that the commissioner, acting under the authority of those laws, had invariably been guided by the opinion of the Government, as to the extent of the allowances which he was to make. To support this position, the honorable gentleman had read a part of the correspondence between the Commissioner and the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the extent of his ability to make allowances. And thence, the gentleman had induced the belief that, because the commissioner had consulted the Government, he had, in all instances, been governed by the result of that consultation. So far indeed was this from being true, he was himself prepared to show, from the documents which the honorable gentleman had just read, that the Secretary of the Treasury had, in his answer to the commissioner, confined relief to the destruction of buildings actually in the occupation of the Government for military purposes. The committee were not ignorant, that, so far from this salutary principle being the governing one, the commissioner had allowed some thousands of dollars in one instance to be paid for a building in the city of Washington, in regard to which the proof was by a British deserter, that it was destroyed by the enemy because a single musket was found in one of the apartments. He might add, he said, other instances of a wide departure from what was now considered the spirit of the laws of 1816 and 1817. They were, he presumed, fresh in the recollection of gentlemen who were, unlike himself at that time, conversant with those proceedings. He would ask the honorable gentleman if the policy of the laws of 1816 and 1817 were so generally questionable, why they had not been repealed? It was true, he admitted, that the President had long since suspended the powers of the commissioner. But that had not repealed the law. The President, indeed, had no more power over that repeal than the humblest individual of the nation. He appealed to the committee for the correctness of the assertion, that the universal public feeling at that time was, that the decisions of the commissioner (though he had no doubt they were honest) would involve the Government in payments which it was not in contemplation of the laws of 1816 and 1817 to make them responsible for. The fact that the laws now remained unqualified and unrepealed upon the statute-book, was unequivocal evidence of the correctness of their policy; while the suspension of the powers of the commissioner at that early period, by the President, went as clearly to show that he had not, in the opinion of the Government, been guided by a sufficiently cautious policy in the administration of those laws. He would submit, then, he said, to the committee, the question, whether the honorable gentleman was authorized to found an argument against the present bill, upon a supposed resemblance to the laws of 1816 and 1817.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, said, he rose to make a few observations on the bill before the committee, which he would not have done, had his views of the subject been exhibited by any other gentleman. He said, he would state, as a clear proposition, which had not been much disputed in the course of the discussion, that this Government was bound, as a matter of right, to indemnify individuals for the destruction of their property by the enemy, provided such destruction were in pursuance of the rules of civilized warfare. If that were not the case, then we were not compelled by any principles of public law to make such an indemnity. Every motive of policy would forbid it.

Then, said Mr. B., the question is, was the devastation of the whole Niagara frontier and the burning of Buffalo, acts justified by the laws of war? Can this be a subject of serious doubt at the present day? If we pass this bill, we proclaim that our denunciations of the conduct of the British army on that frontier, which has met the reprobation of the people of the United States, and, he trusted, of the whole civilized world, were unjust and unfounded. The Congress of the United States will declare, that the acts of that army were measures of lawful war, and, as such, they were bound to grant indemnity to the sufferers. This is the principle upon which the bill has been reested by its friends, and the only principle upon which it can rest.

Let us then, said Mr. B., inquire into the justice of this proposition. Had the enemy a right to burn and destroy the whole Niagara frontier, because most of the private houses were occupied as barracks and places of military deposit? On this subject he concurred generally with the views of his friend from Virginia, (Mr. MERRELL.) If this were established as a correct principle of national law, the consequence would be dreadful, and in many cases, the general devastation of the private property of unoffending individuals must inevitably ensue. War would no longer be a civil game between independent sovereigns; but each individual of the hostile nations would be liable to ruin, by the destruction of his property. I will illustrate my views, said Mr. B., by an example. Let an enemy land upon our shores and drive our army beyond the line of our fortifications, what would then be the consequence? Private houses must of necessity be used as places of military deposit, and as a shelter for the soldiers. Once, then, establish the principle embraced by this bill, and you justify an enemy in destroying and laying waste the whole country over which he advances. Nay, you do more; you offer him the strongest temptation to commit such outrages. Such, said Mr. B., has never been the practice of civilized nations; and he trusted this Government would never sanction the propriety of such outrageous acts on the part of an enemy.

Mr. B. said there was another view which this subject presents, which adds the guilt of perfidy to that of the violation of the laws of war. Whilst the village of Buffalo still presented a hostile front to the enemy, a capitulation was entered into by Col. Chapin of our army, with Gen. Rial, who commanded the British forces. By that instrument, it was solemnly agreed "that private property and private persons should not be molested or injured." Upon the faith of this capitulation the British forces entered the town. The testimony proves, that, before its date, they were well acquainted with the fact, that a large body of the United States troops had been quartered there, and that many of the houses were places of military deposit. With a full knowledge of those circumstances, they entered into the capitulation: What was then their subsequent conduct? Instead of separating the military stores from the houses in which they were deposited; instead of destroying public and saving private property, they involved the whole village in one common conflagration. At the most inclement season of the year, in a northern climate, regardless of their faith, they set fire to the town, and drove its inhabitants to seek shelter and bread from the compassion of strangers. And this under pretence of what they well knew before the capitulation, that there were military stores deposited in many of the private houses. And yet this destruction is attempted to be justified by the laws of war established among civilized nations.

[H. OF R.]

Again, said Mr. B., pass this bill, and no member of the committee can form any just estimate of the number and amount of the claims to which it will give birth. The inhabitants of the Niagara frontier are neither better nor worse than their fellow-countrymen. This bill is chiefly intended for their benefit. It is to embrace a tract of country of considerable extent, within which the whole mass of people feel a common interest in obtaining from the Government as much as possible. Self-love, and the prejudices which necessarily result from it, will induce them to bring every case in their power within the language of the law, and to place the highest value possible upon the property which was destroyed. This bill is without limit, and without bound; and what will be the extent of the appropriation necessary to carry it into effect, the committee cannot even conjecture.

Sir, said Mr. B., I may be asked if I am unwilling to afford these sufferers any relief? I answer, without hesitation, I am not. They have claims upon our generosity, not upon our justice. I would mitigate their calamities, not indemnify them for their losses. They have suffered more than the common misfortunes of war; they are therefore entitled to the compassion of a paternal Government. I would grant them such relief as, whilst it would not be too burdensome on the Treasury, nor produce those ruinous consequences to the nation which must result from establishing as a principle, that we will pay the value of private property destroyed by the enemy in violation of the laws of war, might yet mitigate their sufferings. I believe I know several gentlemen of the committee to be of the same opinion. I would give them 150,000 or 200,000 dollars, to be distributed pro rata, in full satisfaction of all demands. If, said Mr. B., you adopt a principle of this nature, you will at once know the extent of your donation, and you will make it the interest of the sufferers themselves to watch over the claims of each other, and see that none are established except those which are supported by principles of justice.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, said, that, in giving a vote upon this bill, he should do so with reference equally to the policy of the Government and the claims of individuals. It was well known, he said, that at the time of the passage of the law of 1816, and the amendatory law of 1817, there had been a serious investigation of the merits of those laws. Ten years have elapsed since the passage of those laws, and Mr. M. asked if it was not almost impossible now to establish a rule, different from that which was established when the subject was fresh in the minds of the members. As a matter of expediency, he thought there would be very great difficulty in ascertaining any other rule by which those claims could be disposed of. The inquiry then was, What has the Government done, and in what condition are the claims of these individuals? Some gentlemen had expressed a wish that these claims should be decided upon the principle of the law of 1816. Mr. M. said he was perfectly willing, for his part, that those claims should be presented, and determined, upon the rule of the act of 1816, that payment should be made for private houses or other buildings occupied by the United States, and destroyed whilst so occupied. This, he said, was a safe rule, founded on the principles of the Government, recognized by the constitution, that when the Government takes the property of an individual for private purposes, it shall, in such case, make compensation for it if lost or destroyed. But, he said, as for compensating the losses of a whole frontier, destroyed by a wanton act of violence by the enemy, under pretence that our armies had marched in that direction, it was opening so wide a drain upon the Treasury as no Government could safely sustain. Were we to sanction such a principle at this time of day, said Mr. M., we should abandon our duty. I would vote any amount of money, said he, which might be necessary to carry into effect the principle of the acts of 1816 and 1817. If there be any individuals on the Niagara frontier whose cases came within the principle of those acts, Mr. M. said, they should cheerfully have his vote, and he presumed they would have the decided and unanimous vote of the House in their favor. The carrying into execution, in favor of claimants, of the principle of the law of 1816, was all that could be expected of Congress, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said he should support the original bill, not because it embraced any new principle, but was to carry into effect one already established, and he should oppose the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, because to adopt them would be to introduce a principle upon which Congress has not yet legislated. It would be difficult, he said, unless the principle of his colleague was the true one, to find any principle on which the Niagara claims should be paid. The construction which had been given, by some of the committees of this House, to the 9th section of the act of 1816, was, that the proviso to it should be so construed as to defeat the object of that section—an interpretation contrary to every rule of construction. What case can occur, said he, in which it may not be said, that destruction of property by an enemy was wanton, and could have occurred whether the property had been occupied for the use of the Government or not? The allowance of this objection would destroy, at once, the whole effect of the 9th section of the act of 1816, and it never could have entered into the minds of the framers of that act, that it could be so construed. I was here, said Mr. T., at the passage of the act of 1816, and the object of it, if I understood any thing in regard to it, was to pay for all losses of private property occupied for military purposes, and destroyed according to the rules of civilized warfare. Property so occupied, had become public, and the loss of it ought to fall on the public, to whose use it had been converted.

I rose, said Mr. T., merely to say, that I am in favor of an extension of the principle of the act of 1816, and of giving to the 9th section the only construction which, upon legal principles, it appears to me possible to give to it. We are led astray, in debating this subject, by going into a consideration of motives on the part of the enemy. We lose sight of the facts of the occupation of the property by the enemy, and we go to the motive of the destruction on the part of the enemy. In doing so, you ask for what you cannot obtain. There may have been a variety of motives, and in that case you must go into a metaphysical inquiry, to ascertain which of them was the predominating motive. This, Mr. T. said, was the cause of the error into which some gentlemen had fallen, which they would have avoided by confining their attention to facts, &c.

On motion of Mr. Ross, of Ohio, the committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, January 4.

Naval School.

The resolution of Mr. LIVINGSTON, proposing a plan for the education of Officers of the Navy, being under consideration, some conversation took place between the mover and Mr. FULLER, who offered an amendment to strike out the whole of the resolution after the word Resolved, and to insert a provision instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the propriety of establishing a school for the instruction of Midshipmen, and other warrant officers of the Navy, when not at sea.

Mr. LIVINGSTON objected to the substitute, as not going so far as the system he wished to see adopted. The substitute restricted the instruction to midshipmen, but he wished a preparatory school, which should take up young men before they entered the service. Mr. L. said, it was owing to the want of an establishment of this kind, that the Navy was going down. Yes, sir, said he, the Navy, I repeat it, is going down in point of the attainments of those who are entering it. There is, in this respect, a marked distinction between those who are entering the two branches of our military service. Those who enter the army are decidedly superior in previous attainments. The want of a good system of elementary instruction for the naval service, begins to be felt already. It may be felt when it is too late. The future commanders of our maritime force should be prepared now, while we have opportunity and time for it. But, without a school, this can never be done. The actual service may make seamen, but it alone will never make officers.

Mr. FULLER gave the gentleman from Louisiana much credit for his enlarged and statesman-like views on this subject. He commended his desire to place the education of our naval commanders on a broad and permanent basis; and he knew of no objection, at present, which would prevent his voting for the gentleman's resolution. But he must apprise the gentleman, that, before he was a member of Congress, this same subject had been before them; and the Committee on Naval Affairs had made great efforts for its accomplishment. They had confined even their hopes to the education of warrant officers in service, and had used much exertion to reconcile the minds of gentlemen who were opposed to the measure, but had not been able to do it; and he would leave it to the candor of the gentleman from Louisiana to say, if those who refused to grant even the half of the plan he proposed, were likely to accede to the whole of it. Mr. F. disclaimed being swayed by any feelings of pride, as a member of the Naval Committee, which might be supposed to render him jealous of a similar attempt by the gentleman from Louisiana; his only objection was, the difficulty of finding means. He would, however, withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MERRICK then observed, that, as he heard it whispered by some gentlemen who sat near him, that, under the resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana, there was concealed a system of burdensome expense, of great extent, he thought it his duty to state that he was warranted by the gentleman who presided over the Navy Department, in saying that the object might be accomplished at a very small expense. It had been even proposed to place such an institution, without any further grant from Congress, in the barracks erecting at the fortification at the mouth of the Chesapeake. As the buildings were there already provided, all that would have to be granted, would be an appropriation for the salaries of two or three professors, which was a trifling expense in comparison with the good to be attained. Midshipmen are now taken on board our vessels on trial only—they go one voyage to sea—and if, from that experiment, they appear to discover talents for public usefulness, they receive a warrant, and regularly enter the service—just as young men are received as cadets at West Point. The House was aware that the Government could assemble the Midshipmen at any point it might judge proper and thus afford to the Navy some of those benefits which the Army derives from the Academy at West Point.

Mr. KEYNOLDS, of Tennessee, rose, not to oppose the measure proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana, but only to assure that gentleman that this was not the plan which would keep the Navy from "going down." The difficulty lay at a previous point—there was almost no such thing as apprentices in our merchant service. Merchants found the applications so numerous, to take out young lads on trial, and the measure was in general attended with so much trouble and so little profit, that they generally refused to do it. Hence there was no such thing as a proper nursery for our young seamen—and, unless some law was passed compelling ship-owners to take a certain quota of apprentices, in proportion to the tonnage they owned, we should soon have no seamen of our own raising. The proper measure was to go at once to the foundation, and, by some such law as he had suggested, provide an effectual nursery for both services.

The question was then put on Mr. LIVINGSTON'S resolution, and lost—58 members only rising in its favor.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "for the relief of certain persons who suffered by destruction of their property by the enemy, during the late war"—

Mr. ROSS then rose, and observed that it was not his intention to enter into a discussion of the abstract principle of the bill before the committee. If he understood the principle, as well of the bill as of the amendment now proposed, it did not differ materially from that of the bill of 1816, either in form or substance. He did not know that it would be a very profitable inquiry to go into the intentions of Congress in passing that act; but he believed, if such an investigation were made, it would appear that the intent of Congress was to furnish a rule for ascertaining the amount of damage that had been suffered by persons, whose private property had been taken for the use of the United States, and in such circumstances destroyed by the enemy, according to the laws of civilized warfare. The ninth section of that act, so often referred to in this debate, did not introduce into our legislation any new principle, i. e. any principle foreign to the acknowledged laws of nations. If he had rightly understood the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who had favored the House with a learned and lucid argument on the point, he held that when the Government took any private building for a military use, and it was then destroyed by the enemy, with a view to benefit himself and to injure us, it was lawfully destroyed, according to the laws of war among civilized nations. Now, the act of 1816 said none other than this. It went upon this principle as taken for granted, and only directed how the debt, acknowledged to be due from Government to the sufferers, should be ascertained as to its amount. Mr. R. said he thought that, in the previous part of the debate, gentlemen had departed far from the true subject before the committee, when they went into an inquiry, as though the Congress, in passing that act, had not gone according to the received law of nations, and as though some new rule had been then established. It was not so; and, he asked, if the principle of the act of 1816 was a correct one, how Congress could now withhold an extension of that same principle to all the cases justly included within its range? If the Government, when it came out of the late war, flushed with glorious victory, their hearts exulting, and warm with lively gratitude towards those who had raised their country's name by land and on the ocean, could, without regard to nice lines of demarcation, recognize a great principle owned by all civilized nations, and, in accordance with it, had passed the act of 1816, he thought it did not become Congress, at this day, because they find that, in carrying that law into effect, they may chance to have a large sum of money to pay, to begin to quarrel with the law, or deny the principle on which it is founded. He saw no difference between the principle of the present bill, and that of the act of 1816, except the proviso in the latter, that it shall be proved that the occupation of the buildings by the United States was the cause of their destruction by the enemy. The present bill assumed this from the two facts of the occupation and the destruction. It holds that, being occupied for military purposes, the buildings become the lawful subjects of military destruction. The omission of that proviso was no objection against the present bill.

Mr. FARRELY, of Pennsylvania, rose, and, in an argumentative speech of some length, advocated the bill. Conceiving that the dispute which had taken place, regarded rather the facts of the case than the principle on which the law should be framed, he proposed to inquire whether the property for which indemnification was claimed, was, or was not, a legitimate subject of destruction by the enemy. To determine this point, he argued, it ought to be remembered that the Niagara Frontier was the only point from which the Government proposed to make a descent upon the enemy's territory. It was here that, in 1812, an army had been collected and commanded by a gentleman, now an honorable member of this House, (Gen. SMYTH,) and it was from this frontier, that, in the fall of that year, another honorable member (Gen. VAN RENSSLAER) had made a descent on the Canada lines. These facts were sufficient evidence that this was the place from which we intended our hostile operations to proceed: yet no barracks had been provided; no arsenals were built there; no accommodations were prepared for our troops. He asked whether, under such circumstances, it did not become the duty of a British military commander, if he had any regard for the interest of his country, and his own military reputation, to destroy the only means of our army. He found that they depended for shelter upon houses and other buildings which were private property. Now, he would further ask, if the United States had built barracks and magazines, whether they would not have been lawful subjects of destruction? And if private houses were used instead, where was the difference as to the right? The enemy might infer, from what had happened in 1812, that the same thing would happen again in 1818, especially as no barracks had since been built; and, as he knew that it was impossible for troops, in the month of December, to remain in that climate without shelter, it was his duty as a commander to divest them of the only shelter they could obtain, which was in private houses. Gentlemen had said, that it does not appear that the occupation was the motive for destruction; but, Mr. F. said, he would ask, does it appear that such was not the motive? We know that, when Buffalo was destroyed, there were 2,500 men quartered there; and the enemy found that, by destroying one village, he could put it out of the power of our Government to maintain a single post—to keep a single soldier on all that line of frontier. Was not this a sufficient motive? Some gentlemen seemed to disbelieve that these buildings were occupied for military purposes at all. But surely all the testimony went that way; and if facts so well substantiated were to be overturned by mere supposition, and by a theoretical view of national law, he knew not what use there was in testimony, or how facts were ever to be ascertained.

Other gentlemen had insisted that the burning of our frontier, being on a principle of retaliation, was contrary to the law of nations, and, therefore, the Government is not bound to pay. But Mr. F. denied the position, and he defied them to show, in any approved writer on international law, such a doctrine as that retaliation was unlawful. The reverse was true. All writers admit that, when retaliation is just, it may be practised as a means to prevent the repetition of injury. Though we admit that the burning of Newark was a barbarous act, yet the retaliation of it was lawful on the part of the enemy—it was only following the example we had set—and we had rendered the act lawful by our own unlawful conduct in the first place. When our Government commenced a system of destruction of property, it must have known that it incurred the risk of retaliation. It must have known that the burning of Newark rendered Buffalo unsafe; and, if Buffalo was afterwards destroyed, the Government had itself to blame for it.

Accounts and Claims of President Monroe.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. Everett:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

As the term of my service in this high trust will expire at the end of the present session of Congress, I think it proper to invite your attention to an object, very interesting to me, and which, in the movement of our Government, is deemed, on principle, equally interesting to the public. I have been long in the service of my country, and in its most difficult conjunctures, as well abroad as at home, in the course of which I have had a control over the public moneys, to a vast amount. If, in the course of my service, it shall appear, on the most severe scrutiny, which I invite, that the public have sustained any loss by any act of mine, or of others, for which I ought to be held responsible, I am willing to bear it. If, on the other hand, it shall appear, on a view of the law, and of precedents in other cases, that justice has been withheld from me, in any instance, as I have believed it to be in many, and greatly to my injury, it is submitted whether it ought not to be rendered. It is my wish, that all matters of account and claims, between my country and myself, be settled, with that strict regard to justice, which is observed in settlements between individuals in private life. It would be gratifying to me, and it appears to be just, that the subject should be now examined, in both respects, with a view to a decision hereafter. No bill would, it is presumed, be presented for my signature, which would operate either for or against me, and I would certainly sanction none in my favor. While here, I can furnish testimony, applicable to any case, in both views, which a full investigation may require; and the committee to whom the subject may be referred, by reporting facts now, with a view to a decision after my retirement, will allow time for further information, and due consideration, of all matters relating thereto. Settlements with a person in this trust, which could not be made with the accounting officers of the Government, should always be made by Congress, and before the public. The cause of the delay, in presenting these claims, will be explained to the committee to whom the subject may be referred. It will, I presume, be made apparent, that it was inevitable; that, from the peculiar circumstances attending each case, Congress alone could decide on it; and that, from considerations of delicacy, it would have been highly improper for me to have sought it from Congress at an earlier period than that which is now proposed, the expiration of my term in this high trust.

Other considerations appear to me to operate with great force, in favor of the measure which I now propose. A citizen, who has long served his country, in its highest trusts, has a right, if he has served with fidelity, to enjoy undisturbed tranquility and peace, in his retirement. This he cannot expect to do, unless his conduct, in all pecuniary concerns, shall be placed, by severe scrutiny, on a basis not to be shaken. This, therefore, forms a strong motive with me for the inquiry which I now invite. The public may also derive considerable advantage from the precedent, in the future movement of the Government. It being known that such scrutiny was made, in my case, it may form a new and strong barrier against the abuse of the public confidence in future.

JAMES MONROE.

Crimes against the United States.

[H. OF R.]

The Message was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed, Mr. INGHAM for that purpose waiving a motion, which he had made, to refer it to a Select Committee.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 7.

Crimes against the United States.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, of Mass., the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDIOT in the chair,) on the bill more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes.

[The following is an abstract of the provisions of this bill, as originally reported :

The first section provides, That, if any person or persons within any fort, dock-yard, &c., &c., shall, wilfully and maliciously, burn any dwelling house, or mansion house, or any store, barn, or stable, within the curtilage thereof, every person so offending, his or her counsellors, aiders, and abettors, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death.

The second section provides, That, if any person or persons, in any of the places aforesaid, shall, wilfully and maliciously, set fire to, or burn, or otherwise destroy, any beacon, or any other building, than is in the first section of this act mentioned, or any timber, &c., &c., every person so offending, his or her counsellors, aiders, and abettors, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine, not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding ten years, according to the aggravation of the offence.

The third section provides, That, if any offence shall be committed in any of the places aforesaid, the punishment of which offence is not specially provided for by any law of the United States, such offence shall, upon a conviction in any court of the United States having cognizance thereof, be liable to, and receive the same punishment as the laws of the State in which such fort, dock-yard, navy yard, arsenal, or magazine, or other place, ceded as aforesaid, is situated, provide for the like offence, when committed within the body of any county of such State.

The fourth section provides, That, if any person or persons upon the sea, or in any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, basin, or bay, within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, shall commit the crime of wilful murder, or rape, every person so offending, his or her counsellors, aiders, or abettors, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer death.

The fifth section provides, That, if any person or persons, upon the sea, or in any other of the places aforesaid, within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction aforesaid, shall commit theft by force or violence, &c., or run away with vessel, &c., every person so offending, his or her counsellors, aiders, and abettors, shall be deemed guilty of piracy and felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death.

The sixth section provides, That, if any person or persons upon the sea, &c., with intent to kill, rob, steal, commit a rape, or do or perpetrate any other felony, shall break or enter any ship or vessel, boat, or raft; or if any person or persons shall wilfully and maliciously cut, spoil, or destroy, any cordage cable, buoys, &c., every person so offending, shall be punishable by fine, not exceeding one thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding five years.

The seventh section provides, That, if any person or persons, &c., shall receive stolen money or goods, &c., every person, so offending, shall be punishable by fine, not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding three years.

The eighth section provides, That, if any person or persons shall plunder, steal, take away, or destroy any money, goods, &c., from any vessel, which shall be in distress, or which shall be wrecked, lost, stranded, or cast away, &c., or wilfully obstruct the escape of any person endeavoring to save his or her life from such ship, or vessel, or the wreck thereof; or, if any person or persons shall put out any false light or lights, with intention to bring any ship or vessel into danger, or distress, or shipwreck; every person, so offending, his or her counsellors, aiders, and abettors, shall be punishable by fine, not exceeding five thousand dollars, and imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding ten years.

The ninth section provides, That, if any master or commander of any ship, or vessel, belonging, in whole, or in part, to any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall, during his being abroad, maliciously, and without justifiable cause, force any officer or mariner, of such ship or vessel, on shore, or leave him behind, in any foreign port, &c., he shall be punishable by fine, not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment, not exceeding six months.

The tenth section provides, That, if any person or persons, in any case not hereinbefore specially provided for, shall wilfully and maliciously set on fire, or burn, or otherwise destroy, &c., any ship or vessel of war of the United States, whether the same be on float or building, or begun to be built, on any dock-yard of the United States, every person so offending, shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death.

The eleventh section provides, That, if any officer of the United States shall be guilty of extortion, under or by color of his office, he shall be punishable by fine, not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment, not exceeding one year.

The twelfth section provides, That, if any person in any case, matter, hearing, or other proceeding, when an oath or affirmation shall be required to be taken or administered under or by any laws of the United States, shall commit perjury, he shall be punishable by fine, not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding five years. And if any person shall be convicted of subornation of perjury, he shall be punished by fine, not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding five years.

The thirteenth section provides, That, if any person, upon his or her arraignment upon any indictment before any court of the United States for any offence, not capital, shall stand mute, or will not answer or plead to such indictment, the court shall, notwithstanding, proceed to the trial of the person so standing mute, &c. And the trial of all offences which shall be committed upon the sea, or elsewhere within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may be first brought.

The fourteenth section provides, That, in every case where any criminal convicted of any offence against the United States, shall be sentenced to imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, it shall be lawful for the court by which the sentence is passed, to order the same to be executed in any state prison or penitentiary, within the district where such court is holden, the use of which prison or penitentiary shall be allowed or granted by the Legislature of such State for such purposes; and the expenses attendant upon the execution of such sentence shall be paid by the United States.

The fifteenth section provides, That the several courts of the United States shall have power and authority, in all cases of conviction before them of any person or persons, for any crime or offence against the United States, in their discretion, to require any person or persons, so convicted, to give security by a recognizance, with surety or sureties to keep the peace, &c.

The sixteenth section provides, That, if any person who shall be employed as a cashier, clerk, or servant, in the Bank of the United States, or any of its offices, shall steal or embezzle the money or other effects of the Bank, &c., he shall be punishable by fine, not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding ten years, according to the aggravation of the offence.]

The 4th section (which provides for the punishment of murder, rape, and several other crimes, when committed in any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, basin, or bay, within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the U. States) being under consideration—

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved, as an amendment, to insert the following words: "and not within the jurisdiction of any State or territorial government." He explained and supported the amendment, as intended to prevent collisions between the authority of the General and State Governments. The admiralty jurisdiction of the United States had been claimed and exercised within the State of Kentucky, and, he believed, from the mouth of the Mississippi to St. Louis. He conceived the State governments to be entirely competent to inquire into and punish crimes committed within their own jurisdictions, and that, as there was no necessity, there would be no advantage, in giving the United States concurrent power to do the same.

Mr. WEBSTER replied. He had already stated to the committee that one of the principal objects in framing this bill, had been, to avoid a conflict of territorial jurisdictions between the United States and the several States. But it was the first time he had heard of such an extraordinary thing, as that maritime jurisdiction had been exercised by the courts of the United States from the State of Kentucky; he did not know that any person had dreamed of the application of such a jurisdiction there; and Mr. W. said, he thought that those who had exercised it must have been dreaming themselves at the time they did so. The class of crimes provided for in this section not only might happen, but had actually occurred, without the existence of any law to punish them. Murders had been committed on board our own ships while lying in the harbors of foreign nations, and, for want of such a provision, they had gone unpunished. He knew that the State governments were competent to the punishment of crimes committed, under similar circumstances, in any harbor or river of the United States; but they were usually disinclined to do so, considering the crime as more particularly committed against the United States. There might, besides, occur much difficulty, where the boundaries of different counties surrounded the same bay, in deciding within which of them the fact happened. In bays, &c., which, though part of the sea, were not any part "of the high seas," the common law jurisdiction, and the admiralty jurisdiction, were concurrent; and should the section pass, its only effect would be to provide that, if the State did not try the offender, the United States should. As the interest and property more immediately concerned were those of the United States, it was not proper to leave it at the option of any State, whether offences against them should be punished.

Mr. WICKLIFFE replied. He had stated not his opinion, or his apprehensions, but a fact which actually existed. Admiralty jurisdiction had been claimed, and had been exercised within his native State. The jurisdiction had been exercised in Kentucky by a tribunal composed of Judges, who were not in the habit of dreaming on legal subjects, and the question was now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States. The section provides to punish what the States are themselves competent to punish, and in a manner different from that in which some of the States provide to punish it. Admiralty jurisdiction had also been claimed and exercised, Mr. W. said, in the State of Louisiana, and it would be the effect of the section to take the punishment of every boatman who got into a fray, on board one of the flat-bottomed boats on the Mississippi, into the hands of the United States Courts, and punish him in a way at variance with the laws of Louisiana. I (said Mr. W.) would give to the States exclusive jurisdiction within their own territories. Or, if the gentleman intends to punish only crimes committed on board vessels of the United States, and would so modify his amendment as to accomplish that object alone, he would agree to it. But the section, as it stands, said Mr. W., is general and indiscriminate. Mr. W. further objected to it as being without warrant from the constitution. That instrument gives to the General Government no power to prescribe the punishment of crimes, under an admiralty jurisdiction, except such as are committed on the high seas, or are offences against the laws of nations. The crimes here referred to, are not committed on the high seas, nor are they offences against the law of nations.

Mr. WEBSTER inquired, whether he was to understand the gentleman from Kentucky as affirming that the constitution gave to the General Government no other power to punish crimes, except that contained in the clause he had just quoted?

JANUARY, 1835.]

Crimes against the United States.

[H. OF R.]

In answer to Mr. WEBSTER's question—

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he did not see, in the constitution, any delegated power to define and punish the offences designated in the section under consideration when committed within the territorial limits of a State, nor did he think it resulted as necessary to carry into effect the powers delegated to the General Government.

After some further consideration, the question was put on Mr. WICKLIFFE's amendment, and it was negatived, ayes 46, noes 108.

Mr. ELLIS then moved to amend the section by striking out the words ["or rape."] This crime, he said, was, by the penal codes of most of the States of the Union, punished in a manner different from murder; and however infamous the former crime might be, he thought there ought to be a gradation in its punishment below that of the latter. There had been in many States of the Union an endeavor at the reformation of the criminal code—in several States this had been effected to a considerable extent, and he believed without the least detriment to public morals or to public security. He regretted to perceive that the legislation of the States was crossed in so many instances by the proposed bill, and that the old exploded system of punishments was so far adopted and revived by it. The bill, he had understood, professed to be an amelioration of the existing laws—but, if it created, as has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WICKLIFFE,) sixteen new capital offences, it was, instead of an amelioration, rather an aggravation of their severity. It was easy for a legislator to say, that those who broke through the salutary restraints which tend to preserve society, are worthy of death—but, where it was found, on experiment, that penalties of a milder form were equally effectual in the prevention or diminution of crimes, it would not do to insist on such doctrine. A milder system had been tried, and no increase of crimes had occurred beyond the proportion in which population had multiplied—and, while that was the case, he should feel bound in duty to oppose the bill in its present form, at least by his vote, and to protest against all needless multiplication of capital punishments.

Mr. GAZLAY supported the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, chiefly on this ground, that, if "rape" were placed on an equal footing with murder, where the one was committed the other would generally be committed also, to prevent prosecution.

Mr. WEBSTER replied, that the Committee on the Judiciary did not consider themselves as instructed to re-modify the penal policy of the United States. They had no authority to do so. Should the time come when the Government should see fit to abolish capital punishments entirely, it was competent to do so—but the present bill would be found, upon the whole, to be a mitigation of the laws as they previously stood. He did not know that he should object to the present amendment, inasmuch as it was not probable that the crime referred to would often occur in the circumstances provided for; but, as to the crime itself, he never would consent that it should be punished with any thing less than death. The amendment was lost.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved to insert a section in the bill, which provides, that, if any offence shall be committed on board of any ship or vessel belonging to any citizen of the United States, while lying in a port or place within the jurisdiction of any foreign state or sovereign, it shall be cognizable by the United States Court in the same manner as if committed on the high seas; with a proviso that, if tried abroad, the offender shall not again be tried at home.

To this, Mr. FORSYTH objected, as unnecessary, and somewhat dangerous; unnecessary, because the crimes were punishable by foreign Governments; dangerous, because it contained no safeguard against a citizen who had been tried and acquitted by our own courts being afterwards tried and condemned by a foreign jurisdiction.

Mr. A. STEVENSON, of Virginia, objected to the amendment on constitutional grounds. He denied the power of this Government to carry its territorial jurisdiction within the jurisdiction of another sovereign. The received doctrine of the law of nations was, that the jurisdiction of any sovereignty was commensurate with the boundaries of the country in which it existed, except when, by a fiction, it was supposed to accompany its ambassadors when abroad, its armies when on a march, and its ships of war; but this section applied to private as well as public ships, and he denied that a private vessel could carry the United States jurisdiction with her wherever she went.

Mr. WEBSTER explained, and again referred to cases where crimes had been committed on board our own vessels, but had gone without punishment, because the vessel was within a foreign jurisdiction. It was a case that might happen every day. Our commerce had spread over all seas; it extended into all the bays and ascended all the rivers of the world. But, as the law now stood, the moment a vessel left the high seas and entered into any creek, haven, or bay, the persons on board were left without law; the crew might rise and murder the master, or commit any other outrage, and there was no law whatever to punish them. As much as two hundred years ago, the necessity of some such provision as that now proposed, had been seen by the Government of England, and, in the reign of Henry 8th, a statute was enacted to punish at home crimes committed on board English ships in foreign harbors. Numerous convictions had taken place under that statute, one of the most celebrated of which was the case of Governor Wall, who was tried and hanged in England for a murder he committed at Goree.

It is objected, said he, that we shall usurp jurisdiction where it does not belong to us—but the object of this section is to protect our own property, and punish offences committed against this Government by its own citizens. Suppose an act of treason against the United States were planned or committed without the limits of our own territory, would the United States have no power to punish it? The power to enact the provisions of this section rests on the power granted by the constitution to protect commerce—it rests on the same ground as the laws punishing certain crimes against the Post-Office; many of which are punished by death. Either the entire class of crimes he had mentioned are absolutely dispensable, or they must be punished by the laws of the United States. As to the danger of a second trial abroad, after the accused has once been tried at home, he thought it to be very small—it was possible—the man might go back to the place where he had committed the offence, and he might be apprehended and tried by a foreign tribunal—but there is generally little inclination to meddle in such matters, the foreign Government usually considering it as being not their affair. But, if the House saw any danger in the provision, they would, of course, refuse to adopt it.

Mr. FORSYTH insisted on his objections to this provision, and suggested that a provision might be made to try the offender if the foreign Government shall refuse to do it—and to prescribe a course of proceeding where no Government existed, as on the coast of Africa, the Marquesas, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER suggested much inconvenience in applying to know whether the foreign Government did refuse. The seat of government might be 500 or 5,000 miles from where the ship lay—and before application could be made, and an answer obtained, she might be detained there for years, &c.

Mr. LIVINGSTON had no doubt of the power of the Government over its own citizens, in all parts of the world, but he objected to the section, because it made no distinction respecting by whom or upon whom the crimes enumerated, were committed. A theft might, for example, be committed in the midst of the harbor of Liverpool, by some one of the inhabitants, on board an American ship, and, according to the section, the thief must be brought off to the United States to be tried and punished. Its provisions, too, embraced every offence, without distinction—crimes against the local police, &c., which the United States might find great difficulty in deciding upon. He feared some difficulty might arise with foreign Governments, under the operation of such a provision. For, if the United States courts have power to punish, they have also power to bring the offender before them, and a man who stole a trifling article, must be brought off from London or Paris to be tried in this country.

Mr. WEBSTER then proposed to restrict the section to murder and manslaughter, and to confine it to offences committed "by or upon any person belonging to the ship's crew, or any passenger on board the vessel." After considerable discussion, the latter alteration was agreed to, but the words "murder and manslaughter" were stricken out, and the words "any offence" were restored.

The 6th section provides to punish running away with the ship or her cargo, by death.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed a willingness to change this punishment, (hitherto always assigned by law to this offence,) for fine and imprisonment, if the committee should judge the latter penalty sufficient.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, said he highly approved of the general features of this bill. It was a disgrace to our system of laws, that no provision had ever been made for the punishment of the crimes which it embraced, when committed in places within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. He thought, however, that the penalty of death was too severe to be annexed to the description of crimes contained in the section under consideration.

The power of punishment vested in Government, said Mr. B., results from the right of self-defence. Vengeance belongs not to man. We should, therefore, be careful not to inflict punishments of a nature more severe than the safety of society requires. In all cases where the character of the crime does not involve such a degree of moral depravity in the criminal as to preclude a reasonable hope of his reformation, it would be both unjust and cruel in the extreme, to deprive him of life. These principles need not be either illustrated or enforced before this committee.

What, then, said Mr. B., is the nature of the crimes embraced by this section? One clause of it declares that the passenger on board of any vessel who steals and carries away from it goods of the value of 1,000 dollars, shall suffer death. Is not this punishment out of all proportion with the crime? Is it necessary for the safety of society that death should be the penalty in such a case? Is it possible that a provision of this nature can, in the present improved state of society, be incorporated in our penal code? He believed not. The other crimes enumerated in the section, although more aggravated than the one just mentioned, are chiefly offences against the right of property; and a distinction has generally been made between such crimes and those which are malum in se, or highly criminal by the laws of nature.

What, said Mr. B., is the consequence of annexing cruel punishment to crimes? The people of the United States are humane and compassionate, and when the feelings of society are in opposition to the laws, you cannot carry them into execution. The humanity of juries is interposed between the criminal and punishment. The highest crimes thus often pass unpunished; and the chance of escape is in proportion to the enormity of the offence. Even after conviction and judgment, we know by experience how difficult it is to get the sentence of the law executed. It is the interest of society, therefore, that, in the degree of punishment, justice should be tempered with mercy.

Mr. B. observed, he had been a member of the committee which reported the bill. He might have moved this amendment in the committee, but had neglected to do so. He trusted that the honorable chairman, (Mr. WEBSTER,) to whom we were so much indebted for the bill, would not object to it.

Mr. B. then moved to strike out, at the end of the section now under consideration, the words—"be deemed guilty of piracy and felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death;" and insert, in lieu thereof, the words, "be punishable by fine not exceeding $5,000, and by imprisonment not exceeding ten years."

The question on this motion being taken, without debate, was decided in the affirmative.

Before the committee proceeded to the next section of the bill, Mr. P. P. BARBOUR expressed a desire for further time to reflect upon its various and important provisions, and, with the view to obtain it, moved that the committee rise, which motion prevailed. The committee rose accordingly, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, JANUARY 10.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to examine and report to this House, whether any, and if any, what, further legislative provision is necessary for the impartial administration of justice in the territorial governments of the United States."

In offering this resolution, Mr. T. said, it had become his duty to call the attention of the House to this subject, in consequence of certain communications he had received from one of the territories, requiring, in his judgment, the attention of Congress. In most of the territories, inferior courts of law have been established by their local legislatures. The judges of these courts are appointed for a limited period, unless sooner removed by the Executive authority. In the absence of the governor, the secretary of the territory exercises all the powers and prerogatives of that officer. Generally, he is a member of the bar and a practitioner in the territorial courts. The governors are frequently absent from their territories many months in succession. In such case, it has happened, and, unless prohibited by law, may again happen, that one of the attorneys on record, in a cause depending in court, appoints the judges to try the cause, holds over them the power of removal at pleasure, and exerts a controlling influence in fixing their compensations. The danger of this power, so unfriendly to the impartial administration of justice, becomes more apparent when we consider the influence the acting governor is capable of exerting over the jurors. Those, being freeholders, generally compose the class of citizens which furnish most of the candidates for the offices of sheriff, justice, coroner, and for office in the militia. In addition, then, to his influence with the court, arising from the facts above mentioned, it has often happened that a portion of the jurors impanelled and sworn to try the cause, have stood in relation to one of the attorneys in the attitude of humble suppliants for office.

These statements, said Mr. T., are not made in reference to any particular case of injustice which may have arisen; but the facts upon which they are founded are derived from very respectable authority, and are entitled to consideration.

The remoteness of the territories from the seat of the General Government, the imperfect responsibility of officers there to the people, the difficulty of detecting and punishing abuses which may exist, unite in demanding of Congress the removal, so far as may be practicable, of all temptation to injustice or oppression. The particular danger to which he had alluded, Mr. T. said, might be remedied by a law prohibiting the person exercising the office of governor from practising as attorney, counsellor, or solicitor, in the courts of the territory over which he may preside.

This prohibition, it was believed, would furnish ground for no such complaint on the part of the officer whom it might affect. The secretary of a territory enjoys a salary from the United States of $1,000 a year. Our district judges, with salaries, many of which are not greater, and for considerations certainly not more important to the public, have been prohibited engaging, before other and independent judges, in the practice of law. At any rate, said Mr. T., the subject is worthy the attention of the appropriate committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

Penal Laws of the United States.

The House then, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER, went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. COMPTON in the chair,) on the bill further to provide for the punishment of crimes against the United States.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR rose for the purpose of suggesting to the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the propriety of a modification of the bill now before the committee—a modification which had respect to the principle of the bill, and which, if adopted, would run through several of its parts. He highly approved of much that the bill contained, and thought that many of the offences it contemplated were worthy of punishment; but the object he wished to attain, in the modification he now suggested was, that the federal courts shall have cognizance of all cases where punishment was necessary, and where the State courts have no jurisdiction; but that, where the State courts have jurisdiction, there none should be given to the United States. He was fully aware that the subject was one attended with much and great difficulty. If we look at the legislative department of the Government, we find that the constitution gives it power to define and punish piracies and felonies, committed on the high seas, and offences against the laws of nations: if we look to the judicial department, we find the constitution giving it jurisdiction over all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Confining our attention only to the legislative power of the Government, it would seem to be at once limited to "the high seas;" but, if we go on to the judicial, we find it under the words "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" terms, the precise import of which there is much difficulty in settling. The question arises, how far does this admiralty jurisdiction extend? The difficulty of marking this line with precision, none knew better than the gentleman from Massachusetts himself, who took a very distinguished part in a celebrated case lately argued before the Supreme Court of the United States, and which turned mainly on that question. In another case, where the same question came up, Judge Story devoted seventy-five pages to the discussion of it. It is the opinion of some, and this distinguished jurist is one of the number, that maritime jurisdiction extends over "the high seas," and over the sea as it extends into bays, harbors, rivers, and creeks, and as far as it ebbs and flows. Others say that the common law jurisdiction extends only to the enclosed parts of the sea. If the first of these opinions is the correct one, then, according to the provisions of the present bill, the jurisdiction of the federal courts will spread over all the bays, harbors, and rivers of the Union, as far as the tide flows. Mr. B. observed that he should not himself undertake to define the precise extent of this so often discussed jurisdiction; but, as the point had been a matter of controversy long before the date of our constitution, it might be argued, with some plausibility, that the clause in the constitution which speaks of piracies and felonies "on the high seas," had been intended to settle the question. It was a controversy which had called forth a vast amount of talent and intelligence; but without pretending to settle it, he conceived that every necessary purpose would be subserved, if the bill shall make provision for the punishment of crimes committed without and beyond the jurisdiction of the several States. Now, it was the received doctrine, that every State has jurisdiction as far as its own territorial limits extend; and these limits clearly include all the bays, waters, creeks, &c., which are within the State. The gentleman must well recollect the case where this was settled before the Supreme Court in relation to the State of Massachusetts. His wish was to avoid all colliding jurisdictions; and, therefore, it was, that he wished the bill modified in the manner he had stated. And he now suggested, with that view, that the bill should be made to read as applying to offences committed "on the high seas, and beyond the territorial jurisdiction of any of the States;" or any other phraseology which would attain the same object. He believed the language in the former law was "out of the jurisdiction of any particular State." He trusted that the honorable member from Massachusetts would not object to such a modification.

Mr. WEBSTER rose in reply: he said that the member from Virginia had stated with great fairness the difficulty which attended this subject; and if he apprehended, with that honorable member, that any disagreeable collision could take place between the Federal and State authorities from the passage of the bill as it stands, he might be, perhaps, induced to modify it as proposed. He was well aware that the leading law heretofore existing on this subject, provided for the punishment of crimes committed "on the high seas, or in any bay, harbor, basin, creek, or river, out of the jurisdiction of any particular State;" but he had expressly stated, when he introduced the present bill, that its object was to carry that act further, and he would now assign some of the reasons which led him to desire it. The power to punish was one for which no Government nowadays was much disposed to contend; and the offences committed within the federal jurisdiction were, in most cases, directed against the United States, or against those interests which the Government was especially bound to protect. The jurisdiction of the United States was found chiefly where commerce existed, and commerce was an interest which the United States were peculiarly bound to protect—it is an interest regulated by the United States—its revenue is given to the United States; and the bill proposes to give the federal courts jurisdiction over crimes only where they now have jurisdiction over commerce. The crimes most mischievous were crimes against the property of the Government. Now the question was, whether the General Government shall devolve the whole burden (for it was a burden and not a privilege) of punishing crimes against itself, on the State governments, because committed within their bounds. In taking this task into their own hands, the Government will only be acting on the principle which has governed it from its origin—offences against those rights which are peculiarly committed to its protection it has always punished in its own courts, such as counterfeiting the national coin, forging the national securities, &c. There was nothing to prevent the State governments from punishing these offences as well as others within their limits; yet the Federal Government has never left it to them. The great objection against leaving the task of punishing to the State governments is the burden of expense: no State government, so far as his knowledge extended, was ever very anxious to take this burden—none were very ambitious of extending their jurisdiction in this respect. He would now state, so far as his understanding of it went, how the power of punishing these crimes came to the General Government. In defining the power of Congress, the constitution says, it shall extend to the defining and punishing of piracies and felonies upon the high seas, and offences against the law of nations. Whether the constitution uses the term "high seas," in its strictly technical sense, or in a sense more enlarged, is not material. The constitution throughout, in distributing legislative power, has reference to its judicial exercise, and so, in distributing judicial power, has respect to the legislative. Congress may provide by law for the punishment; but it cannot punish. Now it says that the judicial power shall extend to all cases of maritime jurisdiction; and it has lately been argued that, as soon as a judicial system is organized, it had maritime jurisdiction at once, by the constitution, without any law to that effect—but I do not agree to this doctrine—and I am very sure that such has not been the practice of our Government from its origin in 1789 till now. The constitution defines what shall be the objects of judicial power, and it establishes only a Supreme Court—but in the subordinate courts, the jurisdiction they shall exercise must be defined by Congress; the defining of it is essential to the creation of those courts. The judicial power is indeed granted by the constitution, but it is not, and cannot be exercised till Congress establishes the courts by which it is to be so exercised. And I hold there is still a residuum of judicial power, which has been granted by the constitution, and is not yet exercised, viz: for the punishment of crimes committed within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States courts, and yet not without the jurisdiction of the particular States. So the constitution says that the federal courts shall have jurisdiction of all civil cases between citizens of different States, and yet the law restricts this jurisdiction in many respects—as to the amount sued for, &c. There is a mass of power intrusted to Congress; but Congress has not granted it all to specific courts, and therefore the courts do not exercise it. The constitution gives to Congress legislative power in all cases of admiralty jurisdiction, from whence has occurred one of the most extraordinary of all circumstances, that causes of revenue have become cases of admiralty jurisdiction. The cause of this seems to be, that, under the colonies, these causes were tried by a judge of the Crown; in England they are not held to be cases of admiralty jurisdiction; but are tried by juries in the court of exchequer. The act of 1790 gives to the District Court of the United States original cognizance of all cases of admiralty jurisdiction, including cases of seizure; hence that very state of things has happened, against which, when we were colonies, we were petitioning the mother country for a hundred years, (which seems to show that the real grievance was not the trial of those causes without a jury, but by a judge appointed abroad and without our consent.) Mr. W. said that, notwithstanding the objection urged against the bill, it would be found that the law now existing has provided for the jurisdiction the bill proposes—that is, for the punishment of crimes committed within the maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and at the same time within the jurisdiction of the States. The act of 1790, if it had stopped at the words "high seas," would, indeed, have excluded such a jurisdiction as that now proposed—but it does not stop there: it says, also, "and in all bays, harbors, creeks," &c. Many things are directed to be punished in the act of 1790, on the high seas, which are neither piracies nor felonies, although the constitution, speaking of the judicial power, restricts it to piracies and felonies, which would infer that the constitution was then held to grant larger power by the other clause. Several other laws, besides that of 1790, give express authority for the extent of jurisdiction in this bill. Mr. W. here adverted to the act of May, 1820, in which it is decided that admiralty jurisdiction extends as far as the tide ebbs and flows. Mr. W. concluded his remarks, (of which our reporter professes to have given but an imperfect outline, in which he does not expect to have attained the complete accuracy desirable in a view of legal discussions,) by remarking that, if he perceived any danger of the collision which some gentlemen seemed to apprehend, he should be the last to urge any bill that would produce it. We might, indeed, get along without the measure now proposed—we might continue to limp and halt as we have hitherto limped and halted—many murders would go unpunished, and much United States property would be left without any protection from the United States. If we went into any harbor of the country, we should see less of the State authority than was proposed to be left untouched by this bill. The commerce there is all regulated by United States laws—the masters, the mariners, the pilots, are all under regulations of the United States—and he thought that the crimes committed there would also be most properly punished by the United States, if its jurisdiction may lawfully be extended to them.

WEDNESDAY, January 12.

Mr. BRECHER moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland Road. The motion prevailed—ayes 57, noes 55.

The House went into committee accordingly, Mr. STEELING in the chair, on the bill; which was read. When

Mr. BRECHER, of Ohio, rose, and observed, that the subject to which he was now about to call the attention of the House, was one which had been before Congress, in one form or other, for nearly a quarter of a century. The object of the present bill was merely the continuation of a great national road, long since planned, and in part executed. It was an undertaking that did honor to this nation, which, even in its incipient stage, had already been productive of great utility; but which, when completed, would be of the highest importance to the public welfare. He would not devote any time to a discussion of the constitutionality of the object proposed. The power of Congress to appropriate money for purposes of internal improvement had lately undergone a very full discussion on this floor, and it would be only a waste of time to travel again over the arguments which had been adduced. He took it for granted that the question was now at rest. He conceived that the sense of the nation was by this time well understood as being in favor of a system of internal improvement, to be conducted on enlarged principles, and with a view to the good of the whole Union. The wisdom of such a system was acknowledged by many who were opposed to commencing it in any particular part of the country, but who thought that there must first be a general survey of the whole ground, and then that the various parts of the plan should be begun in different parts of the Union at the same time. He was of opinion that such a scheme was altogether impracticable, and that it was impossible that every object should be delayed till all of them could go on together. Was there any necessity of this mutual suspicion? Could the members of this confederacy, and of this House, think so injuriously of each other as to suppose that they would abandon the system as soon as each district of the country had secured its own object? For himself, he should blush at such an idea. He knew of no valid objection to making a beginning of the system now. The object he advocated was not the thought of a moment. As early as the year 1800, Congress had set about the design of consolidating, by the means of mutual and easy intercourse, the interests of the South and the West with those of the Eastern parts of our Union. The design had met with much opposition; but the good sense of the House had seen the propriety of the measure—it had met the exigency; and, triumphing over prejudice, had accomplished the beginning of an object which, if pursued and carried out, would lead to results of the most important and valuable nature. This was not to be viewed as a merely Western object. Thus far, it had been of more benefit to the East than to the West. It must be viewed, so far, as an Eastern expenditure. Although the funds out of which it had been made were collected in part from the scattered and scanty pecuniary resources of the Western States, who, feeling an interest in the success of a great national object, had willingly contributed to aid it, yet it had been to them an Eastern object. The people who first settled in Ohio had to make great sacrifices to do this; but they had cheerfully put their hands into their pockets—and they had done so on great national principles.

It had been said by some, that what they contributed was not a gift. True, it was not. Neither was the road a gift on the part of the United States. The consideration on the part of the State was the exoneration of the public lands within it from taxes for a time; but the amount thus remitted was not equal to what the State had paid out. They had been told that a great amount of school lands had been given by the General Government to the Western States. He denied the position: not a foot of school land had ever been given to the State of Ohio; they had all been purchased. He granted that the reservation of the lots for education out of the public lands, originated in a benevolent principle on the part of the General Government. But, it was also true, that that reservation had been a benefit to the Government. The object of it was to aid the sale of the public lands, by holding out to settlers the benefits of a provision for the education of their children. The buyer looked at this provision, and considered it as a part of what he was purchasing when he paid for his land. This gave value to the public land, and brought money into the Treasury of the General Government. These school lands were, therefore, not to be considered as a gift. The reservation, no doubt, operated as a great benefit to the West. Yet the benefit was strictly mutual. There were, indeed, some cases where land had been granted to endow colleges, and the like, which had more the appearance of a gift; but still it was done on the same principle. This intention was made known, when the lands were set up for sale, and it helped to raise their price, and led to a more rapid improvement of the public property. Mr. B. said he had made these observations because it had been said, not only out of doors, but on the floor of this House, and at the last session of Congress, that the General Government had done every thing for the Western States; that it had been most liberal towards them; nay, that it had civilised them—and, therefore, the West must not even ask for any thing more. He did not ask the road in this bill as a donation to the Western States—but he asked it as a great national object, and on principles of national policy. In the first place, it would prove a connecting link between the country on the Mississippi and the Atlantic seaboard. Its importance on this ground had been too often discussed, and too long and universally admitted, to be disputed now. In the next place, he would consider it in relation to an objection which had been urged in the debate on internal improvements, viz: that that system would give general offence by leading to an unequal distribution of the public moneys; that revenue would be collected at one extremity of the Union, and expended at another. It was true that every Government ought to be just as well as liberal, and dispense its benefits with an equal hand. But how does the principle apply to the actual state of things? What has already been done in the expenditure of the public funds? Fifteen millions of dollars were expended annually, and what proportion of it went west of the Alleghany Mountain? Go into the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and see what proportion of what those States paid into the Treasury, was expended within their own bounds. He would not enumerate the expenditures of the Government—all must know that almost the whole of them were on this side of the mountains—though the population was not as one to fifteen. The whole of the public money expended in Kentucky would not amount to what the mere collection cost on the east of the Alleghany. Many of the objects of the expenditure had no existence to the West. Your forts, your light-houses, your navy, the whole civil list, with the exception of one or two judges, and the Representatives in Congress, existed to the East, and there went the greater part of all that was expended for the army. What equality was here? It could not be maintained for a moment. But now a great national work was proposed, which, so far as it went, was calculated to make the balance less unequal, and as such it was deserving of the favorable regard of this House. The mere expenditure of the money which this road would cost, would itself be a great benefit to Ohio, and he hoped it was not unjust that they should have a share of the public expenditure, as well as others. The entire sum would not be equal to what was now expended in some small ports on the Atlantic coast. The building of a single frigate would cost as much as the whole road now asked for. He did not wish to be understood as complaining of the expenditures to the East; he had himself always been in favor of authorizing whatever was needed for the national welfare—he had supported the appropriation for the Navy, as well as those for fortifications—so have the Western members in general, although they might, in some sense, be said to be uninterested in those expenditures. They viewed them as tending to the common benefit of the nation, and they had cheerfully supported them.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, then rose, and observed, that he should not say any thing in addition to what had fallen from the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. BEECHER,) respecting the national expenditure east of the mountains. Independent of that consideration entirely, the Western States had a claim upon the General Government, for the road now proposed, and not only for so much of it as was now proposed, but for its continuation quite to the Mississippi. But, as the Representative of the State of Illinois, Mr. C. said he could not consent that so much of the two per cent. on the sale of public lands, as was set apart for the benefit of that State, should go to be expended at so great a distance from it. He would not, indeed, adopt the principles and spirit of Shylock, in pressing the bond of the General Government to the State he represented, but as its Representative, he could never give his vote to take a fund pledged for her benefit, and lay it out on so distant an object as a road of eighty miles from Wheeling to Zanesville, in the State of Ohio. He would not take what the munificence of the General Government (for he would call it by that name) had set apart to make a road to Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, to be spent on a road, which did not approach either of them; nor would he consent that money, granted for the road now proposed, should be charged on that fund. Indiana had surrendered her rights as a sovereign State, (the right to tax lands for five years after sale,) on condition that Congress would apply two per cent. on the sale of public lands to the construction of roads leading to the State. For his own part, he was not so sanguine as to the prospect of seeing a great national turnpike completed, as the gentleman from Ohio seemed to be. He did not expect that that object would be accomplished in his lifetime, should he reach the ordinary age of man. Nor was he willing to postpone the road to his own State till that national object was accomplished, and the present generation had passed away; and he had long since made up his mind not to vote for the appropriation of any more money which was to be charged on the two per cent. fund, unless it went to carry the road entirely through. Congress had appropriated two per cent. to the making of a road leading to Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio proposes to pledge it for a road three hundred miles short of the bounds of Illinois. I will not consent to this. If I did, I should be censured, and justly, by those who sent me here as the guardian of their interests. The Legislatures of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, had each passed resolutions, calling on Congress for an appropriation to this object—it was an object of deep interest to all those States, and he should be departing from the instructions of his constituents, if he gave his vote for a road in Ohio only.

Mr. BEECHER rose in reply—he declared himself to be disappointed, both in the quarter from which opposition had arisen, and in the principle on which it was founded. He thought he had stated, when first up, with sufficient distinctness, that the appropriation for this part of the road was a matter entirely distinct from the two per cent. reserved from the proceeds of the public lands. The gentleman from Illinois cannot but know that that is already pledged, and already expended; it had been laid out on a road "toward" the State of Illinois, which was the very language of the very act pledging it. He would not, however, cavil about this little two per cent. fund—he wished to place the present measure on a broad national basis—on the general principle of internal improvement.

He was surprised to find that gentleman limiting his views as he had done, and narrowing himself into a mere agent for the State of Illinois. If every gentleman on this floor is to act on such a principle, this House will be converted into a body of disorganizers, and its acts must tend, not to union and national strength, but to separation and national weakness—it was by adopting larger and more noble principles that this nation was to grow and flourish. The gentleman insists on a road that shall reach Illinois—but how will he get it there? on the mere two per cent. fund? That whole fund was not sufficient to make the road through one county in Indiana—it would not even mark the road through that State—if this road is to be gone on with at all, it is to be done on the funds of the nation, and not on a pittance of a two per cent. fund. The gentleman wants to lay out a grand national road 500 miles long, on a fund that will never raise one million of dollars; no, not more than $700,000. But $1,600,000 has already been expended, on this same fund, whether properly or not, is not the question. No, sir, said Mr. B., I ask gentlemen, and I ask that gentleman, to meet me on principles upon which alone either he or I can be benefited in this matter—on grand principles of general national advantage—principles which animated and gave success to those who first broached this measure—principles on which had been based the acts of 1803, of 1806, of 1812—and on which all that had been done to this day had been avowedly founded. For himself, he had candidly placed the object before the House in its true light—as requiring a distinct appropriation for which there was to be no return from the two per cent. fund, or any other. The nation is about to make a road; and if the nation shall say it is best to begin it at the Mississippi River, I will give that gentleman my hand to support the measure; but I presume it will be the opinion of the nation, nay, I do not doubt the gentleman himself will allow that it is better to begin where the road has now been discontinued.

Mr. JENNINGS, of Indiana, observed that he regretted being obliged to oppose the bill; but he believed that the history of the measure, in its earlier stages, was not generally known or understood. In the original compact between the State of Ohio and the United States, two per cent. out of five per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands was reserved for the purpose of making a road from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to the navigable waters of the Ohio, and thence through the State of Ohio. The compact did not prescribe what kind of a road it should be, nor with what views it should be constructed, whether with a national view or not. Congress, in fulfilment of this contract, had thought proper to make such a road as was not to be found elsewhere in the United States; and they continued to carry it forward without considering what the fund pledged was likely to yield, till it came west of the Alleghany Mountains. They then found that the whole proceeds of the fund had been swallowed up, and more. Then an appropriation was asked to complete the road on the same scale; some difficulties arose; and, in 1819, the appropriation was made, with a proviso, the effect of which was completely to violate a contract with the State of Indiana. [Here Mr. J. quoted the act of 1819.] The compact with Indiana was not similar in its terms to that with Ohio—it prescribed a specific location for the road—but the appropriation could not be obtained on any other condition. Two years since a bill was introduced into the House to repair the Cumberland road—and he had offered an amendment to it, with the express view of removing the restriction imposed on the fund by the act of 1819; which, however, he was induced, by the solicitations of his friends, to withdraw—he had always thought, however, that the Government kept bad faith with the State of Indiana. He had a reason and an object in wishing that the road may be located, and opened afterward. The whole of the fund pledged has been expended, and the road for which it was first pledged is not even located. The State of Indiana has no authority to locate it. That can be done only by the General Government. So that all is kept in a state of suspense, and nothing can be done for want of a location. But, if this were once effected; if an appropriation were granted, first to locate the whole of the road, I would then be willing to give the gentleman enough to carry the road in a complete state to Zanesville.

Mr. McCOR vindicated the Government from the charge of a violation of good faith. The fund had been pledged to make a road toward Ohio, not from Boston, but from this city. The Congress had done it not through any oversight, but deliberately and advisedly. Some difficulty was experienced in getting the money—none whatever in getting the pledge. The road does lead toward Ohio. He concluded his remarks, (which being delivered in a very low tone of voice, were imperfectly heard by the reporter,) with expressing a hope that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois would not prevail.

Mr. TRIMBLE said he had risen, not with any intention of detaining the House, but for the purpose of showing that the gentleman from Illinois had entirely mistaken the compact respecting the two per cent. If there was any one point in his whole argument which went on an entire misapprehension of fact, it was his view of this subject. When the original bond, as the gentleman from Illinois had called it, was entered into between the United States and Virginia, territory now occupied by four States was but a wilderness. It was yet under territorial Government when the act of Congress passed allowing the eastern division to form a State Government; and by the compact between that State and the United States, a reservation of two per cent. was agreed to on both sides, to be used in making roads from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to the State, (Ohio), and through the same. Now, suppose those States were a territory still, how would you begin the road agreed upon? You would begin, first, a road to it, and then you would carry the road through it; but the dividing of the territory into States had not changed the stipulation. And now, to examine the subject in relation to the gentleman's own State. He insists upon a literal fulfilment of the contract, and charges the General Government with having violated it by applying the two per cent. reserved to the expense of the Cumberland road. But what does the contract say? It says the reserve shall go to make a road to the State; and the gentleman is pleading that the road must be through the State. It is himself that is violating the letter of the compact. (Nor does this argument, for a liberal construction, come with a very good grace from the gentleman, who himself but lately proposed that the road should be, in part, exchanged for a canal.) But the gentleman must remember that there are two parties—the United States on the one side, and his State on the other. Now the question recurs, where must the road, according to the compact, be commenced? Shall you begin it at the Mississippi? This would be to begin by making the road through Illinois, whereas the contract stipulates that the road shall first be made to that State, and the two per cent. is so pledged. The construction of the gentleman is against both the letter and the spirit of the compact. Congress is at perfect liberty to pledge the two per cent. if they so please. For himself, Mr. T. said he felt very indifferent whether the pledge was given or not. But now, to come to the good sense of the matter, we have made the road, said Mr. T., as far as Wheeling; this is a road to the territory; we are now to make a road through it. Where shall we begin? At the point where the part already finished terminates? Or shall we go on with the whole at once? Good sense, he thought, would decide that the beginning should be made at Wheeling. There was the great thoroughfare to the West; the country was thickly settled and peopled; and the road would at once produce the greatest benefits. Shall we leave this and go to the sparsely peopled regions of Illinois? He did not, however, intend to enter further into the subject, having risen merely for the purpose of answering the argument of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRECHER here rose to say, that, if the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. Cook) would withdraw the amendment he had offered, he would meet his views by striking out that clause of the bill which goes to pledge the two per cent. fund.

Mr. Cook signified his intention to do so, when he should have first replied to the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. TRIMBLE.) The gentleman, said Mr. C., has presented certain supposed views of mine about the school fund in Illinois being diverted to canalising purposes, and represents me as being willing in that affair, to violate the compact of Illinois with the United States, although I contend, on this occasion, for its literal interpretation and fulfilment. Sir, this is so glaring an attack upon my understanding and consistency, that I cannot let it pass without reply. The gentleman has entirely misstated my proposition in relation to the school fund. I proposed merely to apply the school fund to the construction of a canal, and reimburse it out of the tolls, but I did not propose even this arrangement of mere convenience to be carried into effect without the consent of the State legislature first asked and obtained. I did not, therefore, contemplate the slightest violation of the compact.

He sets out in his argument with a fact of which I never had the good luck even to hear till he spoke of it, viz: an agreement of Virginia with the United States on the subject of this road. Now I always had thought that the first agreement respecting it was made with Ohio. I never heard of such a compact as that he speaks of. He objects to my interpretation of the agreement of the General Government with Illinois, as though I wanted, on that agreement, a road to be constructed through my own State. But, sir, Missouri lies beyond Illinois, and if my construction be a sound one, as the fund of Missouri also is pledged, the road must reach Missouri, and will, of course, traverse Illinois. I hold, therefore, that my argument has not been shaken by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. TRIMBLE.) I shall, however, now withdraw the amendment I offered, and allow the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BRECHER) an opportunity to get at work upon the road as soon as he can, assuring him that I shall rejoice in his success.

Mr. BRECHER then moved to strike out all that part of the bill which contains the pledge above alluded to. He stated, in explanation, that the clause had been taken from the former acts, in all of which it was to be found. When it was proposed in the committee which prepared the bill, to retain this clause, he was himself opposed to it—for he considered the pledge as amounting to nothing, the fund being already expended. If this measure succeeded at all, it must succeed on grand national principles, and on these alone the appropriation must be made. He thought it best to be candid, and at once to place the object on its real grounds. He was confident that such a course in this House could never operate to injure the bill.

The question was then put on striking out, and there rose in its favor 58, against it 47; which not amounting to a quorum of the House, and the Chairman being about again to put the question, on motion of Mr. BRECHER, the committee rose, and, having obtained leave to sit again,

The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 13.

Continuation of the Cumberland Road.

The House proceeded to the unfinished business of yesterday, and went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. STERLING, of Connecticut, in the chair,) on the bill to continue the Cumberland road; and the question being on the motion of Mr. BRECHER, to strike out that part of the bill which goes to pledge the 2 per cent. fund arising from the sale of the public lands, to reimburse the sum appropriated,

Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, rose, and said that he wished clearly to understand what would be the effect of the provisions of the bill, and for that purpose he had risen to inquire what was the present condition of this fund of 2 per cent. of the sales of the public lands? If he had been correctly informed, the proceeds of that fund were all exhausted on the Cumberland road, and the money now to be appropriated was to be advanced on a fund which would not yield any returns, perhaps, in fifty years, perhaps never. He wished to meet the question fairly; and, if the money was to be given out of the Treasury for the object proposed, he wished at once to know it, that the House might not put on the statute book an act in a deceptive form, purporting that the money granted is to be returned, when no such thing is expected.

As the matter now stood, he should vote against the bill; but he wished for further information, and hoped that some of the gentlemen who had the charge of the bill would favor him by stating the true situation of the fund.

Mr. RANKIN, of Mississippi, observed, that, as it was his purpose to oppose the bill, he might as well take this time as any other to present his objections to it. He felt assured that he should not be so far misunderstood as to have it supposed by any gentleman on that floor, that he was otherwise than friendly disposed toward the system of internal improvement on which the House and the nation had last year entered, and he was equally certain that his friends from the West would not suspect him of being hostile to their interest; for, if any part of the whole Western country might be said to be closely connected in interest with the State he represented, it was that in which the contemplated object was proposed to be carried into effect. But, he did not think the course proposed was the best to be at present pursued. The great system of Internal Improvements ought not thus to be commenced in detail. What had last session been done as a commencement of the system, had been done on a scale, and in a manner, worthy of the nation. The first step in such a plan was to have a full survey of the whole field of operation, and then to consider what parts of the general system require the first attention.

The observations which had so repeatedly been made by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. BRECHER,) as to the comparative expenditures on the east and on the west side of the Alleghanies, were calculated to show that the commencement of the plan, in the manner now proposed, or in any manner similar to it, had a direct tendency to arouse sectional feeling and awaken local jealousies. If, indeed, as had been contended by the gentleman, the Government is bound by contract to make this road, why, then, it must be made; but, if not, and if this measure stood on the same ground of its own independent merits as any other object of internal improvement, then it was proper to pause and consider whether the course proposed was the wisest and best. It was his own opinion that the Government is not bound by any contract to go on with the Cumberland road. The first act on this subject was that in 1802, when 2 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands was reserved for the purpose of making a road from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to the navigable waters of the Ohio. The great object of this reservation was, that a chain of communication might be opened and secured between the States on the Atlantic and the States on the Western waters. This leading object of the original contract was to be taken as a guide in the interpretation of all the subsequent contracts which were entered into on the same general subject. None of those contracts except the first, stated where the stipulated road was to run from. One said it was to run to Indiana; another, that it was to run to Illinois, &c.; but, for aught in those compacts, it might start from Detroit, or from Boston, or from Charleston, or any other point in the Union. The great object was to secure a line of connection between the Atlantic and Western States, and this must constantly be kept in view in interpreting the terms to and from, as they occur in those contracts. This construction presents an object which was worthy of the legislation of Government. It was well known that the three great Western States were already sufficiently bound to each other by their relative situation; their interests were all closely allied, and they needed nothing to draw the bands closer, or render them stronger. But it was not so with respect to them and the Atlantic States. Between them was interposed a barrier of mountains, the natural effect of which was to separate their interests, and alienate their attachment from each other. Congress wished, so far as possible, to do away this barrier, and consolidate the interests of the Eastern and Western parts of the Union, by establishing a chain of direct and easy intercourse between them. Another reason in favor of this construction was the uniform course of the legislation which had been pursued on this subject. The original contract with the State of Ohio was made in 1802. In 1806, the appropriation was made for the Cumberland road; and every subsequent act from 1806 to 1819, had had the same uniform design and tendency, viz: to connect the Eastern and the Western States. The last pledge of the 2 per cent. fund was made in 1819; those prior had been only of so much of the fund as arose from lands in Ohio: then followed the pledge of the 2 per cents. from Ohio and Indiana; then of those of Ohio,

[H. OF R.]

Indiana, and Illinois. He presumed the latter was made with the consent of Illinois.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, then rose, and addressed the committee as follows :

Coming as I do from a section of the country through which this road is expected to pass, and entertaining the views I do as to the great benefits that will result from it, not only to the particular part of the country through which it may be constructed, but to the United States in general, I feel it to be my duty to contribute my feeble exertions for the accomplishment of the object. The friends of this bill are willing it should be considered by Congress without reference to that provision contained in it, for refunding the appropriation for the 2 per cent. fund. It is presented to the consideration of the committee as a great national object, and, as such, we ask and hope for its passage.

Mr. Chairman, the commencement and completion of the national turnpike road to Wheeling, has been received by the West as a sure indication that a great national road would be constructed, under the auspices of the General Government, through the States north of the Ohio, to the Mississippi River. In the completion of this work, the Western States are not alone interested ; the Eastern and Middle States, if not to the same extent, are, notwithstanding, so far interested, as to ensure, on their part, I trust, a most hearty concurrence in support of the measure. It would perhaps be unkind to anticipate any thing like a united opposition from any section of the country ; for, so general are the benefits which will result from it, that, to suppose any hostility from the South, or the North, would ascribe to them less liberality of feeling than I am conscious they possess. Sure I am, sir, as it regards myself, and, in this respect, I believe I could answer for the gentlemen of the West in general, a most cordial co-operation would not by them be withheld from any measure calculated, in equal extent, to promote the interest of any section of the Union.

Mr. Chairman, the claims we have, from the work already executed, are entitled to the respectful consideration of every gentleman. But, the general good that will result from the work, is of itself a consideration sufficient, it seems to me, to secure the favorable opinion of every member of this House who is disposed to sanction an internal policy, more calculated than any other to promote the great interests of the nation. Some, perhaps, who may be unfriendly to the policy, or may feel hostile to this road, may make some objections on account of the expense which has been incurred in making that part of it already executed. This, however, can afford no substantial objections to its prosecution and completion. If any abuse has existed, the knowledge of its existence points out the surest method of guarding against it in future. Some experience has been acquired which, in making improvements of this description, is of incalculable value.

The price of labor is now greatly reduced, and every consideration seems to point out the present as the most favorable period for the extension of this great national work.

Mr. Chairman, those who have travelled this road to Wheeling, or who reside upon it, are only capable of properly appreciating its advantages.

In a favorable season for emigration, the traveller upon this highway will scarcely lose sight of passengers, of some description. Hundreds of families are seen migrating to the West, with ease and comfort. Drovers from the West, with their cattle, of almost every description, are seen passing eastward, seeking a market on this side of the mountains. Indeed, this road may be compared to a great street, or thoroughfare, through some populous city—travellers on foot, on horseback, and in carriages, are seen mingling on its paved surface, all seeming to enjoy the pleasure of the journey, and to have a consciousness of the great benefits derived from it. With much propriety may it be called a national road : for its advantages are so diffusive, that no other term would be found equally appropriate. In another point of view the name is proper—it is the only lasting monument of the kind that has been constructed by the beneficence of the nation, and should this road be completed, and none other of a national character, advancing the internal prosperity of the country, be constructed, it would of itself constitute a more durable monument of its glory, than has been left by any of the free Governments which have preceded our Republic.

Sir, I defy any man of ordinary sensibility, or common patriotism, to travel that part of this road which has been completed, and not to feel proud of his country. I will venture to assert, however strongly it may be controverted, that no sum of money, of the same amount, has been appropriated from the Treasury, since the adoption of our constitution, so much to the advancement of the public interest.

Sir, all who feel a proper degree of interest, it appears to me, in preserving our Union, cannot be too solicitous to secure it by removing every obstruction to a continued intercourse between the different parts. In effect, the most remote parts of our country are brought near together, and identified in interest, by turnpike roads and canals ; and when commercial intercourse is facilitated in this way, connections are formed, and interests become so interwoven, that nothing can separate them.

This policy, and this only, can unite the different sections of our country under the adverse circumstances which may befall us. This alone can render our Government as permanent as its principles are sound and favorable to liberty.

Mr. Chairman, we may theorize as much as we please, and talk of the moral sentiment that everywhere prevails, in our country, but, unless our citizens are united in interest, there is no ligament sufficiently strong to bind the different parts together. Our country embraces all the varieties of soil, of climate, and production; our interests are often variant and conflicting. In some conflicts of opinion, and of interest, it is to be feared, animosity of feeling may be indulged, until a settled hostility shall prevail, and this may lead to the most direful consequences; but, bring the remote parts of the country together by turnpike roads, and no danger need be apprehended. I can name no sections of the country more important to connect in interest, than the East and West—there seemed to be a natural barrier to their intercourse, but this has in part been done away by that part of this road already completed—and I trust in this is the commencement of a policy which shall only cease after the great objects shall have been accomplished. The extension of the national road through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, will extend the advantages to the public in the same proportion as the length of the road shall be increased. Every individual who may travel this road, or purchased goods which have passed over it; all who may have stock to send to market, or products of any description, that will bear a land transportation; and all who own land convenient to this road, will experience an almost incalculable benefit from its extension.

Will Congress withhold this boon from the country? Will they deny this act of justice to the West?

Mr. Chairman, if this were to be a business of mere calculation; if it were to be estimated by dollars and cents, as a merchant would be influenced to purchase his wares; yet it might be demonstrated that the work should be done. The General Government will be benefited by the enhancement in the price of the public lands to an amount nearly equal to the expense of the road. But when this is taken in connection with the advancement of individual wealth, and the general convenience, there is nothing that can authorize a moment's hesitation in sanctioning the appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, knowing as I do the feelings of the citizens of the State of Ohio, on this subject, and especially that portion of them which I have the honor more immediately to represent, I can but feel and express the most anxious solicitude on this subject, and I will cherish a hope it will succeed."

Mr. JENNINGS asked the indulgence of the committee a few minutes. He said that, since the committee has refused to amend the bill, by striking out the section which contained a pledge upon the two per cent. fund of Indiana and Illinois, for the repayment to the Treasury of the United States, of the money, the appropriation of which was now contemplated, he would give his reasons why he should be compelled to oppose the passage of the bill. In the discussion of this subject, the construction of the compacts between the United States and the States northwest of the Ohio River, had been introduced, and which, if the construction of those instruments by some gentlemen, were to be considered as correct, would tend to confirm the pledge, which, by an act of the 3d March, 1819, Congress had imposed upon the two per cent. fund of Indiana and Illinois, for the reimbursement of $250,000 appropriated to complete the Cumberland road to Wheeling. The gentleman from Mississippi, if he understood him correctly, concluded that the power of Congress to control the two per cent. fund of those States, was a general power, which could be exercised at pleasure, so far as it regards the local expenditure of this fund.

If the gentleman's conclusions were correct, that the original intention of Congress was to unite the navigable waters of the Atlantic with those of the Ohio River, and none other, why should the compact made by the United States with the State of Ohio, provide, that this fund should be applied, under the direction of Congress, to making roads, not leading from the waters of the Atlantic to the Ohio merely, as the gentleman seemed to suppose? But the compact provides—that the fund shall be expended in making roads from the waters of the Atlantic—"to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same." The compact provides, moreover, that "the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass," shall be obtained previous to making such road. I would ask, Mr. Chairman, what road? If the whole of the two per cent. fund of Indiana and Illinois has been rightfully pledged, and if so, correctly expended, in the construction of a road to the Ohio River, as gentlemen contend, what has the consent of the States west of the Ohio to do with, and what bearing can such consent have upon, the operation which shall take place under the appropriations of this fund? I admit that Congress has the power to appropriate the two per cent. fund of Indiana to making a road through the State of Ohio to the State of Indiana; but I deny the right of Congress, although the power has been exercised, to apply the two per cent. fund of Indiana to the making a road from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to the Ohio; and I shall not, therefore, give my vote for the appropriation of money, which carries with it a pledge upon the two per cent. fund of Indiana, until this road is located, at least, to the Mississippi River. The seat of Government of the State which, in part, I have the honor to represent, is located permanently, and this road, if ever we are to have one, will pass through its site. But this road can be located only by the authority of Congress. In the prosperity of the capital of the State, the citizens of Indiana have not only an interest, but an interest which involves the value of real property, to a considerable extent; but she has no control, nor is her interest in having this road located, to be regarded by the provisions of this bill. That it was the original intention of Congress that this road should be located, opened, and constructed, to the State of Missouri, so far as the fund might be adequate to the object, I have no doubt; and that it was equally the intention of Congress that the two per cent. fund of Ohio should be expended in making a road from the Atlantic waters to the said State; and that the two per cent. fund of Indiana should be expended in making a road through Ohio to Indiana, and that of Illinois, in like manner, through Indiana to Illinois. But the constructions, and the character of the road contemplated to be constructed by the provisions of this bill, will expend every cent that may hereafter accrue, before this road, such as it is intended to be, shall reach the seat of Government of Ohio; and thus the location and opening of this road through Indiana will ultimately have to depend upon the bounty of Congress, instead of resting upon the compact. That the original intention of Congress comports with the construction of those compacts with the United States, and "the several States through which the road shall pass," which I consider correct, is evinced by the course adopted by Congress, under whose authority Commissioners were employed, a few years since, to locate this road, through those several States. And why this measure on the part of Congress, if the constructions which have been given to the compacts be correct? The State of Indiana, in accepting the conditions offered by Congress, as an equivalent to her renouncing any right to tax the lands of the United States, &c., placed a value on this fund, and it formed no unimportant part in the aggregate consideration, which induced the State to enter into a full execution of the contract on her part. But the disposition which has been, and is now proposed to be made of this fund, is, in effect, to destroy the just expectation of the State in relation to it; and, while I admit the power of Congress to pass this bill—the previous pledge of which has been imposed upon the two per cent. fund of Indiana, when the appropriation was made in 1819, to complete the Cumberland road to Wheeling, was as much a pledge upon that fund, for making a road to any or all the States bordering upon the shores of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, as it was a pledge to redeem an appropriation made for the construction of a road leading to Indiana. He regretted that the construction of those compacts had not been more generally examined than he supposed they had, and he could not view the effects produced or to be produced by constructions which had been given to them, as tending to any other result, than a violation of the contract on the part of the United States with the State of Indiana.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that, since the adjournment of the House last evening, he had turned his attention to the compact between the United States and the State of Ohio, and he believed if the committee would indulge him for a few minutes, he could clearly explain its character.

By the terms of the original compact of 1802, five per cent. of the net proceeds of the lands within the State of Ohio, were to be applied "to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass."

It is clear, then, that the compact gave to the United States exclusive authority over the application of the whole of this fund. The objects upon which they were bound to expend it, were of a twofold nature. The first, roads leading from the Atlantic waters to the State of Ohio; and the second, roads leading through that State.

The people of Ohio believed, that the portion of this fund which was destined to the construction of roads within their State, could be more judiciously and economically expended under the authority of their own Legislature, than by the General Government. In this opinion they were certainly correct. They, therefore, asked Congress to grant them this privilege, and in pursuance of their request, an act was passed on the 8d March, 1808, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the State of Ohio three per cent. of the five per cent. fund, to be applied by their Legislature "to the laying out, opening and making roads, within the said State, and to no other purpose whatever."

Thus it will be perceived, that the five per cent. fund, which had originally been placed under the exclusive control of the General Government, was separated into two parts. The two per cent. of it was retained by Congress, to be applied to the construction of roads between the Atlantic waters and the State of Ohio; and the remaining three per cent. was given to the State of Ohio, at its own request, to be expended in making roads through that State. It is, therefore, manifest, that, since 1808, the United States have never been bound by the compact, to make any roads within the State of Ohio. That obligation passed from them to the Legislature of the State, and three-fifths of the whole fund was granted to them, to enable them to fulfil it. Out of this fund the State of Ohio, previous to the 24th January last, had received the sum of $287,548 94. With what degree of force, then, or even plausibility, it could be contended by gentlemen, that Congress are bound by the compact to make this road within the State of Ohio, Mr. B. said, he would cheerfully leave for the committee to determine.

Mr. B. said that the next subject of inquiry to which he wished to direct the attention of the committee, was, the manner in which the United States had executed the portion of the trust which remained to them. Have they faithfully applied the whole of the two per cent. which they retained, to the construction of roads between the waters of the Atlantic and the State of Ohio? The amount of it which had resulted from the sale of lands in that State, prior to the report from the Treasury during the last session, was $187,786 31, and from Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, and Alabama, $71,628 11. The aggregate is $259,409 42.

Congress have expended upon the Cumberland road about $1,700,000, or nearly seven times the amount of the two per cent. fund of all these States. They did not stop short at a literal compliance with the terms of the compact; but have greatly transcended them, and acted with the utmost liberality towards the Western people. That fund has been already pledged to us for the repayment of more than $1,400,000. No gentleman on the floor can, for a moment, suppose that we shall ever receive from it any thing like this amount. In order to realize such a supposition, lands within those States must yet be sold to the amount of $70,000,000. Yet, notwithstanding, the present bill pledges this very fund to reimburse the expense of continuing the Cumberland road from Canton to Zanesville. It is certainly idle and absurd for us to place a pretext so flimsy before the public, in any act of legislation. Gentlemen who advocate this bill should at once abandon its defence upon the ground of the two per cent. fund and compact, and support it upon the principle that it is an internal improvement, which, independently of these considerations, should be undertaken at this time by the General Government.

Mr. B. said that, as he had risen only to advance his ideas respecting the compact with Ohio, and the manner in which the United States had executed their trust, he would no longer, at present, press himself upon the attention of the committee. He would merely state as a fact, in conclusion, that the construction of the Cumberland road had cost more than $18,000 each mile.

Mr. Ross, of Ohio, then rose, and said, that the exposition given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, of the three per cent. and the two per cent. fund was a very correct one, and he recapitulated in substance the history of those funds in respect to the State of Ohio. Thus far, he observed, there was no dispute. Now, in the act to admit the State of Indiana into the Union, we find precisely the same expressions as in the act to admit Ohio. Five per cent. of the sales of the public lands is reserved for the construction of roads to and through Indiana. If this reservation of two per cent. is appropriated to roads to Indiana, (the same as for roads to Ohio,) and the three per cent. is placed under the control of the Legislature of Indiana for roads in that State, (the same as for roads in Ohio,) Mr. R. expressed himself not a little surprised that the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JENNINGS) should be opposed to the present bill. It is a strict compliance with the compact of the United States, that two per cent. should be spent on a road leading to the State of Indiana. The remaining three per cent. had, from time to time, been drawn from the Treasury by that State for roads within her own limits. But the two per cent. is placed by the compact at the absolute discretion of the General Government. The present road may indeed go through the State of Ohio, yet it leads to Indiana. The compact does not say that the General Government shall bring a road to the line of that State; if the road were in Kentucky or in Virginia, and yet led to Indiana, it would be sufficient under the compact. Some gentlemen object to the object, because, at the last session, Congress voted a general system of Internal Improvement. But there must be some starting point in carrying that system into effect. And there will be precisely the same difficulty after the survey is made, as there is now; for gentlemen surely do not seriously mean that the General Government is to undertake, simultaneously, roads and canals over all the United States. Here is a beginning made: sixteen hundred thousand dollars have been laid out upon it; the surveys are made; a random line has been run from Wheeling to the Mississippi. A road from Wheeling to Zanesville has been laid out and actually begun. This is not an exception to a general system of Internal Improvement. It happened to be commenced before that system was adopted. Yet it is a link in the same chain.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania insists that Congress, by what it has advanced on the Cumberland road, has fully complied, and more than complied, with its contract with Ohio. But, sir, I ask, was that road made for Ohio alone? Has not the very State which that gentleman represents, with so much benefit to it, and so much credit to himself, has not Pennsylvania enjoyed the same benefit from it as Ohio? I believe facts will prove that it has enjoyed greater. Nor Pennsylvania alone—Virginia, too, has received a kind blessing from the same source; so, in a degree, has Delaware also. In fact, sir, all the States of this Union have, to a certain extent, participated in the benefit; so that, as far as the argument of the gentleman is intended to show that the General Government has fulfilled its contract to Ohio, it is of no force. I might indeed say, the Government has fulfilled its contract to itself and to the country. Pennsylvania, rich, populous, and flourishing, enjoys the advantage of, he believed, about three thousand miles of good roads. The gentleman, therefore, is able to appreciate their value. He hoped that State would follow the example of Ohio and of New York. And if we extended our view to future times, he was persuaded it would be found there was not so great a diversity of interests between that State and her neighbors, as some of her citizens seemed inclined to suppose. He thought, upon the whole, that nothing could be urged conclusively against the present bill from the contracts of the General Government with the new States, nor from the advances on the Cumberland road, as if made for Ohio alone.

Mr. Wood, of New York, observed, that he deemed the proposition before the committee premature. That it was idle to say that the United States were under any obligation to make the road in question. That the Government had agreed to expend two per cent. of the avails of the public lands on roads from the Atlantic to the Ohio; and, by the gentleman's own showing, the Government had already expended more than that fund would amount to in many years. That the pledge was redeemed, the obligation cancelled, and that no claim on that ground could be sustained. The present application was, therefore, for a sum of money from the Treasury, to be expended on Internal Improvements. Sir, said Mr. W., Congress have not yet determined that they will adopt a system of Internal Improvements. At the last session they appropriated $80,000 for the purpose of exploring the country, and having such routes for roads and canals selected, as should appear to be of national importance. That, when the report of the Commissioners appointed for that purpose should be made to Congress, the question would probably be determined. That, when that subject should be agitated, if it should be determined to embark in a system of Internal Improvements, several questions must be previously settled among them; one would be, to determine whether the money to be appropriated ought not to be apportioned among the several States according to their representation in Congress, to be expended under the direction of their respective legislatures, who were more competent to oversee such business than Congress, and better able to guard the fund from the impositions to which appropriations by Congress are liable.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR rose, and said, that he was not about to enter at large into the question before the committee, but merely to state a few facts, which might have a bearing upon it. He was aware that the motion yesterday made to strike out that part of the bill which goes to pledge the two per cent. fund, had, at the present sitting, been decided in the negative, and that all arguments or observations in favor of such an amendment would now be out of order. But if, said Mr. B., it is in the contemplation of Congress to commence a great system of internal improvement, (for which, however, in any shape, I cannot go, as being opposed to the principle,) it seems to me that the object now presented is as much entitled to favor as almost any other that can be mentioned. He should, indeed, be obliged to vote against the bill, and would do so, even were it for the sole benefit of his own constituents. Yet still he thought the object as good as any other. The measure, however, ought at once to be put (where the gentleman from Ohio had candidly placed it) on the footing of an absolute appropriation, not to be returned from any fund whatever. The pledge was all out of the question. Congress has the direction of two per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands in the northwestern States, for the purpose of making roads leading to those States. It has expended somewhere about $1,800,000. Now, this is two per cent. on ninety millions of dollars. It would be found that the whole sales of lands in the northwestern States, up to 1819, fell short of $27,000,000, of which less than $17,000,000 had actually been received. Here, then, was the Government in advance two per cent. on ninety millions, and not seventeen millions realized yet. Surely, it was vain to talk of any hope of reimbursement from such a fund. Let us not, said Mr. B., hold out a false and delusive hope. Commending the candor of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. BEECHER,) in placing the subject at once and avowedly upon its real ground, Mr. B. expressed a hope that, when the bill came into the House, the clause containing this pledge would be stricken out. And he concluded with repeating that, did not his views of constitutional restrictions prevent him from voting for any appropriation for internal improvement, he should certainly vote for the present bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE then rose, and said, that he now perceived the question before the committee was a question of direct appropriation for a road. If the arguments of the gentlemen from Indiana and Illinois were correct, (and certainly those arguments presented matter of grave consideration,) the two per cent. fund of those States cannot be appropriated to the present object. It follows, that the two per cent. in Ohio alone can be appropriated to it. No one can deny that the whole of this fund has been expended. So far, then, as the arguments of the gentlemen prove any thing, they show that what is required, at present, is an absolute appropriation of money from the Treasury. This point being settled, he would say a few words on the measure, as constituting a part of the general system of internal improvement. Such a system, Mr. McD. observed, must be formed and conducted on national principles. Yet, it was unavoidable, in the nature of things, that, in the prosecution of it, certain parts of the country will be benefited more than others. The question then arises, How shall we proceed? I answer, in the first place, with the utmost caution. If we act otherwise, and through haste, ignorance, or oversight, we shall fail in any great work we undertake, shall occasion a reaction which will go far towards destroying the system; and he would put it to the friends of internal improvements, whether it will be advisable to run any risk of such a result? He was, therefore, opposed to acting on the system, till a general view had been presented to Congress of the objects to be attempted.

As to the claim of the West on the National Treasury, he should only say that that Treasury never contributed any thing worth naming, for the purpose of internal improvement, for the advantage of any other State than Ohio. What, asked Mr. McDUFFIE, are the national works which have been done by the General Government? This road was certainly the chief, and he had almost said, the only one—two millions had been expended upon it. There was also some small appropriation for the improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. I, said Mr. McDUFFIE, belong to a State which, on this subject, has fair claims on the Government, yet I do not now solicit anything on her behalf. We are told that, because the work has been commenced, we must therefore go on with it. But, sir, said Mr. McDUFFIE, I argue in a manner directly the reverse. I do not think because we have done something for one part of the Union, we must, therefore, do more for it. The work, I acknowledge, is an important one; but other objects are important too. The population of the new States is comparatively sparse; and we are asked to neglect the denser population of the Union, for their benefit. I do not think the object proposed has any peculiar claim, at this particular time. Before he sat down, he would state what were his general views on this matter. It appeared very clear that, for at least ten years to come, all the surplus revenue of this country would be exhausted in paying the public debt—and, from the character and well-known wishes of the nation, he presumed that it must be the great object of the next administration to pay that debt. There could be but a small surplus left to be applied to internal improvements—sufficient, however, to defray the expense of all the requisite previous measures. All the surveys could be made, various routes explored, and the comparative expense of different projects ascertained. Then the nation would know precisely what was the work before it. Nor was it more than proper that ten years should be consumed in preparing to accomplish so great a system, on the safest and most solid grounds.

Mr. CLAY now rose, and, expressing a desire of presenting to the committee his views on the general subject, requested, as the hour was late, the indulgence that the committee would rise. The committee rose accordingly, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 14.

Cumberland River.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Tennessee, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a sum of money not exceeding ——— dollars, for the purpose of improving the navigation of Cumberland River, in the State of Tennessee.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. REYNOLDS addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: Should it be in order, I will briefly submit to the House my views on this subject. We have been engaged, yesterday and the day before, in discussing the bill to extend the Cumberland Road: the object of the present resolution I have submitted is to improve the navigation of Cumberland River. But, before I proceed, allow me to say, that I lament much, indeed, at the course the debate has taken on the extension of the National Road; and, without entering into the merits of that discussion, it is to be regretted that the subject of those reservations and conditions of State rights ever had been introduced into the bill; for, it is evident to my mind, from the discussion already had, without particularly examining the statutes, that the per centums stipulated by those new States arising on the sale of the public lands, were certainly intended for the internal improvement of those States, and not for national purposes. In my humble opinion, sir, it would have been more preferable to have asked, by the bill on your table, an appropriation for the object contemplated by the bill. Permit, me also, to state, that it is much to be regretted that any allusion has been made to the general appropriations made for the benefit of the country heretofore. Sir, the northern and eastern parts of the Union are much older than the West. The great population and situation of the country commanded the resources of the nation. And there are many expenditures of the public purse, from the nature of things, that will always be confined to those regions, such as building public ships, erecting forts on the Atlantic board, and on the Pacific Ocean, in those independent States that will spring out of the Oregon Territory. For my part, sir, when a national object is necessary, and ought to be carried into effect, I shall not stop to inquire whether the money is to be expended on the south or the north side of the Potomac. In a republic like ours, forming a grand confederated Union, the important inquiry is, Has the measure called for, a tendency to promote the interest, honor, and happiness of the nation? Then, I trust, as we have not had occasion of having much of the public moneys distributed in the internal improvements of the West, I still will rely on the justice and magnanimity of the good old thirteen States in enabling us to carry on our national improvements in the Western States.

It will be recollected, Mr. Speaker, that, at the last session of Congress, a bill was introduced to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River. To that bill it was my intention to have offered the present proposition as an amendment. But, knowing how much the whole Union is interested in the navigation of that grand river, and, lest the great object should be defeated by adding too many amendments of the kind, I did, at the request of some of my friends, and particularly my honorable friend from Kentucky, (Mr. HENRY,) who so ably advocated the bill, abstain from offering the amendment, but with the express determination of presenting it to the House at this session. The bill passed, and is now a law of the nation, by a handsome majority.

It may be objected, Mr. Speaker, that Cumberland River is too local for the General Government to take it into the estimate of a general system of internal improvements. But, gentlemen have only to look at the map to see the great and central position of that noble stream. It is navigable about two or three hundred miles and upwards, and meanders a country of from four to five hundred miles. The country is remarkably fertile and healthy. It is the grand high road for the great body of the population of West Tennessee, in the transportation of their produce to the great emporium of the West, New Orleans; and, besides, it is equally claimed and enjoyed by a very important and interesting region of the Union, I mean that part of Kentucky known by the name of the Green River Country. This is a part of the Republic very extensive, fertile in the extreme, and capable of sustaining an immense population. But to the Union, the river Cumberland is interesting in many points of view. The great water powers for machinery on the rivers and branches emptying into it are immense, and will, at no distant day, command the attention of the enterprising manufacturer and agriculturist. We have men of great public spirit amongst us, but there is a vast outlet for more. There are, in the vicinity of those streams, mountains of iron ore, which are inexhaustible, and of a quality equal, if not superior, to any in the United States. Sir, the boasted county of Cornwall, in England, cannot produce better iron. And, besides, the fertility of our soil is such, that hemp, tobacco, and cotton grow in great perfection. The House will perceive, then, without any comments from me, the great importance of this river to the United States.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is not all. It is, at this moment, of deep interest to the great and patriotic state of Pennsylvania. There are now, I expect, from ten to fifteen steamboats running regularly between Nashville and the city of Pittsburgh, and from Nashville to New Orleans, at all seasons that the waters will admit of it. This is not all, sir. This stream will be of great importance to the flourishing State of Missouri, and all other States that may border on that great river, Missouri, in consequence of the article of cotton. With those important States of Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana, our intercourse and trade will be greatly facilitated. And when the great canal, now in contemplation, unites the Potomac River with the Ohio, it will open new resources and advantages to Maryland and Virginia, and will afford a direct communication by water with us. And the time is not far distant, sir, when the great and powerful State of New York, will, by her great resources, and her astonishing progress in internal improvements, show to this Union the necessity as well as policy, in a political and commercial point of view, of uniting, by canals, the great northern Lakes with the Mississippi River. Then, sir, as one of the Western States, in point of trade, we shall be united with the Northern, Southern, bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, Eastern, and Middle States. It will then be no uncommon event to see the hardy and enterprising sons of the North and East peaceably exchanging with the people on the banks of Cumberland every manufactured article of luxury and comfort, for the raw material, when, in all probability, the old world may be deluged in all the horrors of war, and all communication cut off betwixt us and them, perhaps forever.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is still another topic connected with this subject, and, I trust, the House will allow me briefly to state it. There is on one of the streams of Cumberland, called Harpeth River, one among the finest sites for a national armory in the United States, and, perhaps, in the world. The stream is large and bold. The country around it, to a great extent, abounds in the finest forest, and there is no end to the ore in its vicinity. Besides, I have been lately informed that stone-coal has been found in the same neighborhood; and the country is considered very healthy. This great and celebrated site is only twelve miles from the mouth of this river, and can, with a trifling expense, be made navigable always when Cumberland is navigable. Indeed, when the latter river rises, the back water nearly reaches the site. The navigation of Cumberland from the mouth of this river is as good as the Ohio. The great impediment to the navigation of this important stream is what is called the Harpeth Shoals, above its mouth, which is much against the flourishing town of Nashville, and the upper country. I think, however, that $20,000 or $30,000 will be a sufficient sum to remove every obstruction in the river, high as Oar-thage.

Mr. Speaker: When we look at the happy medium in which West Tennessee is situated, as it regards climate, soil, and health, and when we consider there is all the great materials for the establishment of a great armory on this interesting stream, there is another consideration of great moment. These watercourses rarely, if ever, are frozen in winter. How important to the Union will it be, in case of a war, that we can, in the dead of winter, at a moment's warning, transport our arms and munitions of war to the seat of war in a campaign to the South. This is a consideration that ought to have weight with every gentleman who may have to act finally on this subject. For my own part, I do not hesitate to pronounce it the most eligible situation in the United States. Is it not remarkable, Mr. Speaker, that those Commissioners have not yet made their report on this subject? We were informed by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. BRECKEN,) that it would be delivered to this House in six or eight days. It is now more than two weeks since the gentleman moved to lay my resolution on this subject, on the table. From a letter I have received from Pittsburg, and the session going off rapidly, I shall take the liberty of calling up the resolution on to-morrow. At all events, if it is not our good fortune to have the armory where nature has pointed it out, I still hope, however, that the Government of the United States will enable us to improve Cumberland River; and if we are not allowed to furnish our armies with our arms and munitions of war, yet I trust our citizens in Tennessee will be enabled to mingle their laudable efforts with their brethren of other Western States in supplying our armies, when the case may happen, and the city of New Orleans and Louisiana with the products of our land.

Sir, I was highly gratified to hear, the other day, from an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MERRICK,) and who is a member of the Committee on Roads and Canals, that it is contemplated, by that committee, to offer to the House a general system of national improvements. Hoping, most sincerely, that they will take my proposition into consideration, I shall take the liberty now to move that the resolution lie on the table for a few days.

The resolution was then ordered to lie on the table.

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to dispense with the orders of the day, for the purpose of taking up the bill "authorizing a subscription to the stock of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company."

The motion was carried, ayes 92.

The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. TOMLINSON in the chair,) on that bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL (the chairman of the committee which reported the bill) rose. He said, the committee would perceive that the bill, which was now submitted to their consideration, authorized a subscription in behalf of the United States for 1,500 shares, which is equal to $500,000 in the stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company; the Government was to receive its proportion of the dividends, and the Secretary of the Treasury was to vote at any election for the officers of the company, according to the number of shares subscribed.

The importance of the question presented by this bill, said Mr. H., will, I hope, justify me in occupying the attention of the committee for a short time. The subject of this canal, and the proceedings connected with it, are, I know, very familiar to some of the committee, but there are others I presume, who are not so well acquainted with them; and, for this reason, I will take the liberty of giving as brief a history of the canal as I can.

Soon after the system of canalling became so universal in England, and the benefits of canals so generally known, a canal to connect the waters of the Delaware with the Chesapeake Bay was contemplated, and many surveys to carry this design into effect, were made antecedent to the Revolution; when Mr. Latrobe surveyed the route, which was, I believe, in 1816, he mentioned that 82 surveys had been previously made—and I expect that there had been 10 or 15 surveys and examinations of the grounds since that period.

The first Legislative step to effect the object was taken by the Legislature of the State of Maryland, who on the 7th of December, 1799, passed a law to incorporate a company by the name of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company. This law proposed to co-operate with the States of Delaware and Pennsylvania; and these States, impressed with the importance of the subject, not only as it regarded themselves, but in its relation to the nation at large, did not hesitate to act conjointly with the State of Maryland, and they respectively passed laws to accomplish the object of a water communication between the waters of the Delaware and Chesapeake Bay. On this subject eleven laws have been enacted; but it will not be necessary for me to detain the committee by referring to them, except so far as to exhibit their leading provisions. The acts of the respective States authorized the opening of books for subscriptions to the amount of $500,000, in shares of $200 each; and incorporated the subscribers with ample powers to locate the route, to acquire the title to lands in the States of Maryland and Delaware, through which it should pass, and to cut and finish the canal, and to keep it in repair forever.

The necessary regulations for the payment of tolls were prescribed by the respective acts. And it was stipulated, that the canal and works, when completed, should forever thereafter be esteemed and taken to be navigable, as a public highway, free for the transportation of all goods, commodities, or produce whatsoever, on payment of the tolls imposed by the acts, and that no additional toll or tax whatever, for the use of the water of the canal, and the works thereon, should, at any time, be imposed by all or either of the said States. Other arrangements took place between the States, some of which not bearing directly on the canal project, need not now be mentioned. I will refer to one which may be of importance, as connected with the prosperity of the canal: By the first Maryland act, of the 7th December, 1799, there is a provision that the act should be of no force or effect until a law be passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, declaring the river Susquehanna to be a highway, and authorizing individuals or bodies corporate to remove obstructions therein, at a period not exceeding three years, from the first day of March, 1800. A law to this effect was passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

The acts contain the usual provisions for the election of a President and Directors, for the transfer of the stock, the collection of the tolls, and the payment of dividends; and also authorizes the company to increase the subscriptions whenever necessary.

By virtue of the laws of these three States, a company was legally incorporated, who, in April, 1804, after causing many surveys to be made, located the canal in favor of what was called the Upper Route from Welsh Point to Christiana; the Elk River, with the resources of Christiana and White Clay Creeks, were supposed to contain a sufficiency of water.

The waters of the Elk River were purchased, including the route of the feeder and the necessary lands; and the work to construct the feeder, commenced on the 2d of May, 1804; and was earnestly prosecuted during the years 1804-5, when a failure of funds compelled the Board, after the expenditure of about $100,000, to suspend the whole undertaking. The cause of this disaster is difficult now to trace; the stockholders failed to pay their instalments, owing, in a degree, perhaps, to the investments of their funds in the numerous Banks and Insurance Companies that were created about that period, which promised high and immediate profits; still the failure, it may be imagined, would not have occurred if the same practical knowledge and public spirit had existed then on the subject of internal improvements, which are now manifested almost every where.

The company, being without funds, made applications for aid whenever there appeared to be any hope of success, to Congress and to the Legislatures of the States of Maryland, Delaware, and Pennsylvania.

The subject was introduced to the consideration of Congress, in 1806, by a memorial signed on behalf of the company, which was accompanied by an able production entitled "Observations respecting the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal."

Favorable reports, in the Senate, were made in 1806, '7, '9, '12 and '18, illustrating the great importance of the subject, and the advantages to be derived to the General Government, by a water communication from the Delaware to the Chesapeake Bay.

It was recommended to grant to the company certain quantities of land, from which source funds could be raised to complete the work; and, to this effect, several bills passed in the Senate—one in the session of the tenth Congress, and two in the eleventh Congress.

The House of Representatives have also had the subject under consideration, at different terms, from the year 1806 to the year 1824, and many resolutions have been adopted, and several committees to whom the subject had been referred, respectively reported bills to the House to authorize the subscription of stock. Bills of this description were reported in 1812, '18, and '18, and the bill now on the table was reported at the last session. In the mean time laws have passed favorable to the canal, in the States of Maryland, Delaware, and Pennsylvania.

On the 18th of December, 1812, the Maryland Legislature enacted a law, the preamble of which I will be allowed to read—it is as follows: "Whereas, during the time of war against the United States of America, the completion of the work of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal would be greatly beneficial to the United States, by forming the great link of an inland navigation of six or seven hundred miles, and thereby establish a perfectly safe, easy, and rapid transportation of our armies and the munitions of war, through the interior of the country, and which would ever tend to operate as a cement to the union between the States; and, whereas the prosperity and the agricultural interest of the State of Maryland, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and the Delaware State, are more deeply interested than their sister States, in the useful work of opening a communication between the Chesapeake Bay and the river Delaware, by means of the said Chesapeake and Delaware Canal—therefore, in order to enable the President and Directors of the said canal to prosecute and finish the important work, be it enacted, &c."

The first section of the act authorized a conditional subscription, on the part of the State of Maryland, and declared that if the United States should subscribe seven hundred and fifty shares, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania three hundred and seventy-five shares, and the State of Delaware one hundred shares, in the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, in such case, the Treasurer of the Western Shore was authorized to subscribe, in behalf of the State of Maryland, two hundred and fifty shares.

On the 25th of March, 1818, the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania passed a law similar to the law of the State of Maryland, and embraced the preamble in full. It authorized a subscription to be made, on the part of Pennsylvania, of 875 shares, if the United States should subscribe 750 shares, the State of Maryland 250 shares, and the State of Delaware 100 shares.

These laws never went into operation, as the United States and the State of Delaware did not subscribe; and the project rested for a considerable time. In 1822, great exertions were again made to revive the company, and to acquire new information and new subscriptions; and, in the year 1823, acts were passed, by which subscriptions, to the amount of $25,000, were obtained from the State of Delaware, $50,000 from Maryland, and $100,000 from Pennsylvania, and new private subscriptions were made to the amount of $325,000.

And, as to the expediency of a Government becoming a stockholder in a corporation, experience has shown that it is highly beneficial, and attended with no inconvenience. The practice of the States is full proof of this. In many instances, they encourage spirited individuals, by creating corporations, and subscribing as stockholders.

Pennsylvania has repeatedly subscribed for stock in banks, bridges, and State roads; the result has been useful to such improvements and advantageous to the State.

In my introductory remarks it has been one main object, to give a history of the proceedings concerning the canal, and in the conclusion of the little I have had to say, I come now to one consideration of the subject which I dread the most. It is the danger that amendments may be proposed, by even the friends of the general measure, to embrace other objects, and so to load the present bill as to cause a failure of the whole, without its being so designed. This has been the fate of the measure heretofore. I will, however, indulge the hope, that the public feeling which generally exists in favor of internal improvements, and the improved state of experience as to the practicability and utility of public works in this country, will induce honorable members to permit the question to be taken on this bill upon its own merits, and not to expose it to any unnecessary risk.

It is really distinguishable from any object that can be named, inasmuch as the work is partly executed, and as no further information is necessary, no State laws are to be obtained, and its national importance is so apparent that no one can deny it. If the General Government is seriously disposed to aid, in certain instances, the internal improvements of the country, no spot could be selected freer from objections, for a beginning.

I think I have good reason to anticipate a favorable result in this respect from the laudable disposition that prevailed in Congress at the last session, when the bills to improve the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers were under discussion. No member, that I recollect, attempted to carry with those bills, other favorite objects of his own. They were fairly considered on their respective merits alone.

The object of this bill, it is true, lies near those I represent, but since I have had the honor of a seat here, I have been uniform in giving my support to the internal improvements of the country. I have, on no occasion, refused to vote for any measure of improvement, because it was not connected with something near home; and the same spirit appears to have animated the members generally, at the last session.

I have been induced to make the remarks which I have done, respecting any amendments to connect the bill with other objects, although a little out of place, because I have understood that, in this way, this interesting project had often been defeated.

In introducing this bill to the consideration of the committee, I have abstained from any remarks on the general subject of improving a country by canals, and will now only observe that, in very many instances, they have entirely changed the appearance of the country through which they pass, by giving to its interior parts, in a great degree, the advantages of coasts, and bringing the whole country into a sort of compactness that cannot be accomplished by any other means. They conquer the inconveniences that naturally exist between the extreme parts of a nation, and, by the facilities which they always afford they excite industry, in a most surprising manner.

Our greatest difficulty is to begin, and that has been the case in most nations; and this seems strange to me, for, as soon as public works are executed, they are considered the highest blessings that can be bestowed on a country, and the authors of them go down to posterity with more lasting glory than could be attained by any other public acts. The credit now depends on the actual execution, the science on the subject being so well known.

Some imagine that the nation is too young. No opinion can be more fallacious. On this head, I was pleased with a remark of the Abbe de Pradt, on the Colonies. In speaking on the age of a nation, he says it does not depend on time, it is on the resources and population of the country—and I will add to his sensible remark, that it may depend also, in a degree, on the enterprising character of the people. Ten millions of people are capable of performing all the important interests of a nation. This ought not, on subjects of this description, to be considered a young nation.

The New York works are a complete and satisfactory answer to any objections made in respect to the age of the nation. We have ocular demonstration of the immense works that have been accomplished there in a period of seven or eight years; and I will ask, has any of the other concerns of the State or the nation been neglected on that account? It is true, that State is in debt for nearly the whole expenditure—but would any man in the State give up the canal to be free of the debt? Not one. Now, the General Government can do the same things on a still greater scale: and why should not the same results follow? In ten years, the whole face of this country might be changed. Gentlemen talk of the national debt—but what is a debt of eighty or ninety millions to such a country as this? Had the system of internal improvements been commenced long ago, the value of the country might have been doubled at this day—nor would it have involved the sacrifice of any other interests, to promote internal improvements, as the example of New York, already quoted, has plainly demonstrated. I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that we shall now make a beginning. I am well convinced the spirit of the nation is on this subject in advance of Congress—and I am equally persuaded that, if a beginning is to be made, no spot could be selected freer from objections, than that in which the canal has been commenced, which it is the purpose of the present bill to aid.

The committee reported the bill without amendment, and the question being on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading, Mr. COCKE called for the yeas and nays on that question, which were taken as follows:

MONDAY, JANUARY 17.

National Road.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide for the continuation of the Cumberland Road, Mr. STERLING in the chair.

The question being for filling the blank for an appropriation with 150,000 dollars,

Mr. CLAY, (Speaker,) rose, and observed, that, from his attachment to that system of internal policy, of which the measure now before the committee formed a part, he had entertained a wish to offer to their consideration some views in relation to it which had forcibly impressed his own mind; but had he anticipated the state of expectation which it would be needless for him to affect not to perceive, or that debilitated state in which he now appeared before the committee, he should have contented himself with giving his silent vote in favor of the bill.

The object proposed, he said, involved a question which had often been debated in that House, and the general views of which were already so familiar to the minds of those whom he addressed, that he despaired of adding any thing to that knowledge of it which they already possessed. Indeed, he considered the views of policy which he held on this subject as having been vindicated and maintained by the votes of the House at the last session. Yet he would say thus much: that he considered the question, as to the existence and the exercise of a power in the General Government to carry into effect a system of internal improvements, as amounting to the question whether the union of these States should be preserved or not—a question which involved the dearest hopes and brightest prospects of our country. As to the opinion, that the carrying on of these improvements belonged to the States in their individual and separate character, it might as well be expected that the States should perform any other duty which appertained to the General Government. You have no more right, observed Mr. C., to ask the individual States to make internal improvements for the general welfare, than you have to ask them to make war for the general welfare, or to build fortifications for the general defence, because some of them may happen to have a peculiar local interest in either. They are no more bound to do any one of the duties which pertain to the General Government, than to do any other one of the duties which pertain to it. Sir, it is our province, not theirs. It is, indeed, true, that the interests of the whole and of one of the parts may be coincident, and sometimes to a very remarkable degree—nay, to such a degree as may induce a State government to undertake a duty which more properly belongs to Congress. But such cases are rare, and such an effect has seldom happened. One instance, indeed, may be pointed out—that of the great canal in the State of New York. When that State applied to this House for aid in her great and spirited undertaking, it was my opinion that she ought to receive it—and it is now my opinion that, for what she has advanced in the completion of that noble enterprise, she has at this hour a just claim upon the General Government. But cases of this kind always will be rare—it is vain to expect that any State will feel a sufficient interest in any object or improvement (unless such as are purely local in their character) as to induce her to make an appropriation of her individual resources for its accomplishment.

With these preliminary observations on the great policy of measures of the kind of that now proposed, he would go on to inquire in the first place, is the object in the present bill of sufficient magnitude to authorize an application to it of the resources of the nation? To answer this inquiry, the object must be considered, not as standing isolated and alone—but as constituting one link in the great chain of the internal improvement of the Union. What, said he, is the actual state of the facts? There now exists from the city of Baltimore to Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, an uninterrupted line of turnpike road, extending to a total distance of two hundred and seventy miles; and there also exists a like line of road from this city to the same place, with the exception of one small gap between Montgomery Court House and Fredericktown. Taking its origin at the foot of the Alleghany Mountains, the Cumberland road extends to the eastern bank of the Ohio, a distance of one hundred and thirty-five miles. Of this distance eighty-five miles lie in Pennsylvania, thirty or thirty-five in Maryland, and the residue in Virginia—the entire work, from one end to the other, and through its whole extent, lying exclusively in the States east of the Ohio River. The proposition now presented to the committee is to extend this road from the west bank of that river to Zanesville, in the State of Ohio, a distance of eighty miles. If the proposition shall meet with the favor of Congress, the whole length of road from Baltimore to Zanesville will be 350 miles.

Mr. C. then remarked on the character of the country through which the contemplated road is to pass, which he described as containing a succession of hills, some of which might perhaps have been called mountains, but for the altitude of the neighboring Alleghanies—and which continue as far west as the Muskingum River, on the bank of which Zanesville is situated. There, or a little to the west of it, commences a level plain of an alluvial character, extending from the Muskingum to the Mississippi, a distance of four hundred and twenty miles.

The present proposition, Mr. C. said, was to be considered in reference, first, to what had been done, and second, to what remained to be done. The proposed part of the road must be viewed, first, in respect to one termination of the entire line which is at Cumberland, and then in respect to the other termination of it, which he trusted would one day be on the Missouri. It must also be viewed in reference to that branch of it, which he hoped, at no distant day, would pass through Kentucky and Tennessee to Natchez and New Orleans, intersecting the great road now proposed from the latter place to this city. It must be remembered, said he, that it is a part of a road which is to traverse nine States and two Territories; so that whether we look to the right or to the left, we find the interests of nine entire States and two Territories, all concentrated in the present design.

Here Mr. C. wished to be permitted to state one fact with which, perhaps, but few members of the committee were acquainted. A distinguished member of the other House had lately travelled in company with the delegate from Florida, now on this floor, over the very route which was contemplated in this bill for the road proposed. They had found it, though somewhat hilly, free from any mountainous obstructions, and abounding in all the materials which would be required for construction.

Mr. C. next proceeded to inquire, whether the object, such as he had now described it, was not justly entitled to be considered a national object? Look, said he, at the effect produced upon the convenience of the whole country, from what has been already done. The usual space of time formerly required to go from Baltimore to Wheeling, was from eight to ten days—the time now occupied is three days. The effect of such a saving of time would readily be conceived. To this consideration might be added the advantage resulting from the investment of so much capital, and the expenditure of so much public money, in a region of country where both were so much needed. Settlements had been multiplied—buildings of all kinds erected—villages had sprung up as if by enchantment; and, to use the language of one of the gentlemen who had ably advocated the bill, the road resembled one continued street, almost the whole way from Cumberland to Wheeling. The effect had been a great addition to the value of property, and an important increase of the wealth of three States through which this great public work had been constructed.

It has been called, by some gentlemen, a Western road, but how could it be a Western road, when not one foot of it lay within any one of the Western States, but the entire road, in all its parts, lay wholly in the Eastern States? The direct benefit, and much that was collateral, was felt by the three Eastern States where the road lay; the only benefit to the Western States was a mere right of way. All they enjoyed in the road was the right to pass over it to visit their brethren in the East, and to come to this Metropolis to mingle their counsels with their fellow-citizens of the South and East—important benefits no doubt—but not such as ought to designate this road as a Western road. In fact, Mr. C. said, it was neither an Eastern nor a Western road, but partly the one and partly the other. The benefits derived from it were strictly mutual.

Mr. C. asked, if the United States were not under a positive obligation to extend this road? What was the history of this undertaking? It arose out of a compact between the United States and the State of Ohio, at the time that State was admitted into the Union, by which two per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands was to be applied to the making of a road leading to the State of Ohio. A similar provision was also made in the compacts, by which Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, and, he believed, Alabama, were admitted as States. It had been contended by some gentlemen, that the construction of the Cumberland road was a fulfilment of this compact on the part of the United States. This, said Mr. C., I deny utterly. I grant, indeed, that it is a fulfilment of the compact with the State of Ohio. The United States covenanted to make a road leading to that State. They have done so; and Ohio has no right to demand that the road should be carried one foot further. But the case is entirely different with the States beyond Ohio. They have a right, under their respective compacts, to demand a road which shall terminate at their limits—a road which shall be brought up to the boundary line of those States respectively. It is very true, that Congress may begin the road wherever they please, but it must terminate at the State to which Congress has covenanted that the road shall lead.

National Road.

Am I not, said Mr. CLAY, arguing a question which is too plain to be illustrated? Can it be said, that Government has made a road to Missouri, when it has made a road which nowhere approaches Missouri within 500 miles? or, that it has made a road to the other Western States, when it has made one to a point 250, 300, or 500 miles from them? Gentlemen say, that a road has been made in that direction. It might as well be said, that the making of Pennsylvania avenue, in this city, was a fulfilment of the contract, or that the Government might begin a road in the remotest part of the east, and end it there, provided it had a western direction. He repeated, Government was not bound to spend more than the two per cent. under the contract—but the road must end at the limit of the States with whom the compact was made.

And here, said Mr. C., let me ask my worthy friend from Mississippi, (Mr. RANKIN,) whether he would consider a road ending at Wheeling as a road to Mississippi, because it leads, though obliquely, toward that State? I am sure he would not. He would say Congress had fulfilled its bargain only when the road terminated at the Mississippi.

It has been said, that the provision which pledges the two per cent. fund of the several Western States for defraying the expense of the Cumberland road, had been inserted in all the former bills on that subject. I admit this, said Mr. C., but I should never have given my consent to its insertion, had I not thought that it was understood and agreed upon, as a part of the plan, that Congress should go on with the road, and carry it to all the States whose funds have been thus pledged.

On the question of the utility of the present undertaking, Mr. C. trusted he need say no more. He was happy, he said, to find that the worthy gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) who, to his great regret, could not, with his views of the constitution, support the bill, had declared, with that honorable frankness for which he was so eminently distinguished, that, apart from that view of the question, he should be in favor of the measure now proposed.

Mr. C. thought that the principle of preservation itself afforded sufficient argument in support of the measure now under consideration. He knew, indeed, that all questions which glanced at the union of the States, and the possibility of its severance, should be touched lightly, and with a cautious hand. But, if they were not to be discussed in that august assembly, where might they be? I, said Mr. CLAY, am not one of those who are in favor of covering our eyes, and concealing from ourselves the dangers to which we may be exposed. Danger, of whatever kind, is best guarded against when it is deliberately contemplated, and fully understood. It is not to be averted by shutting our eyes and ears against the possibility of its approach. Happily, there exist among us many great and powerful principles of cohesion—a common origin—common language—a common law—common liberty—common recollection of national glory. But, asked Mr. C., have we not seen, in at least one instance in history, that all these have not been strong enough to prevent a total and lasting separation. And, though causes of the opposite kind may not in our case go all the length of producing this, yet they operate on every natural tendency to separation. That such tendencies exist, will not be denied by any candid and reflecting man, and they call on us to look far ahead, and to prevent, if possible, the disastrous evil which they threaten. Among the causes which go to increase the tendencies to separation, in such a system as ours, may be enumerated the lofty mountains which separate different parts of our country—the extended space over which our population and Government are spread, together with the different scenes to which commercial pursuits lead the citizens of different districts of the Union. Some of these are, indeed, beyond human control, but the effect of many of them may be, in a certain degree, corrected, if not wholly removed. The mountains may be cut through; we will teach the lofty Alleghany to bow its proud head to the interest and repose of our country. As to space and distance, they are terms wholly relative, and they have relation as much to the facility of intercourse as to actual distance of place. It will be the business of wise legislation, to correct the evils to which a sparse population exposes us. We have already seen what may be effected. A distance which formerly consumed nine days, (and in this I speak from personal knowledge, having passed the route in all conditions of the road,) can now be done in three. Wheeling is thus six days' travel nearer to Washington. So is St. Louis, so is every place west of Wheeling. If two places are twenty miles apart, and two other places are eighty miles asunder, and yet the distance between both occupies but one day, the two latter places, for every practical purpose, are as near to each other as the two former. And is it not the solemn duty of this House, to strengthen, by every means in its power, the principles of cohesion which bind us together—to perpetuate the union of these States, and to weaken and diminish, to the utmost of its ability, whatever has an opposite tendency? Can the imagination of man conceive a policy better calculated than that of which the present measure forms a part, to bring the opposite extremities of our country together—to bind its various parts to each other, and to multiply and strengthen the various and innumerable ties of commercial, social, and literary intercourse—in a word, to make of the various and wide-spread population of these confederated Republics one united people? It is true, that no efforts of the Government can altogether remove one effect of our local situation, which causes one part of our country to find its commercial vent in one ocean, and another in another. Yet, even this may be in part corrected, and one great advantage attending the proposed national highway—the formation of a part of which is contemplated in the present bill—will be its effect upon the commerce of the country. And here, said Mr. C., let me state one fact. If, at this moment, the alternative were presented to me, of a total exclusion of my State from all use of the Mississippi River for commercial purposes, or the same exclusion from the Atlantic States, I would, without hesitation prefer the former, and I believe that the commerce, that now passes the mountains from the west, to seek its outlet on the Atlantic coast, is of greater value than that which passes down the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico—and this will be increasingly the case, if, as I hope, we are to have several different outlets like that which is now proposed. I beg gentlemen not to be alarmed. It is not my intention to ask for any further appropriations for this purpose, at least for some time to come, but we shall live, I hope, as a nation, as long as any other nation. I speak not of the works of one year, or of twenty years, but of those to which we may look forward, should our present state of peace continue. An appropriation of half a million of dollars annually would not be felt by a country like this, and yet it would effect every object which the friends of internal improvement propose to themselves or to this House.

But it may be said, Why should the General Government make a road for the State of Ohio? Sir, if this were a road for the benefit of Ohio, I would not ask an appropriation of a single dollar. Ohio has no such peculiar interest in this measure as would ever induce her to undertake to make this road. It is not a State road, but a national road, that is contemplated. It is not the duty of the State, it is your duty to make it. The route for the road passes through one of the poorest parts of the State of Ohio. Indeed, for sixty miles, it runs through as poor a country as I ever saw. Let me ask of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Had this argument been used with respect to the Cumberland road, would Pennsylvania have made that part of the road which now passes through her territory? Or would Maryland or Virginia have made what passes through theirs? No, sir! So far from it, that I am well satisfied, if that road were destroyed to-morrow, a part of the population of these States would heartily rejoice. The resources of Ohio are scanty, and she will not do that which you ought to do. Ohio will certainly be benefited by this road, just as Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland, are now benefited by the Cumberland road. But these incidental advantages, resulting to Ohio, are not to deter you from performing your duty to the Union, any more than the incidental benefits of a fortification in any particular State should prevent the General Government from making the fortification.

With respect to the honorable member from South Carolina, (Mr. McDuffie,) whom I was delighted, on a former occasion, to find co-operating with the friends of internal improvement, I must say that my delight was only equalled by the regret I now feel at his opposition to the present bill. He tells us that the West is filled with emigrants from the Eastern States; that her inhabitants are but one part of the same family, spread on the eastern and western side of the mountains; that all the various and fond recollections which belong to the birth-place of these emigrants, constitute so many ties and safeguards to cement the common union. But, need I remind that gentleman, that other generations are hereafter to spring up—generations who will find the tombs of their ancestry, not upon the shores of the Atlantic, but in the valley of the Mississippi and the Ohio. On them no such ties will exert their power—no such recollections spread their healing influence. Is it not then the duty of the General Government to bind our population by other and more lasting ties? And, after all, what is it that is asked from Congress, not only at this session, but at all future sessions, for these eighty miles of the great National highway? Less than the cost of a single frigate—not twice the sum which will build those ten sloops of war which are now called for, and which I apprehend will be required for the defence of our commerce against the depredations of piracy—this is all that is asked. Yet we are told of the ravenous voracity of the West! Will Pennsylvania decline an appeal, not to her generosity, but to her justice? Is it fair—is it generous—is it just—after she has enjoyed the expenditure of more than a million of the public money, on the Cumberland road—after houses have sprung up, and villages been formed, and settlements multiplied upon her soil, in consequence of that expenditure—I ask, is it generous, to say, the moment the road leaves the limit of that territory, that she will oppose its farther progress? But, if neither justice nor generosity will prevail with her, let me remind her delegation of the interest of that State. What is this road but an extension of the road from Philadelphia to Pittsburg? And whither will its branches lead but to Bedford, to Carlisle, and downward, from thence, through all the neighboring towns? Sir, I do hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not oppose this bill. I know, indeed, that there did once exist a prejudice against the Cumberland road, in one city of that State; but I feel satisfied that ere now the good sense which so eminently distinguishes that city, has prevailed against the prejudice arising from a local interest, by which, for a moment, it was clouded. May I not appeal to the whole House? We have a great trust—

we have also a great duty to perform. Let us lend our hearty co-operation for the common good of those who sent us.

What shall we, from the West, say to our constituents when we return home, and they ask us, what have you done for the Cumberland road? Must we answer, "No money, no money?" If they can ask us what was done for the Delaware and Chesapeake canal, must we say, "O, there was some money for that—about twice the sum we asked for the Cumberland road!" Sir, we are men, and we have the feelings of men. But I will not longer detain the committee on an object so simple and a proposition so self-evident as the expediency of this measure. Let me rather anticipate your parental kindness—your paternal feelings, in promoting a design so intimately connected, I will say, with the safety and the best interests of our country.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with 150,000 dollars, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 96, noes 86.

The committee then rose and reported the bill; and the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, having been concurred in—

The question being about to be put on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, Mr. COOK demanded that it be taken by yeas and nays, and it was so ordered. The question was not taken, however, to-day, being postponed by an adjournment.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 18.

The House passed to the order of the day, and took up the unfinished business of yesterday; which was the bill for the continuance of the Cumberland road.

The question then recurring on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. McDUFFIE, of S. C., rose, and said he wished to say a few words on this bill, both from the interest which he took in the success of a general system of internal improvements, and to show that his opposition to this bill did not involve him, in reference to his views of the general subject, in any inconsistency.

Of all the considerations in favor of a system of internal improvement, no member, he said, was more sensible than he was, and it was hardly necessary for him, he trusted, to state the fact to induce the House to believe it. But he thought that he could satisfy at least some portion of the House, that, if a due appreciation of the great national objects to be attained by the completion of a system of internal improvement, was with them as a motive of conduct, they ought carefully to abstain from appropriating any money for any object of that description, until, after a patient and deliberate investigation, a general system should be devised. And here, said he, let me make a remark, for the truth of which I appeal to the members from every State in the Union which has embarked in a system of internal improvements, that, notwithstanding the obvious benefits which have resulted from it, it is a fact, even in those States in which internal improvement has been most successfully prosecuted, it has had to encounter the most violent opposition that could be waged against any measure. When the work is commenced, and whilst it is in progress, those who do not look to the result,—the great mass of the community—can hardly be brought to support it. Was it not a fact, he said, that the great canal of New York—that most honorable monument of public spirit, enterprise, and industry—would not that work have failed if the fund from which it was executed had not been previously pledged? If, then, a system of internal improvement by a State of great wealth and condensed population, cannot be prosecuted but with the utmost caution, and with something like a previous pledge, by an absolute investment of money, requiring the consent of all the branches of the Government to repeal it, he asked whether it would not be better for us, commencing such a system over so extensive a sphere, to act with double caution? We ought, said he, to look to the great whole of a system of internal improvement, and act upon the subject with reference to its ultimate completion. For, if we are to stop at any point in the execution, to break it off or to resume it according to the variation of public opinion upon its merits or expediency, we must act inefficiently and unsatisfactorily. We ought, therefore, on commencing it, to avail ourselves of those means most likely to ensure its final completion.

What then is the question now to be determined? The question is not, whether it be wise to continue this road. On that question, there is, I believe, no difference of opinion, except on the part of those who object to it on constitutional grounds. But, I ask, what great national consideration calls upon us to adopt this system now, rather than three years hence? Are we, by continuing this road, to preserve this Union? Yes, we are. But, without this road, will the Union be at an end in three years? What reason is there for alarm on that score, though this work may not be undertaken for five, six, or ten years to come? All those future evils which we are required to guard against by making this road, and similar works, are somewhat distant. If this road should not be commenced for ten years, the Union would not be dissolved by the delay. But I am not for postponing the work for ten years. I am for commencing it as soon as we have made our surveys—as soon as we have determined what shall be the general system established for the prosecution of these objects. As soon as we commence, sir, I am for going on as rapidly as the funds of the nation will allow. No one can be more anxious than I am that this work should not only be done, but done speedily. We shall accomplish it, however, by acting systematically on the general subject, sooner than by a partial appropriation, without previous examination, tending to hazard the final success, and at least retard the completion of the work.

With regard to the arguments in favor of this particular road, they may be either national or partly national only. That this road might be a part of a system of internal improvement, Mr. McD. said he would readily admit. In that view, he should cheerfully support it whenever a general system should be established, and had no objection to its having priority in the execution of the parts of such a system. But, so far as national considerations called for it, there had been no argument to show why this road ought to be undertaken now, without those previous inquiries and investigations which must precede the establishment of a general system. In a word, said he, all the arguments that can be used in favor of undertaking this work now, are sectional arguments. It is not worth while to disguise it. If they are not, why are they urged from a particular part of the country? The whole nation does not call for the present undertaking of the work, but two, three, or four of the Western States. Mr. McD. here replied to the argument that the Western States are not to be considered as more interested in this road than some of the Eastern. It was an erroneous idea, he argued, that a road was only valuable, or most valuable, to the particular State through which it runs. The Cumberland road runs through three States which derive no advantage from it. The right of way over this road is its only value. A few individuals residing directly on the road may be benefited by its passing through their lands; but the great benefit is to those who reside beyond its two extremes. Are not the Western States particularly benefited by the Cumberland road? It is the Western States, and the city of Baltimore—the points to and from which the road passes, that are benefited by it, and not the States through which the road runs; and, regarded in this light, the continuation of that road would be a road for the benefit of the Western States, of Maryland, and a very small proportion of the State of Pennsylvania. And, what is the state of the fact as to the Western country and the United States with regard to the appropriations heretofore made for the purposes of internal improvement? Why, sir, with the exception of this road, and other public improvements in different parts of the Western country, the United States has never appropriated one cent, worth noticing, for internal improvement in any part of the United States. The idea which had been put forth, that the navies of the United States, or the other institutions for the defence of the United States, are to be regarded as improvements analogous to those of roads and canals, seemed to be founded on an entire misconception. Mr. McD. traced this argument to its results. We are told, said he, that commerce benefits the Atlantic States, and that wars for commerce are wars for the benefit of the Atlantic States. Because commerce is transacted in the Atlantic cities, is it for the benefit of the States in which they are situated? Not more than the Cumberland road is for the benefit of the three States through which it passes. And, if we are to regard those only as benefited by any particular incident who are in contact with it, then the Atlantic cities only, and not the Atlantic States, are benefited by commerce. Is this argument correct? Certainly not. It is not those who prosecute commerce who alone are interested in it. For if it were, how far would its influence extend beyond the limits of our seaports? The man who lives a hundred miles from a seaport has no more interest in the commerce carried on there, than if he were a thousand miles distant. Sir, the back country of South Carolina has no more interest in commerce than every gentleman in the Western country has. Commerce, from its universal diffusion and influence, is exclusively national in its nature, benefiting equally every part of the country. Mr. McD. marked the further progress of the argument. We were told yesterday, said he, that the patriotism and devotion of the people of the Western country, in the last war, was not surpassed by that of any other portion of the people of the United States. Of the flood of honor which resulted from the late war, I have pleasure in acknowledging that the Western country was entitled to more than an equal portion. But, sir, had she no interest in the causes of that war? If we look at the public documents which belong to that day, we shall find that the blood which flowed from the savage tomahawk was one of the causes of that war. It was not a war for commerce merely. The outrages of the savages on our borders was one of the causes avowed for it, and not without foundation—for the agents of the adversary power were stimulating the Indians on our borders to hostility against our citizens, whose situation invited and received the attention of the Government. They were protected. All the military movements and operations on the north-western frontier were directed to the great object of protecting that frontier from the havoc and desolation of savage warfare. In addition, have we not, ever since the foundation of the Government, been prosecuting wars for the protection of our frontiers against Indian hostilities? Has it not cost more, during the times of general peace in Europe, for the protection of that frontier, than for that of the Atlantic frontier? The whole expense of the Navy, in those periods, will not be found to be greater than that of protecting the western frontier from the incursions of the Indians. What, indeed, is now the fact in regard to this nation? A large portion, say one-third of the Army of the United States, is at this moment permanently established on the western frontier, for the purpose of protecting it against the Indians. If we are to regard the expense of protecting a particular frontier of the country as exclusively incurred for the benefit of that frontier, all the middle and interior part of the Union, the heart of the Republic, has no interest in our defensive establishments, and all the appropriations for the defence of the frontier, east or west, are on their part gratuitous. Could I, residing far in the interior, remote from danger of foreign incursion, use this argument against measures necessary for defence? No, sir. In fact, Mr. McDuffie said, if any comparison were to be instituted between the expenditures for the protection of the West, and those for the protection of the Atlantic frontier, it would be found that the former involved more of national and patriotic feeling, than the latter. For, he asked, what do we of the Atlantic States get, in return for the expenditures for the protection of the frontier of the West? Nothing. What for the protection of the eastern frontier? Commerce. Interest, therefore, invited measures for the protection of the maritime frontier, whilst nothing but the most high and elevated considerations operated to influence the measures for the protection of the western frontier.

There was one topic alluded to in the course of the discussion, which, Mr. McDuffie said, was entitled to the most profound consideration. He referred to the distress upon the currency of the country, produced by the expenditure of the Government, in any part of the country, being less than the revenue raised in it. He acknowledged the truth of this observation, and expressed a doubt whether, if we had a system of direct taxation, operating equally on every part of the Union, the Government could, in the present state of things, exist under it. Take the State of Kentucky for example. How was her portion of the revenue of the General Government now paid? In the price of the articles of foreign growth or manufacture which they consume. That, he said, they could well bear, because they paid it in the currency of the State. But, suppose the same amount of money was to be raised by direct taxation, and it was to be received this year there, to be expended next year elsewhere. What would be the result of such a state of things? Fortunately, the actual operation is, under present circumstances, the reverse of this. We raise our revenue by imposts on importation from foreign countries, which are paid in the Atlantic cities. All the money raised there, or nearly all, is expended elsewhere, and much of it in the interior. So that, if any account be made of the drain of money, it is rather against the Atlantic States, than in their favor. If any State in the Union has a right to complain, said Mr. McDuffie, it is that which I represent. A considerable amount of the revenue of the U. States is raised from the goods imported into Charleston, and not one-tenth part of the revenue raised there is expended there, so that there is a constant drain upon that city, which produces the most injurious effects to its interests. The whole revenue of the country, he said, was derived from commerce, except the little derived from sales of the public lands, the full amount of which last, however, and probably more, was expended on the army, and other national establishments in the vicinities in which it was collected.

Mr. WENSTER, of Massachusetts, then rose and said that, as he was in favor of the bill, he should say a few words in explanation of the reasons which led him to vote for it. As to the question of power in this House to make appropriations for objects of internal improvement, he should at this time say nothing. When that question was so much agitated in 1816, he had made his opinions respecting it openly known: he was, of course, ready to change them whenever he could be brought to doubt the constitutional foundation on which that power rests.

At present, the question was a different one, inasmuch as the present bill might be passed without the assumption of any power different from what has been exercised by this House for these twenty years. The bill, it is true, carries the principle of former acts somewhat farther, but it does not alter the principle.

On this subject, as on all others, Mr. W. said he wished to bring to the discussion a right feeling, that is, a feeling truly national. It mattered nothing to him who was to be immediately benefited. Tros Tyriusque, whether an inhabitant of the banks of the Merrimack of New Hampshire, or the Merrimack of the Missouri, he cared not: provided he be a subject of our legislation he has claims, said Mr. W., on my impartial consideration. If he had been led, since the discussion of 1816, to alter his opinion on any part of the general subject then debated, it was that which respects an equal distribution of the public expenditures through the different parts of the Union, according to their population. He doubted, extremely, the propriety, and even the power of Congress to carry on legislation on the principle of balancing the local interests of different sections of the country. If the business of legislation has been committed to us at all, the whole subject is in our power, and under our discretion. He doubted whether Congress had power to adopt a system which should go on the professed principle of distributing the public moneys pro rata; having respect to the different portions of the Union merely in a numerical view of them. When Congress legislates at all, it must legislate for a whole, and not for twenty-four parts. The idea had been brought forward, as being calculated to prevent a merely local legislation; but it was, in truth, itself, a local idea. Such a system would rest on a foundation essentially vicious. When going into a system of improvement, the House has simply to inquire, Where is improvement most wanted? He cared not whether it was beyond the Alleghanies, or beyond the Missouri; wherever it was most needed, there it must first be made. He supposed the House had power to decide which of the various objects was most pressing; but he denied that it had the power to enter into the consideration of a principle of mere numerical calculation, in undertakings for the public good. On the present subject, it was his opinion that the States who had been admitted under the stipulations which had been stated, had, in fairness, a right to expect the Government to proceed with this road.

Taking the different statutes together, it seemed to be holden out, that Government would make a road, leading to those States. Congress had acted again and again on this idea; and, he asked, Where was the difference between the present appropriation, and those which had been formerly granted for this same road? All that can be said is, that the Government has made advances on a fund which is incompetent to repay them, and so the present amounts to a direct grant. Well. Had not this been done before? The appropriations for the Cumberland road had, many of them, been made when it was known that that fund was inadequate. The case is no worse now. The degree only is different. The principle is the same; and he thought that the Western States might fairly expect this object to be effected, on the ground of their several contracts. The next question was, is this a fit object for which to appropriate? Gentlemen say it is not a national object. But he knew of no work equally beneficial to all the twenty-four States. What, asked Mr. WEBSTER, is a national object? Is nothing to be so denominated except what benefits every part of the United States? Congress last year voted a sum to improve certain harbors on Lake Erie. Was this of any benefit to Alabama or New Orleans? They had appropriated money for the repairs of Plymouth Beach: could this be any benefit to the citizens of Indiana? Works surely may be denominated national, which are of extensive importance, although the benefit may not be strictly universal. The fortifications, for instance, which had been erected on the Chesapeake, are national only because many have an interest in it. The degree of interest in these works between those who lived on the shores of the Chesapeake and the shores of Lake Michigan, was so widely different, that the latter may, in comparison, be said to have no interest in them. Yet, certainly, those fortifications were a fit subject of appropriation, and it was the duty of Congress to erect them.

With respect to the present road, he asked how did the concern of the General Government in it begin? He presumed the origin of that concern was to be found in the connection of Government with its great territory of public lands. This was the idea out of which grew the reservation of the two per cent. fund. It was intended, doubtless, as an inducement to the settlement of the public lands, and none, surely, can doubt that Government may rightfully hold out considerations calculated to bring the public lands to a better market. The reason for making the road is still the same. Those lands are still in market, and every rod which is added to this road, increases the value, and is calculated to raise the price of those lands.

Another consideration was, the great accommodation which such a line of road would furnish to all the Western States. With respect to those States, the object was strictly a general one. Let me ask, said Mr. W., if Government were about to erect a fort or an arsenal, or to build ships of war, and it was possible that any of these objects would require so small a sum as that now asked for, whether anybody would then hesitate? If, then, the object was legitimate, if it was useful to all our citizens, and especially so to those who now ask it, might not Congress lawfully make it? As to the incidental advantages accruing from the expenditure of so much of the public money as was now proposed to be appropriated, he was confident they had been overrated. The expenditure of 150,000 dollars could be no great boon to any of the States. For his own part, he felt glad that this money was to be laid out beyond the mountains. He did not hesitate to avow that he should be yet more glad could more of the public money be expended there. Such were his feelings whether right or wrong, and such his views, whether correct or erroneous.

And here he would state what he conceived to be the true situation of that part of the Union. The people he considered as being substantially rich, yet, having no markets, they were without the means of converting their riches to many desirable purposes of common life. And, in such a situation, the expenditure of comparatively a small sum of money might do much in promoting the comfort of the people. There could be no doubt, if gentlemen looked at the money received into the treasury from the sale of the public lands to the West, and then looked to the whole amount expended by Government, even including the whole of what was laid out for the army, the latter must be allowed to be very inconsiderable, and there must be a constant drain of money from the West to pay for the public lands. It might, indeed, be said, that this was no more than the reflux of capital which had previously gone over the mountains. Be it so. Still, its practical effect was to produce inconvenience, if not distress, by absorbing the money of the people. It was as true of the West as of all other parts of the country, that the consumer pays the tax. The public revenue was not raised in Boston, or New York, or Charleston. The West paid as much of that revenue as the East, in proportion to its consumption; nay, on a strict calculation, something more. They pay the tax, and a profit on transportation. True, indeed, the money was collected in the custom-house, yet it was first paid where the imported articles were consumed. It could not be paid in the seaports, if it had not been first received in the interior. Some gentlemen say we must wait till a system is formed—that is, some system of internal improvement, so equal in its bearings, and so satisfactory in its details, that all shall agree in adopting it. He feared if genlemen waited till then, they would have to wait till they grew very old. He suspected that few of those who heard him would travel over the roads or sail upon the canals constructed after the adoption of the system. How long would it take merely to make the surveys for such a system? Was any man to be found bold enough to undertake to sketch out a system of internal improvements extending for twenty years to come? He would venture to say that no one man could form a plan in which he could get five others to agree. The thing was impracticable—and impracticable for this reason, that our entire condition was merely in a process of development. The country was changing every day and every hour—new views were continually presenting themselves—new wants were continually discovered—new resources were continually unfolding themselves—new connections were every day taking place—individuals were doing much—States were doing much—and he was satisfied that, if Congress was never to act on individual cases, but only on a universal system, it would never act at all.

This road was wanted—it was wanted now—it was wanted more now than it would be to-morrow; and the expense of making it to-day would be no more than of making it to-morrow. In the settlement of a new country, roads were all-important. The sooner they were opened the greater was their value and importance to the settlers. Ought not the road, then, if it is to be made at all, to be made now?

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, rose in support of the bill. He regretted to find the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) opposed to this measure, from whose talent the friends of the general system had much to hope. With the views of that gentleman in relation to a general system, both at this session and the last, he fully concurred. He regretted now to find that that gentleman, and others friendly to the power and the policy of making internal improvements, thought that nothing should be done until the entire extinction of the national debt, when we should enter on the general system proposed. In this he entirely differed. After applying ten millions a year to the extinguishment of the national debt, we have an annual surplus of at least three millions of dollars, making no allowance for a certain increase of revenue and diminution of expenditure. This surplus he would employ in internal improvements. During the present year, upwards of sixteen millions had been applied to the national debt; near five millions had been paid for Florida, leaving still a balance in the treasury of more than four and a half millions. During the current year, after applying about twelve millions to the public debt, and paying all the other expenditures required, there will remain a balance of about three and a fourth millions of dollars in the treasury. By applying but ten millions annually, the amount of the existing sinking fund, the whole of the national debt would be extinguished in about eight years, except the seven millions of United States bank stock, and the three per cents. which were payable at the pleasure of the Government. We shall then find ourselves with an annual surplus of from thirteen to fifteen millions of dollars, with which gentlemen would commence the grand system. And how are you then, Mr. S. inquired, to expend your thirteen millions a-year? Where will you find laborers? Where will you find engineers, practical men to superintend your numerous works? What will be the effect of throwing suddenly into circulation thirteen millions a year? It will produce an unnatural, feverish, and unwholesome circulation in the body politic. It will have the effect of another spawn, another litter of banks upon the community. It will raise the price of labor in an extravagant degree. It will require more than twice the sum to do the same work. Expend thirteen millions a year, and, in less than three years, the price of labor, and every thing else, almost, will be more than doubled.

The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) has contended that the West has been provided for; that they have had their full share; that the two per cent. fund has been expended on the Cumberland road. It was true, two per cent. on the sales of a portion of the public lands had been expended on the Cumberland road—and, if every cent, instead of two per cent. had been expended in the West, he contended the West would still have just claims unsatisfied. Since the organization of the Government, you have expended more than 600 millions of dollars, of which the West paid more than their equal share—and how much of this immense sum had gone to the West? Not ten millions—not one-sixtieth part.

In the last twenty years you have expended more than 470 millions—and how much of it has crossed the Alleghany? Not a fiftieth part of it—not eight millions, excluding the expenditures of the late war. He had said the West had more than their proportion of the revenue—he could demonstrate it. The revenues of the Government are derived from two sources—the customs and public lands. The customs, all admitted, were paid equally by the consumers of imported goods; of course, the West paid of the customs their full proportion. But, how is it in relation to the other source of revenue, the public lands? This was derived almost exclusively from the West; it was paid by those who purchased and improved the immense valley of the Mississippi, for which they have paid into your public exchequer more than sixty millions of dollars. Yet, we are gravely told, they have had their share. Where is it? Where has it been expended? Let the gentleman point to any expenditures of money in the West. Where are their navies, their ships? Where their great forts and fortifications? Where the immense expenditures for lights, buoys, &c., to protect and facilitate their vast internal trade? None; none. But, say gentlemen, we have done more than we were bound by our compact to do for the West; we have expended more than the two per cent. on the Cumberland road. The Cumberland road was not to be charged to the West; there is not a foot, not an inch of it in any Western State; it commences in Maryland and terminates in Virginia. But have the East no interest in the extension of this road? Will it not enhance the value of your public lands, bring them more rapidly into market, and facilitate their settlement?

Mr. Wood, of New York, then rose and said, that he was not now going to enter into any constitutional discussion, but merely to appeal to the generosity of the friends of the bill, by asking them to put it on a footing where those who differ from them on the constitutional question can agree with them in its support. If they will so modify the bill as to put the construction of this road under the superintendency of the Legislature of Ohio, I will agree in its support. Great waste must always occur where this is not done—I have authority in saying, that fully one-third of the money expended on the Cumberland road—in support of this assertion, Mr. W. referred to a book lately published by Major Long, which makes in effect, if not in terms, the same declaration.) If the gentleman will strike out the twenty per cent. in the amendment yesterday offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BRECK,) and insert seventy-five per cent., I will agree to vote for it. It will then remove the constitutional scruples, by giving the local superintendence to the local authority. The want of such superintendence was the great error in respect to the Cumberland road. There was no preservative authority—no tolls—no repairs—but the road was suffered gradually to go to ruin, and Congress will soon have to make appropriations to repair that road. The plan now proposed avoids these evils; and, if it is adopted, I (said Mr. Wood) will vote for this bill; in its present form I must vote against it.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, differed from the gentleman who had preceded him, as to the operation and influence of national expenditures. It was in his view immaterial whether they were upon the ocean or the land, their beneficial influence was felt throughout the Union. It was an error to suppose that our expenditures for our commerce, navy, &c., were for the exclusive benefit of the Atlantic States. The beneficial influence of every expenditure of this kind would reach even the confines of Mexico, and the remotest hamlet on the Missouri or Mississippi, by enlarging the market for all our productions. On the other hand, it was equally an error to believe that the Atlantic States derived no benefit from our national expenditures beyond the mountains; every such expenditure would spread its influence to our Atlantic borders, and though not everywhere in an equal degree, through every part of the Union. He had therefore heard, and not without surprise, the question argued, as if the benefits of a road or canal were limited to the particular country or State through which they might pass. The advantages enjoyed by the State where the work may have been executed, were unquestionably great, but greater still were the ultimate advantages of the interior whose productions were destined to pass through this channel to market. Take, for example, the Erie canal—a work which would do honor to any country—however important were the benefits which that great work had bestowed upon the State which he had the honor in part to represent here, still more important were the advantages to the interior. The people of New York, it is true, enjoy a market for their own productions; but they are, besides, the agents of the North and the West, whose productions are increasing in value, and are transmitted through this channel. It is impossible to measure the benefit which this canal must hereafter bestow on our interior country, when we look at its vast extent, and reflect that its productions are annually increasing. He, therefore, considered the location of a great work of this character not as the principal theatre of its benefits. So with the Cumberland road; its advantages were chiefly and permanently to be felt in that country beyond it, whose productions reach a market from which they had been previously excluded.

Gentlemen seemed to think that New York had great complaints to make against this Government for rejecting its applications for assistance. Mr. C. thought they greatly misunderstood the sentiment of his constituents, and of the people of the State of New York. Whatever regret they might have felt when the Federal Government refused its incidental aid in executing their canal, it was to them now a matter of congratulation, that, by this refusal, their State, aided by its own resources alone, had commenced and executed the most magnificent work of this kind in our country, and one probably equal to any this Government will ever execute. He took the occasion thus to speak of this great work, because he had been one of those who thought it premature. He would frankly confess, (as he should always do when he found himself wrong,) that he had calculated erroneously. He was gratified to find that the result had realized even more than the most sanguine anticipations of its friends, and that it had given an impulse to almost every work of the kind in the Union. The people of New York now rejoice that the Federal Government rejected their petitions, and deprived itself of a share in this great work, and they are too sensible of the advantages they enjoy, to deny, on that account, to the General Government, the exercise of all its constitutional powers in the execution of similar works connected with national purposes.

Finally, the question was then taken, by yeas and nays, and decided as follows:

WEDNESDAY, January 19.

Niagara Sufferers.

The House passed to the order of the day, which was the third reading of the bill "further to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, by the enemy whilst in the service of the United States, and for other purposes."

The bill was accordingly read a third time, and the question being, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, rose, and said, that before the question was taken, he wished for the reading of one of the documents which had been received from the Departments, showing the amount of moneys which had been already paid for losses on the Niagara frontier. He was persuaded that, on this subject, a mistaken idea was still entertained by many gentlemen who supposed that the $500,000 and upwards, awarded under the act of 1816, had all been paid for the buildings destroyed on that frontier. The several parts which made up that sum, had now been separated, and it would appear that, instead of $500,000, there had been paid to these unfortunate claimants on that frontier, who had suffered more in the last war than the whole of the rest of the Union, but $64,000.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

So the bill was passed and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

THURSDAY, January 20.

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

The bill to authorize a subscription to the stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal being on its third reading—

Mr. HAMILTON, in rising, remarked, that, whilst he returned to the House his most respectful thanks for the indulgence which they granted him yesterday, by an adjournment, which enabled him to address them to-day, he felt it due to himself to say, when, on the last evening, he submitted a motion to adjourn, that he had been influenced exclusively by a wish not to intrude, upon a fatigued and exhausted audience, remarks which he knew could have no attractions to arouse it from an apathy consequent on a protracted attention to the business of the morning. He declared, without feeling any strong wish to make proselytes to his views of the subject under consideration, he nevertheless desired, before he recorded his vote, to assign the reasons which induced him to give that vote in the negative, on a proposition which had seemingly so much to recommend it. He was more particularly solicitous for the indulgence of this privilege, because it appeared to the understanding of some gentlemen, that those who voted for the bill, technically called the survey bill, at the last session, were pledged on the great question of internal improvement; and that they could not, without some apparent inconsistency at least, refrain from supporting almost every measure which might have for its object the construction of a canal or road. That, having been thus initiated into the faith, that a ready concurrence in all expenditures which belong to the exercise of power, followed as indispensable and legitimate forms of worship. Now, for one, he had no hesitation in saying that the survey bill could have been voted for even by those who entertained the strongest conviction that no constitutional power resides in this Government to construct works of internal improvement—for the proposition really submitted, on the passage of that bill, was, whether, by maps and charts, we should obtain a statistical and topographical knowledge of that country, whose interests and prosperity are confided to our care? But his opinions he had no hesitation of avowing in relation to this subject, which were most unequivocally—that Congress had the right to construct roads and canals, under the military power, as well as the post roads and post office power given to it by the constitution. If we have not the power to construct either a road or canal, for the transportation of troops or munitions of war, I do not see, said Mr. H., whence we derive our power to build a fort or arsenal; for, in reference to the exigencies of war, they may be both of equivalent necessity: for it is altogether true, in a military view, a canal or a road may, in effect, perform the same offices, and tend to the same object, to wit: by a concentration of force on a given point of defence. And further, the right to make a post road, if necessary, is so inevitable an incident of the power “to establish a post road,” that it was impossible to distinguish between two things which seemed, in all respects, identical propositions. For, to make a post road may be as necessary, convenient, and profitable, for the transmission of the mail, as it is for the Government to purchase the leather which forms the portmanteau of the mail itself: and yet we have precisely as little expressed, and as much implied, power, for the construction of the one as for the purchase of the other. But, Mr. H. said, he would console the House by a most explicit declaration, that it was not his intention to go into a refined or abstract discussion of this question, on which so much ingenuity had been displayed. He confessed that this species of metaphysical dialectics had few charms for him, because he had no capacity for them—that the taper of common sense burnt with a light sufficiently steady to guide his humble steps—that a sound, plain, and familiar interpretation of an instrument, intended more for practical good than theoretic refinement and subtlety, suited his purpose. Besides, if he wandered far into these abstractions, he dreaded lest he might plunge into that “Serbonian Bog,” which lies on that narrow isthmus which connects the extremes of this question, where he would be left, notwithstanding the chivalry of his friends, (from Virginia,) to perish as an abominable and irreclaimable heretic.

Mr H. said, that whilst these two sources of delegated authority, to which he had referred, furnished the requisite power, he was happy to perceive, by their very nature and character, they also furnished a limitation to the exercise of the power, and confined its application exclusively “to national objects.” For nothing which has a just reference to the defence of this Union, or the communication of information, commercial and political, and social intercourse, can be otherwise than “national” in its character and tendency. With this view of the subject, he would support, whenever recommended by justice and expediency, any works of national utility, which could be brought under a direct, and immediate, and natural relation to one or the other of these powers, which he believed confided to the General Government. In making this declaration, it would be perceived, that he rejected the right to construct works of internal improvement, under the broad power to appropriate money “to promote the general welfare,” or “to regulate commerce between the States” the first of which he thought might be made to imply any or every thing which a capricious interpretation was capable of supplying, and that the last was as indefinite and as various as the principle of trade itself, and could be stretched almost to as many objects as there are subjects of barter and commerce.

Mr. H. observed, with these few remarks on the abstract question, he should now proceed, with the utmost brevity, to state why he should vote against the measure for which some gentlemen had indicated such an uncompromising zeal. He was not, for one, disposed to vote for any work, until, by an act of specific legislation, it could be made apparent what was to be the outline of the scheme of internal improvements; that there might be a strong guarantee afforded for the most defenceless portions of this Union, having the smallest representation on this floor, that they should participate in the benefits of a system having for its object the general defence of the whole country. Under the solemn faith of legislation, he wished some certain stipulation that those portions of the country most speedily requiring these improvements, and least able to accomplish them, should claim our first attention. He believed if this pledge, detailing the works in their order of progression, in reference to their relative utility, could not be obtained, that, without waiting for scientific estimates or surveys, four or five large States might confederate and keep the benefit of the system to themselves, under that "solemn plausibility" of the public good, which self-interest so freely supplies whenever the pretext is at all necessary. Besides, if the question submitted to the House was, where ought we to begin? he should think the answer ought to be decisive—not, surely, between the Delaware and Chesapeake; because, with the exception of certain portions of our Union, more especially in New England, he thought this section of the country decidedly the strongest and most defensible, from its dense population and already easy communication, and if our resources were to be applied at once, let them be carried to some section now comparatively weak, and most requiring interior communication. It is perhaps worthy of inquiry, whether it is to the interest of the Government to construct roads and canals in those portions of the Union where, in the progress of wealth and population, they will certainly be accomplished; for that works, executed by private capital and individual enterprise, will at once be more judiciously executed and more beneficially supervised, does not admit of a question; and to this it is no answer to say, that the United States, subscribing as a stockholder, has its interest superintended; for, for just so much as may be the capital of the United States employed in this way, will be so much of the capital of the country unrepresented by the ever-watchful instinct and sympathy of private interest. It is perfectly obvious, that the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal is precisely one of those works which must and will be accomplished without the aid of Government, by the natural progress of wealth and population, and the probable profit which will be afforded to the investment of capital under the guidance of those who can best direct it—its owners.

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. H. said he did not think that there was a good husbandry, or application, of the means of Government, to begin precisely at the point where the work could and would be accomplished, without our aid, when so many important sections of our country, infinitely more vulnerable in a military point of view, could not be rendered defensible without it. It is indisputably true, that there were many portions of the Union where, for the construction of roads and canals, the General Government would not be under the necessity of expending a farthing, even in reference to those routes which would be essential in time of war for the transportation of troops and military supplies, because private interest would make them complete and ready at our hands. Now, unless it can be shown that the resources of the country, for the next fifty years, will be more than adequate for the construction of those works necessary to the security (by internal communication) of those sections of our common Union, where they can only be executed by our entire aid; it is surely a question worthy of consideration, whether we are not beginning, not only in the wrong place, but doing that which, long before the most unimportant of our distant works can be accomplished, will be a superfluous act of munificence. For, he would undertake to aver, as certain as there was an increase of the wealth and population of Philadelphia and Baltimore, just as certainly would the projected canal be completed without our aid. And he believed this aid could be withheld without the slightest injustice to a single individual in this country: for what it is the interest of communities to do, they will do in the natural progress of events, without the pampering of Government, which often has an unpromising effect.

Mr. H. said that in his humble view of the subject, he thought the importance of the proposed canal, in a military aspect, was greatly overrated. He did not hold so absurd an opinion, as to say that the water communication contemplated would be of no service at certain exigencies, for the transportation of the heavy munitions of war. But the neck of land over which the canal is to pass, is too narrow, and is now furrowed by a turnpike road too good, to render the prompt and efficient passage of troops with their light munitions, at all uncertain or embarrassed. He would undertake to say this, that a body of twenty-five thousand men, with the necessary material for going into action on this side of the Chesapeake, could be marched on the turnpike as expeditiously as they could be transported by water on the canal, if they had to change their boats on their arrival at the Chesapeake. None but those who have witnessed it, can form any idea of the time consumed by the embarkation and debarkation of troops. The great utility of this canal, in a national point of view, would be its adaptation to the passage of vessels of war from the Delaware to the Chesapeake, without the necessity of doubling the Capes, in cases of concerted rendezvous at Hampton Roads. It does not appear, but precisely the reverse, that it is the object of the company so to construct it at present, and if completed merely for boat or sloop navigation, it is not very probable it ever will be so adopted, except on terms which would throw the entire burden on the Government, and at a cost which might infinitely transcend the value of the object, as valuable as it might be.

Mr. H. said he objected to the subscription of the United States in the stock of the company, on another ground, which was, that there would not probably be a single turnpike or canal company in the United States, which would not make a similar appeal under the benefit of this precedent, or, that would not perhaps have equal claims on your liberality; and, if such applicants did not succeed, it would be the result, he feared, rather of the weakness of the political combination which could be brought to bear on their applications, than on the intrinsic justice of their claims. The State which I have the honor to represent on this floor, is now engaged with an enterprise worthy of herself, and on her own resources, in two canals, both of which are more essential to the defence of the seacoast of three States in this Union than any two works that could well be imagined. He alluded to the Catawba canal, which opened a communication with the populous district of North Carolina at a distance of two hundred and fifty or three hundred miles from the ocean, and the Saluda canal, which afforded a similar facility of drawing military resources from Tennessee. Yet, Mr. H. said, he questioned whether, if either himself, or some one of his colleagues, better able to support it than himself, had introduced a proposition that this Government should lend the State of South Carolina three hundred and fifty thousand dollars on a contingent payment of interest when the works might be profitable, to accomplish them, it would have obtained any thing more than the cold ceremony of a reference to some committee where the measure would die a natural death, as a matter of course. Yet, he could demonstrate, in relation to the military exigencies of the country, that these canals were vastly more essential to its defence than the one for the benefit of which we are called upon to contribute.

If a system, having reference exclusively "to national objects" is reported to this House in the progress of four years, it will not be necessary to appropriate the whole amount of their cost at once, but by a judicious apportionment of our means, beginning with those of the first necessity, we might lay the foundation to some of those works which would form "a tower of strength" to us in war, as well as a memorial of our successful industry in peace, and at once afford an effective guarantee to all the portions of this vast Union, that their national interests would be considered. Now, said Mr. H., in beginning with the Delaware and Chesapeake canal, we are beginning where, as he had before said, our aid is least wanted, and where the work can and will be accomplished without it. Surely, if we are at once to commence the construction of canals, the communication between the Gulf of Mexico and the St. John's, the communication between the Cape Fear River and the Waccamaw, are points of far greater importance in reference to the exigencies of defence, than the point to which it is proposed you shall apply your means. The one comprises a section of country of sparse population, and extensive seacoast, where munitions of war must, in all probability, be transported on a sudden exigency. The last is a point in the heart of a population full and overflowing, and surrounded by all the materials of defence.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, rose and said that, as the honorable member who had just taken his seat, (Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina,) had professed his object to be not so much to make proselytes as to justify his own vote to himself, there was no imperious necessity for the friends of the bill to prolong the discussion, especially as he felt no desire to deprive the gentleman of any consolation he might derive from the reasons he had assigned, of which, in the fullest extent, he thought the gentleman would stand in great need. And yet, said Mr. McL., the relation in which the State I represent is placed, to the work proposed to be aided by this bill, makes it proper that I should briefly reply to the arguments submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina. Mr. McL. said the danger he had always apprehended in regard to these subjects had now arisen. He had never believed the constitutional objections to be the greatest difficulties; these were matters of construction arising out of the words and spirit of the constitution, which could be combated by argument and sound reasoning, by which the judgments of men could be addressed and convinced. This task had been performed; in this House, and in the nation, the doctrine had prevailed. Not only had public opinion yielded to the powers of the General Government to engage in internal improvements of a national character, but had even outstript and gone ahead of the notions maintained here. But now, said Mr. McLANE, after we have gained the victory over constitutional scruples, we are met with precisely the obstacles most to be apprehended, because they are most difficult to be reconciled. The friends of the cause create impediments, of which its opponents take advantage more fatal than all that have gone before:—objections on the score of expediency, arising out of the partial operation of our measures, out of local interests and sectional feelings. We are forbidden to exert our power in one part of the country, unless we employ it in every other. We must not spend money in the West till we can spend as much in the East, nor begin a work in the Middle States till we can use a like sum in every part of the country. It behoves the friends of internal improvements to discourage these difficulties in the outset. They will not be so easily combated by any argument, however powerful, because, arising out of local views, and conflicting feelings of sectional interests, they are regulated by the prejudices, and not the reason, of gentlemen. They are unyielding in their character, and acquire force by every partial success.

Ever since the termination of the last war, we had been making surveys, with a view to the military defence of the country. A regular corps of engineers had been constantly employed in developing the most eligible sites for these works. Numerous reports had been made, and the surveys were yet in progress. Was it ever pretended that we should not begin to fortify until we could know all that it would become necessary to do in this way? Should we have refused to fortify New York, or Boston, or the Delaware, or the Chesapeake, till the whole country could be explored, to see how much more might be done? To protect no part of the country until we could see how many others might be protected? On the contrary, said Mr. McL., determining upon the expediency of defence by fortifications, we have proceeded with all reasonable despatch; we have consulted the particular exigencies of the country, acted upon information as to particular places, whenever it was complete, leaving others for future operations. With this view, we have classified our system of defence in reference to their necessity. One class to be executed immediately, another at a longer period, and a third still more remote. If this work, of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, be important in a military point of view, and he hoped to show it was not less so than some of those fortifications, why not act in relation to it upon the same principle? If it be intimately connected with the military defence of the Atlantic frontier, and he believed it was—the gentleman himself had placed it on this ground—why not begin it at once, with the other great works now in progress for the same object?

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

Mr. McL. said, in every point of view in which he had considered the subject, the measure proposed by this bill was recommended by the wisest considerations. He had always entertained the opinion, that the best mode of applying the resources of the Government to great national works, would be to come in aid of individual skill and enterprise, where practicable, rather than to execute the work by the Government. Such works, when undertaken exclusively by the Government, were always more expensive, and sources of constant burden and expense, in making repairs and keeping them up. This was a reasonable objection urged to the appropriation for the Cumberland road. But, where individual enterprise, always careful of its own interests, and not likely to embark in ruinous projects, had been led to the projection of a work of this description, the Government might safely embark its capital in aid of the enterprise. This would be to cherish, encourage, and sustain, the spirit and industry of the citizens, and, without the absolute gift of the funds, conduct it to the mutual improvement of the country, and the attainment of great national objects. There could be little danger of loss in such a policy, since it rarely happens that a body of intelligent men would embark their individual means without a reasonable prospect of profitable employment; and, the work once being accomplished, the same funds owned by the Government could be transferred to other objects of similar importance, and ultimately attain the most extensive benefits, without any sensible effect upon the means of the revenue.

The bill before the House conforms to this policy. It proposes a subscription for 1,500 shares of stock in the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company, to be paid at the same periods, and in similar proportions, as the other stockholders, and to give the Government a control over the company in proportion to its interests.

The work itself is of the utmost importance, not only in a commercial point of view, but as it regards all the great interests of the nation. Consider it as you will, it is exceeded by no other work of the kind which has been projected in this country. It is not a work of experiment, suddenly suggested, and hastily adopted, by the magnificence of its consequences. It is a project of half a century; has grown up under the auspices of the most enlightened, scientific, and practical men for that period of time. A company has been incorporated by the authority of three States, authorized to make the work. Individual subscriptions, to the amount of ——— dollars, have been obtained; and, in aid of these, and in common with so many others, the Government is now asked to subscribe for 1,500 shares, which, if done, the work will be completed.

In embarking in this enterprise, we violate no State rights—they at least are, in this instance, secure. We encroach upon no municipal authority, because we are acting under its immediate and express sanction. Of the entire and absolute practicability of the work, with the present aid, no one who has attended to the subject, and to the lucid exposition of the honorable chairman of the committee who reported the bill, can doubt. The route has been established under the direction of the most skilful engineers, civil and military, in the United States. The estimates have been judiciously made—contracts for the whole work already entered into with responsible persons, at a sum within the estimates, and the work is in a rapid and prosperous advancement. The gentleman from South Carolina calls for a survey. Sir, he has it, and the best that could be made. The gentleman has not yet to learn that this work has been surveyed, in two successive years, by a part of the military corps of engineers of the United States, under the immediate direction of the Government, and by them approved and adopted. Sir, I should be safe in saying that, to the judgment of these engineers, the present location of the route of this canal is to be mainly attributed. In the earlier stages of this work, a different route had been contemplated, and at a far less expense, within the amount of individual subscriptions. This route has been changed by the recent surveys, and another adopted, requiring more labor and more money. When I consider the character of the men engaged in this survey, I am bound to believe that their location has been judicious; but it is, nevertheless, owing, in a great degree, to the decision of these United States engineers, that the cost of the work has exceeded the means of the individual subscription, and therefore requires the aid of the Government. But the gentleman says we must wait for the surveys of the last session. How can they aid our deliberations? Of what benefit will the surveys of the country west of the mountains, or on the lakes, be to us, in relation to this Delaware and Chesapeake Canal? We know as much of the work now as we should after any number of surveys. It is admitted, on all hands, that this is a work of the highest national character, essential for purposes of commerce and defence; that, begin when we may, this must be the first object to which we must turn: then, why wait, I repeat, for surveys, which can shed no new light upon a subject of which we are already fully informed?

Mr. MCL. said he should maintain, without the fear of contradiction, that this chain of interior canals was essential to the military power of this Government: complete protection could not be given to the country without it. The Government could not exert itself so wisely or profitably as in augmenting the means of defence. The arm of the Government was never so strong as when raised for the protection of the citizen. Its powers of defence endeared it to the people, led them to perceive and acknowledge its necessity, to admire its utility, and strengthen its resources. This Government could not be too lavish of its funds in the means of defence. No expenditure could be wasteful or improvident, if made among our own people, for their complete protection. But the raising of armies and equipment of fleets, were not the only means of defence: to a certain extent they were necessary, but totally inadequate to all the objects of defence. They were, moreover, expensive, in some instances dangerous, and he doubted whether the utmost resources of this country would be sufficient to defend the people by armies, navies, and even fortifications. We were not defended by an army which should wait to receive the enemy on his landing, and drive him back to his ships. An enemy commanding great maritime means, would distress us more, and produce greater ruin, by shutting up our ports without landing a soldier. By this means he would carry the pressure of war into every part of the country, and enfeeble the Government in maintaining large armies to watch his invasion. Our means of defence, to be effectual, should be carried to the homes and the business of our population. We should give protection to the labor and occupation of the citizen, so that he should not only be secure in his person, but safe in the pursuit of his industry. Such a species of defence has been entirely overlooked in considering this subject. But we cannot have forgotten the experience of the last war. We suffered, it is true, from the sudden incursions of the enemy, but in no degree equal to the calamities which everywhere pervaded the Union, even those parts most remote from the immediate theatre of the war. A blockading squadron at the Chesapeake and the Delaware, completely cut off the communication between the northern and southern sections of the Union. The industry of the people was paralyzed, the product of their labor rotted on their hands, the activity of the manufacturer was at a stand, the means of interchange were destroyed, individual suffering everywhere prevailed; no one felt the power of the Government; every one complained of its weakness. If, in such a war, there were an easy internal canal communication, we should be, in a great degree, beyond the power of the enemy. He might thunder in vain on our shores; our fortifications well garrisoned; aided by a small army judiciously posted, would prevent his landing, and the great business of the community proceed actively and securely. The horrors of war would not visit the interior. Individual happiness and comfort would be promoted, the wealth of the nation be increased, and when the Government should have occasion to call upon the friends of the people to strengthen its arm, it would not call in vain. It would call upon a cheerful, powerful population, and thus derive resources adequate to its greatest necessities. Sir, I pray gentlemen to allow the experience of the late war, aided by these considerations, to inculcate upon them to delay no longer the accomplishment of this great means of national defence and national protection. We are admonished, however, that the state of the treasury will not justify this expenditure. We are told to wait till the public debt is paid off, and the nation is out of debt. This argument has been so often repeated during the present session, as to induce some to believe there may be something in it. After hearing from every department of the Government so much about the flourishing state of our finances, it would indeed be strange if we had not the means of making a subscription of $350,000, to be paid gradually in the course of two or three years, without sensibly increasing our obligations.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, observed that when, at the last session, the bill for procuring estimates and surveys, preparatory to a system of internal improvement, had been discussed, the friends of that general system placed the measure on the ground, that it was to be carried into immediate execution. He doubted the power of Congress, under the constitution, to adopt that system. He would not now enter upon the constitutional question, but would merely state the reasons why, notwithstanding his sentiments on that subject, he felt at liberty to vote for the present bill.

The doctrine which had been then advanced, he understood to be this—that the General Government had, by the constitution, an inherent power to determine upon the best route for a road or a canal, and then to make the canal or the road. Mr. M. had objected to this, because he thought it was interfering with the authority of the States, and he had, therefore, voted against the bill for surveys and estimates. What, asked Mr. M., is the system to which that bill had reference, and about which so much had been said on this floor? So far as he understood it, it was a plan which was to emanate wholly from the Executive Department of the Government. According to that bill, the President had the making of these surveys placed under his own absolute control: he might send engineers just where he pleased; collect just such facts as he might think important and interesting, and present them to this House. When this should be done, what was the course to be pursued by this House? Was he to understand gentlemen that this House was pledged to carry into effect the plan of the Executive? He had the greatest respect for the President; but in examining a subject of this kind, it was proper to consider it in respect to possibilities, and it certainly was possible that a plan, emanating from the Executive, might, when it arrived at this House, be considered as defective in extent, or partial in its bearing—there might be many reasons why the House should not think proper to adopt it. What then was to be done? a new plan must be gone into, and still further delays occasioned. He apprehended that those who are opposed to the system, on constitutional principles, would have reason to fear that the plan would be so formed as to combine all the different parts of the country; and, if any such combination was attempted, the feelings of all must be consulted. Besides, if we adopt a general system, we run the hazard of collision between one section of the country and another. For his own part, whenever the State of Vermont or Massachusetts, or any other State, presented to Congress a useful object, he thought they might rely on the Government to give it such aid and support as its merits might require. He thought that Congress was much safer, in selecting objects for itself, than in having them selected and arranged for them. This they were perfectly competent to do, on isolated objects, without regard to any system. For himself, he wanted no aid from other sections of the country, to induce him to vote. If the gentlemen of the South wished to unite the Tennessee River with the streams that empty into the Gulf of Mexico, he was ready to act; but a report on that subject would not make him any wiser about the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal. Congress must judge on each object singly. To the present object, any constitutional objections against the system did not apply. There was here no question of jurisdiction—no State rights were invaded—the only question to be considered, was, Will you appropriate a sum of money to promote invaluable and important objects.

Mr. ELLIS, of Pennsylvania, felt great reluctance to occupy any portion of the time of the House, after the very able argument they had just listened to from the honorable gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE,) and after the grounds upon which the friends of the bill rested it, had been so amply explored by that gentleman and others. Under these circumstances, and the lateness of the hour, the attention of the House to the few remarks he had to make, he could only consider as matter of indulgence.

In the object of the present bill, every thing is prepared and digested. He said that he considered an appropriation in this House to imply and presuppose an estimate; he would always vote upon this principle. In the appropriations for the army and navy, the Secretaries of those great Departments were bound to give this House such lucid estimates, such clear statements of facts, that the appropriations to be made would follow of course. How, he asked, would these principles apply to the subject under consideration? Nothing was here left to chance. Surveys, estimates, and contracts under those estimates, had all been actually made; every thing of this kind was settled, and the operations upon the canal were now progressing, under a board of enlightened managers, and an able engineer. Suppose the general system digested and produced, it could throw no additional light on this subject. It stands on its own merits, and is confessedly an object of the first national importance; an extensive portion of several States will be greatly aided by it. He said that the navigation of the Susquehanna had long been a subject extremely interesting to the people of Pennsylvania. The Legislature of that State had made liberal appropriations to improve the bed of that river through all its falls to tide water.

The navigation of that river has always been of the most hazardous kind, and yet the hardy and enterprising men who live along its shores, had surmounted all its natural difficulties in getting the produce of the country to a market.

According to a hasty estimate which he had made, from his knowledge of the country bordering upon this river, and without referring to any certain data, he supposed that, in the article of wheat and flour alone, there was an amount of $1,000,000 annually transported to market by that river. To this may be added the other productions of that immense and fertile country bordering on this river, pork, whiskey, lumber; and to these again may be added a new article in the interior commerce of the States, namely, coal. The country bordering upon the Susquehanna abounds with this mineral, and, under all the present disadvantages, has found its way to a market at your cities.

The great country of the Susquehanna, he said, was rapidly improving, and as rapidly increasing in population. All that he had said of the Susquehanna might be applied to the Delaware. The article of coal, on that river, had become a most interesting matter, in the commerce of the interior with Philadelphia. It seemed then, in these views of the subject, of the first importance, that the contemplated communication should be completed, between the bays of these rivers. In a military point of view, he considered it of infinite importance to the country, that the object should be effected. Upon the completion of the canal through Jersey, it would open the most perfect communication between Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York. Troops could be moved to any of those points, with a celerity now impossible. And to this may be added, the transportation of every species of the munitions of war. In a word, as regarded the defence of the country, he considered it as of greater utility to the country than any one single fortification.

Mr. BRECK, of Pennsylvania, observed, that he rose not to enter into a discussion of the general subject, but merely to state the necessity of the aid of Government to prevent this undertaking from being entirely interrupted. He was in possession of data, from which he was enabled to state that, if the present bill should fail, that important work must again cease, probably for many years. The gentleman from South Carolina, indeed, (Mr. HAMILTON,) had said, that the canal passed through a populous and wealthy country, and such were the interests embarked in it, that, whether Government subscribed or not, the undertaking would certainly go on. In this the gentleman was greatly mistaken, and gentlemen would perceive that the reverse was true, when he made to them a few statements of the actual state of facts on this subject. It was almost twenty years since this canal was commenced. At that time, between two and three hundred thousand dollars had been subscribed, but subsequently, the course originally proposed for the canal had been changed. The money was expended, and the work ceased for many years. About two years ago the design was revived. The old subscription list had been examined, and it was now found that it would yield about 50 per cent. The company had then applied to the Legislatures of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, each of which had made grants of money to aid the funds. Efforts were then made in the city of Philadelphia to form a fund on which to recommence the work, but the attempt was attended with the greatest difficulty. Ward meetings were called, committees were appointed, all classes of people were applied to, not only merchants and capitalists, but shopkeepers and mechanics, and those of the lowest grade. The committees offered to receive subscriptions of a single dollar, and in many instances a subscription of ten dollars had been received, which were the aggregate contributions of several neighbors, who had united for the purpose. In this manner, four hundred thousand dollars were obtained, and there was now a deficiency of five hundred thousand dollars, and he was warranted in saying, that any attempt to get more in the city of Philadelphia would be made in vain.

The question being now called for, and being about to be put—

Mr. LIVINGSTON intimated an intention to address the House, and requested, on account of the late hour, an adjournment: which was agreed to.

FRIDAY, January 21.

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, rose, to say that the House would not have the pleasure of hearing the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. LIVINGSTON,) as was expected when the adjournment was moved on yesterday. That gentleman wishes it to be known that the state of his health prevents him from being in his seat this morning, and, it is said, that he does not desire the vote upon the bill to be delayed upon his account.

[A running debate then took place, generally covering the ground already gone over, in which Mr. Trimble, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Garrison of New Jersey, Mr. Mallory of Vermont, Mr. Sharpe of New York, Mr. Allen of Massachusetts, Mr. Little of Maryland, Mr. Marvin of New York, Mr. Storrs of New York, Mr. Buchanan of Pennsylvania, and Mr. McLane of Delaware, severally took part.]

The question having been repeatedly called for, was then put and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Alexander of Tenn., Allen of Mass., Allison, Baylies, Bartley, Beecher, Blair, Breck, Brent, Buchanan, Call, Cambreleng, Campbell of Ohio, Cassedy, Collins, Condict, Cook, Crowninshield, Cushman, Cuthbert, Durfee, Dwight, Ellis, Farrelly, Foot of Conn., Forsyth, Forward, Fuller, Gatlin, Gazlay, Gurley, Harris, Hayden, Hayward, Hemphill, Henry, Herkimer, Holcombe, Houston, Ingham, Isaacs, Jennings, Johnson of Va., J. The engrossed bill to continue the Cumberland road was then read a third time, and, the question being on its passage,

Mr. FORSYTH, of Geo., expressed his regret that he had not been present when the yeas and nays were taken on passing the bill to a third reading, that he might have had the pleasure then of recording his vote, as he should vote upon the present question in the affirmative.

Mr. ABOHER, of Va., demanding the yeas and nays, they were taken accordingly; and were as follows:

MONDAY, January 24.

United States Penal Code.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making further provisions for the punishment of certain crimes committed against the United States.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, said, the strongest objection which he had to this bill was one which he had taken occasion to state on a former occasion, viz: that it extends the jurisdiction of the United States to offences committed within the territories of the several States. It had been said that such an extension would produce no difficulty, because, as it is an unpleasant duty to inflict punishments, the State governments would be perfectly willing that the General Government should take it off of their hands. But, unpleasant as it might be, Mr. W. said, if it was necessary to punish crime, the State governments were not reluctant to prescribe the punishment. The period might arrive when the question, as to the right to punish offences might become an important question between the two Governments. Cases might occur, in which the State governments would claim the right of punishing offences within their jurisdiction. If, said he, such a state of things may arise, and the exercise of this power is not necessary to the due execution of the express powers of the General Government, I am for leaving the punishment of these offences to the State governments, which have been heretofore not slow to punish crimes committed either upon persons or property within their territorial limits. To his mind, Mr. W. said, the bill presented a strange anomaly. He could not conceive of the existence of a right in two Governments to punish the same individual for the same offence. He could not recognize the right of concurrent jurisdiction, as it had been termed in debate, to inflict separate and distinct punishment for the same offence upon the same individual. If the right exists, what will be the consequence of its exercise? Can one sovereign be deprived of his right by the exercise of a similar right by another? Can the exercise of the right by this Government deprive the State governments of their right in this respect? If there be any right which may be emphatically termed State—any right guaranteed to every state in the Union, it is the right of punishing offences committed within its limits. Then, unless the power of punishing these offences were expressly granted, or indispensable to the exercise of power expressly granted, to the General Government, it would be unwise in it to undertake to exercise that right.

As to the argument by which the power to punish these was incidental to the power to define admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, Mr. W. said he could not subscribe to it in its full extent; and, unless the power to punish offences was contained in that clause of the constitution, it was not contained in any other, unless it was an implied power, derived from the power to regulate commerce. He was not prepared to admit, that, under that clause of the constitution, Congress could provide for the punishment of offences committed within the territory of the States. For, if they could, all offences against private property and persons would fall within the cognizance of Congress. But, suppose it were conceded that this power actually does result from the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States Courts; have we, said he, any data by which we can measure the extent of that jurisdiction? Can we say at what point, in increasing this jurisdiction, the federal judiciary will stop? Does the federal constitution, or do the laws of the United States, prescribe any limit to the extent of that jurisdiction? For his part, he said, he had in vain sought for a limit to it. It was worthy of remark, that, a short time after the adoption of the constitution, when the Government was about to legislate for putting its powers fairly in execution, there was, in all the statutes for the punishment of offences under admiralty jurisdiction, an express exception as to offences committed within the territorial limits of the States. This ought to be some guide as to the jurisdiction which may be rightfully exercised by the General Government under that clause of the constitution. The House was asked to put within federal jurisdiction all crimes committed within maritime jurisdiction. What is the extent of that jurisdiction? In civil causes, locality or character may determine the question: in criminal cases, the locality alone, and that is to be regulated by the practice and discretion or judgment of the court. It had been said that it extends wherever the tide ebbs and flows. But, Mr. W. demanded, where is the law which confines that jurisdiction to the ebb and flow of the tides? Adverting to the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts of Great Britain, as settled by practice, or limited by the statutes of that country, he said that the statutory definitions, as far as he understood, were not applicable, as authority, in the courts of this country. He here repeated, what he had stated on a former occasion, that admiralty jurisdiction had been claimed and exercised in a State of this Union where the ebb and flow of the tide is not known. Since making that statement, the other day he had learnt that the same jurisdiction had been exercised in other States—at Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, by the District Judge. Is it in contemplation to punish offences, committed upon the Ohio River, in the federal court at Pittsburg? Is it intended that the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States shall extend to the Ohio, the Mississippi, and the Missouri? Is it proper, is it necessary, that a citizen should be sent three, four, or five hundred miles, to be tried by a federal court for offences committed within the jurisdiction of the State governments? Is it intended to let the federal courts punish offences committed in waters or streams navigable for vessels carrying ten tons burthen? It is not to be denied that the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers are capable of bearing vessels of ten tons burthen. If this bill passes, then you extend to the federal judiciary the power of punishing common offences, within the limits of States, where the State authorities are always competent and always willing to punish them. There cannot, therefore, be any necessity for the passage of this bill. Mr. W. here quoted the act of Congress extending the jurisdiction of the District Court of the United States to cases arising on waters navigable by vessels or boats of ten tons burthen, and asked whether it was necessary to the exercise of the specific powers of this Government, that this jurisdiction should be exercised by the federal courts, or given to them, as to offences, some of which were described in this bill. He adverted to a celebrated decision of Judge Story, upon the principles assumed in which, he said, no man could tell where admiralty jurisdiction might not be exercised; and, he said, if he were to judge from the last opinion of the same judge on this subject, he should infer that he was prepared to act upon the principle of the Latin adage, the English of which is, that it is the province of a good judge to extend his jurisdiction. On the subject of maritime jurisdiction, the judge says—“The language of the constitution will warrant the most liberal interpretation; and it may not be unfit to hold that it had reference to that maritime jurisdiction which commercial convenience, public policy, and national rights, have contributed to establish.” Now, Mr. W. said, what might not, in the discretion, he might say legislation of that court, be the meaning of commercial convenience, public policy, and national rights? I have, said he, rather a repugnance to granting to that court more jurisdiction than is absolutely necessary for the execution of the powers of the General Government. From what we have seen, if we may judge from that, they will not be reluctant to exercise any jurisdiction which they can make out a claim to. If these enactments are not necessary—if the States have not refused to punish these crimes when committed within their jurisdiction, why should we undertake to perform this duty for them?

As relates to those offences against life, limb, or property, committed without the limits of the States, Mr. W. said he would willingly go with the gentleman from Massachusetts, in legislating for their punishment, provided some proportion was preserved between the punishment and the crime.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, in reply, that the object of the gentleman from Kentucky might be attained without recommitting the bill, by moving amendments calculated to remove his objections to it in its present form. Recommitment was a practice resorted to only when the whole frame of a bill required altering, and the entire bill was to be re-cast. As to the third section, it must be obvious, that, where the jurisdiction of a small place, containing only a few hundreds of people, (a navy yard for instance,) was ceded to the United States, some provision was required for the punishment of offences; and as, from the use to which the place was to be put, some crimes were likely to be more frequently committed than others, the committee had thought it sufficient to provide for these, and then to leave the residue to be punished by the laws of the State in which the yard, &c., might be. He was persuaded that the people would not view it as any hardship, that the great class of minor offences should continue to be punished in the same manner as they had been before the session. This provision in the third section embraced the whole of a bill on this subject, which passed the Senate at the last session. The committee did not suppose it incumbent on them to enter into the details of a complete code of penal laws for a few hundreds of the people in the United States dock-yards and arsenals. With respect to the other objection of the gentleman from Kentucky, respecting confining the operation of the bill to the high seas and places not within the jurisdiction of any of the States, Mr. WEBSTER said that it was his intention (though not by any means for the reasons assigned by that gentleman, but in reluctant acquiescence with the wishes of a highly respected member of the Judiciary Committee) to modify the bill in the manner the gentleman desired.

In reply to what the gentleman seemed to apprehend from extending the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts to the State of Kentucky, he desired the gentleman to remember, that it was only the criminal jurisdiction which was proposed to be exercised. The cases to which the gentleman had referred, were all under its civil jurisdiction, a jurisdiction which often attaches from the subject-matter of contracts, and which, on that account, is much more extensive than the criminal. As to the contests which the gentleman had mentioned, between the civil and the common law courts, none, so far as his knowledge extended, had even thought of contending that the admiralty jurisdiction of England extended to cases of revenue.

Mr. WHEAT, of Ohio said, that he concurred with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that there existed great defects in the criminal law of the United States, and that it was highly proper and necessary that they should be remedied; yet he could not consent, in the attempt to remedy them, to give to the courts of the United States a jurisdiction which he did not think was given by the constitution. The bill extended that jurisdiction to navy yards and armories, neither of which were mentioned in that clause of the constitution which enumerates the places where the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States is to be exercised. He would confine the language of the bill, in this part of it, to the very words of the constitution, as he was entirely opposed to giving, by any act of legislation, a construction to any part of that instrument. The United States can get jurisdiction only by cession from a particular State. He moved to strike out the words "navy yard," "arsenal."

The Chair pronounced the motion not to be in order until the whole bill had been gone through.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the fifth section of the bill, which provides for the punishment of offences committed in any foreign port, on board vessels owned by citizens of the United States, was amended by inserting the following words:

"By any person belonging to the company of said ship, or any passenger, on any other person belonging to the company of said ship, or any other passenger."

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the words "and out of the jurisdiction of any particular State" were added to those parts of the bill which prescribe the limits within which the crimes to be punished must have been committed. Mr. W. further stated, that the present law provided punishment against seamen who "make revolt." But, as this term is unknown to both the civil and the common law, and is found only in the act of Congress, to which he referred, a question had arisen in the courts as to what acts constituted a revolt; and in one case it had been decided, that, as there were precedents, or legal means of ascertaining what was the extent of that term, so much of the act as prescribes the punishment of a revolt is void. To meet this difficulty, he proposed the following:

[Sec. 5. (printed bill) line 35, after "pirate."]

"Or shall unlawfully imprison or confine the master or commander of such ship or vessel, with intent to deprive him of his lawful command, or to compel him to do any act or thing contrary to his duty, or shall combine and conspire with any other person to make a mutiny or revolt among the crew of such ship or vessel, or to stir up among the crew a general disobedience or resistance to any lawful command or authority of the commander or officers of such ship or vessel."

A proviso was added to the end of the eleventh section, (which provides the punishment of death for burning or destroying a vessel of war of the United States,) in the words following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to take away or impair the right of any court-martial to punish any offence which, by the laws of the United States, may be punishable by such court."

The following sections were then, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER, added at the end of the bill. In illustrating the first of them, that murder, manslaughter, and maiming were the only offences now punished by the bill, no provision was made for that class of offences called felonious assaults; for want of which, it had actually happened, that a sailor, who cut the throat of his captain with a razor, from ear to ear, could receive no punishment whatever, because, by a miracle, the captain had recovered. And, in like manner, with respect to the second, that there had lately occurred two cases, in which conspiracies to defraud the underwriters by sinking the ships at sea, had gone unpunished, although clearly proved, because the attempt did not succeed.

[At the end of Sec. 22, of printed amendments.]

"SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons upon the high seas, or in any arm of the sea, or in any river, harbor or creek, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular State as aforesaid, on board any vessel belonging in whole or in part to the United States, or any citizen or citizens thereof, shall, with a dangerous weapon, or with intent to kill, rob, steal, or to commit a mayhem or rape, or to perpetrate any other felony, commit an assault on another, such person shall, on conviction thereof, be punished, by fine, not exceeding three thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor not exceeding three years, according to the aggravation of the offence."

"Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That, if any person or persons shall, on the high sea, or within the United States, wilfully and corruptly conspire, combine, and confederate with any other person or persons, such person or persons being either within or without the United States, to cast away, burn, or otherwise destroy any ship or vessel, or to procure the same to be done, with intent to injure any person that hath underwritten, or shall thereafterwards underwrite any policy of insurance thereon, or on goods on board thereof, or shall, within the United States, build or fit out, or aid in building or fitting out, any ship or vessel, with intent that the same shall be cast away, burnt, or destroyed, for the purpose, or with the design aforesaid; every person so offending, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of felony, and shall be punished, by fine, not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor not exceeding ten years."

"Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That if any of the gold or silver coins which shall be struck or coined at the Mint of the United States, shall be debased or made worse, as to the proportion of fine gold or fine silver therein contained, or shall be of less weight or value than the same ought to be, pursuant to the several acts relating thereto through the default, or with the connivance of any of the officers or persons who shall be employed at the said mint, for the purpose of profit or gain, or otherwise, with a fraudulent intent; and if any of the said officers shall embezzle any of the metals which shall at any time be committed to their charge for the purpose of being coined, or any of the coins which shall be struck or coined at the said mint, every such officer or person who shall commit any or either of said offences, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for a term not less than one year nor more than ten years, and shall be fined in a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars."

"And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act shall be and the same are hereby repealed."

Mr. WICKLIFFE then moved to strike out the punishment of death in the 1st section of the bill, (provided for burning any dwelling-house, store, barn, stable, light-house, arsenal, magazine, ropewalk, ware-house, store-house, block-house, barrack, ship or vessel, within any fort, dockyard, navy-yard, arsenal, or magazine, belonging to the United States,) and substitute in lieu thereof—

"Shall be punished, by fine, not exceeding 5,000 dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement at hard labor, not exceeding 15 years, according to the aggravation of the offence."

As this motion went to a leading feature of the bill, Mr. WEBSTER rose and said, that he might as well take the present opportunity as any other, briefly to state what were his views in relation to the penal parts of the bill. He regretted, as much as any of the gentlemen could do, the necessity of capital punishments, and he did not know that he was not prepared to say, that a system might be formed in which it should be dispensed with altogether. But such was not the present system of our laws. We punish the crimes of treason, murder, and rape, with death, and so long as this punishment was retained at all, he conceived that the crime of arson merited it as richly as either of the other offences. He would state, in a few words, his reasons for this opinion. No human code, proceeding on just principle, could undertake to administer any part of that moral retribution, which belonged to the general government of the Universe. The great objects of human punishments is to deter, by example, from the commission of crimes. Laws do not, or ought not, to proceed on a vindictive principle. Offenders are punished, not to take vengeance of them, but that others may not offend in like manner. Nemo prudens punit quia peccatum est, sed ne peccetur. Such was the sentiment of Seneca, and it was a just sentiment. The true inquiry, therefore, is, what degree of punishment is proper for the purpose of prevention, and to secure the safety of lives and property? It is essential to consider, therefore, in every case, not only whether the crime be highly injurious and dangerous to community, but, also, whether it be of easy, or of difficult perpetration; whether it be usually open or secret; and if secret, whether detection be generally easy or difficult. Now, with respect to arson, or the malicious burning of dwelling-houses, none could doubt, in the first place, its enormity, and the danger and destruction which it brought on life and property. To him it appeared certainly not less atrocious than ordinary murder. It was generally an act of deliberation, and it endangered, not one life only, but many lives. In the next place, it was easy to be committed—it did not require much preparation, or the favor of particular or unusual circumstances, or the aid of numbers. Lastly, it was of difficult detection. It is usually perpetrated in darkness, and the offender may have gone far from the deposited sparks before they show themselves in general conflagration. Experience proves, that extensive fires often happen in cities, under circumstances clearly evincing the agency of incendiaries, where there has been no conviction, and no detection. The hope of escape, therefore, in such cases is great, and in minds so depraved, as to be willing to commit the deed, it must evidently be controlled and counterbalanced, by the terror of some dreadful punishment, if detection should follow. Still, however, if the House, on due deliberation, should think that the public safety could be sufficiently secured, he should sincerely rejoice.

United States Penal Code.

[H. OF R.]

But, for himself, he had not been able to bring his mind to that conclusion.

The motion was agreed to; and the House adjourned accordingly.

TUESDAY, January 25.

Mr. ROSS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill fixing the place for holding the Circuit and District Courts of the United States for the Southern District of New York; which was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday next.

Penal Code of the United States.

The House then resumed the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill further to provide for the punishment of crimes against the United States.

Mr. WHEATLE then proposed an amendment to the first section of the bill, so as to make the burning of any store, barn, or stable, a capital offence, only when such store, barn, &c., was parcel of a dwelling-house, or mansion-house; and to amend the second section of the bill, so that the burning of a light-house, arsenal, magazine, ropewalk, warehouse, store-house, block-house, barrack, or any ship or vessel, should be punishable by fine and imprisonment.

The section respecting offences against underwriters, was slightly amended by inserting, after the word "person," the words "or body politic."

And, on motion of Mr. CALL, of Indiana, the 14th section of the bill was so amended, that, if there was no state prison or penitentiary, in the district where the offender is convicted, it shall be lawful for the court to imprison him in the nearest State prison or penitentiary in the limits of any other district. The vote upon this amendment was—ayes 76, noes 61.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the 18th section, which provides that the trial of all offences which shall be committed on the high seas, shall be in the district wherein the offender is apprehended, or into which he may be first brought, was amended by adding, after the word "high seas," the words "or without the limits of any State or District of the United States."

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Lou., then moved to strike out from the first section, (respecting the burning of dwelling-houses, &c., within any fort, dock-yard, &c., belonging to the United States,) the words "shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death," and insert, in lieu thereof, the words, "shall be punished by fine, not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment at hard labor for a term not exceeding 15 years."

In support of this amendment, Mr. LIVINGSTON went into an extended and eloquent argument—the heads of which alone we present, in a very succinct form.

He commenced by a deserved compliment to the learned Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, for bringing forward the present bill, since, in the previous state of the criminal jurisprudence of the United States, there were many different places in which almost all crimes might be committed with absolute impunity. Some learned jurists, he knew, contended that the common law was in full vigor there as elsewhere. But, if so, it introduced a dreadful list of capital offences, and such a one as he hoped never to see recognized in this country.

The question now to be settled, he said, was one of grave and deep concern, namely, whether human life should be taken away as a punishment for the destruction of mere property; for such, in its present form, would be the effect of the provisions of the bill. He avowed it, as his solemn conviction, that it was not proper to take away human life as a punishment for any crime whatever. He had long and deeply reflected on this subject, and the result of his reflection he would now state, 1st. That society have the right to take human life when such an act becomes indispensably necessary for its security, but in no other case. Before adjudging capital punishment, it was therefore proper to inquire, first, whether the evil to be remedied is sufficiently great to warrant it; and, secondly, whether death be the most effectual remedy. As to the crime of arson, he acknowledged it to be of such a magnitude that, if nothing short of the punishment of death would put a stop to it, even death must be inflicted. But, he asked, might it not be prevented by a milder punishment? Had the experiment been tried? If so, had it proved ineffectual? Then, indeed, death must be resorted to. But, if not, the House was bound, in conscience, to make the trial.

He then inquired whether death was a better remedy than the infliction of penalties less severe. He referred to the gradual progress which had been made by all the States in the Union, in softening the features of their penal code. The long black list of 160 capital offences had, by degrees, been reduced in some cases to four or five. He lamented that, while this was the case, under the State governments, the Code of the United States still retained as many as twenty different offences, punishable by death. He traced the progress of a similar mitigation in the laws of European Governments, and particularly those of England, and he expressed a hope that it might be continued until this country should merit the high eulogium bestowed upon the Roman Republic, that, of all nations, it had the mildest punishments. He referred to the doubts expressed by many great and wise men adverse to the right of taking human life at all, and then, considering the subject on grounds of policy merely, he proceeded to examine and to contrast the advantages and disadvantages attending the infliction of capital punishments. The general object of punishment was to prevent crimes; first, that of the criminal himself, and secondly, that of others. Death effectually secured the first point. The criminal capitally executed, could not repeat his offence. It also, in some degree, secured the second object by presenting to others a striking example, calculated to terrify the imagination and deter from crimes. The third and only additional advantage attending it was, that it was not so expensive as imprisonment. The disadvantages were, in the first place, that, in very many instances, it produced impunity. Such was the reluctance of witnesses, judges, and jurors, to convict when conviction was to be followed by the death of the accused, that he was too often permitted to escape; or, even if the evidence was such as to compel his conviction, a pardon interposed to prevent his punishment. On this head, Mr. L. remarked upon the multiplication of murders, and the comparative rareness of executions, and insisted that, if the punishment were lighter, punishment would be more certain. He applied this remark to the crime in question, and he referred to a statement of the late lamented Mr. Bradford, made in the year 1795, showing that, although the burning of a dwelling-house was made a capital offence by the laws of Pennsylvania, and the burning of other buildings was not so, yet, of all the buildings which had been destroyed by incendiaries, since the introduction of that distinction, by far the greater part were dwelling-houses. The second disadvantage was the effect of the exhibition on the public mind. If frequently exhibited, it had one of two effects, either to give a ferocious character to our population in cherishing and strengthening those feelings which, in Rome, led to the exhibition of gladiators, and in some Romish countries, of the Auto da Fe, or else it produced a total indifference. If rarely exhibited, the sufferer was by sympathy converted into a hero, his crime was forgotten, though of the deepest die. The clergy, induced by the best of feelings, gathered around him. The criminal was, or affected to be, impressed by the truths of religion, and he then became a saint—all eyes were fastened upon him—all hearts rejoiced in the triumphs of piety over the most obdurate heart: even the softer sex, forgetting their native horror of crime, flocked around him, administering every comfort; and the felon went forth to the place of execution, as to a triumph, followed by an escort that would not disgrace the most distinguished citizen. He asked whether such punishment could be expected to produce the desired effect? Instead of rendering the criminal detested, and his crime avoided, his crime was softened or forgotten, and he admired as a Christian hero.

Mr. L. here read several extracts from an examination gone into before the British House of Commons, with express relation to this subject, and which concurred to prove that the punishment of death was, in England, attended by no beneficial impression whatever. Under the sanguinary code of that country, crimes, instead of diminishing, had multiplied, and, he believed, had even been more numerous in England since the time of Elizabeth, when there were sometimes as many as two thousand executions in a single year; on the contrary, he contended that, in proportion as the criminal code in this country had relaxed in rigor, crimes had been diminished; while, at the same time, murder, almost the only one excepted from the mitigation, was never more frequent in the United States than at the present time. He felt persuaded that solitary confinement, if properly conducted, would have a much more beneficial effect than the infliction of death. Let the dark cell of the criminal be marked by the inscription—“Whoever enters here, leaves hope behind.” or with this —“Behold the doom which awaits one human being for the murder of another.”

Another objection to the punishment of death was the unequal effect produced upon the convict himself. It was a punishment very different in its intensity, as inflicted on different persons. One condemned wretch received it as a blessing; another met it with perfect indifference; while another was perfectly excruciated by the sentence; and, though held to be the most equal of all punishments, it was, in truth, the most unequal.

There existed another disadvantage: this punishment once inflicted, was irrevocable; and, if inflicted wrongfully, admitted of no redress. A mistake might be discovered, but the sufferer was gone; the justice of society could not reach him. Mr. L. here dwelt upon the uncertainty of circumstantial evidence, the dangerous effect of public excitement, and quoted instances in which the offender, after being executed, was found to have been innocent. He inferred the probability of many other similar cases, which were not discovered, because there were few who took any interest in the investigation. Public justice was satisfied, and all farther inquiries slept with the convict in his grave. Had he been punished by imprisonment, the discovery of his innocence would have restored him to liberty, and himself and his family to their former standing. The power of the State might penetrate the dungeon; it could not penetrate the grave—it could not silence the upbraidings of conscience, or stop the widow's tears. In reply to the argument that death had always been awarded as the punishment of murder, he answered, first, that the precedent was not binding; and, in the second place, denied its universality. During a great part of the Roman Republic, death was not inflicted as a punishment for any offence. There was no evidence, from history, that crimes were then unusually numerous. But, when capital punishments were afterwards revived, under the Emperors, everybody knew that crimes were multiplied beyond all example. He would not say, however, that the effect had the punishment of death for its cause. He insisted much upon the experiment made by Leopold, Duke of Tuscany, under whose authority capital punishments had been abolished in that Duchy for twenty years, during which time crimes were comparatively rare, and the prisons, at some periods, were literally empty; yet, at no greater distance than Rome, there occurred sixty executions in a period of six months.

Mr. DWIGHT, of Massachusetts, expressed the reluctance with which he said any thing in opposition to a speech which had done so much credit both to the head and the heart of the gentleman from Louisiana, but he could not perceive, although the gentleman had spoken much and eloquently against the infliction of death as a punishment for crime, how his general reasoning had any special application to the present bill. It might be good reasoning against capital punishment in general, but while such punishments were retained in our code, he could not see why the horrible crime of arson should be exempted from it. By the act of 1820, robbery committed on the high seas, and, by the act of 1804, the burning of a vessel on the high seas, were both punished with death. So was forgery of government securities or of the current coin, and, while these offences are capitally punished, on what imaginable ground should a felon be spared who sets fire to a dwelling-house in the dead of night? He did not expressly assert that death was, in any case, indispensable as a punishment; but, if there was any thing which warranted the taking away the life of the offender, it was a crime which put in jeopardy the lives of so many of his fellow-creatures. He did not think it was just to accuse the United States Laws of being so much more severe than those of the individual States. The reason why the former contained a longer list of crimes was to be found in the nature and extent of the United States jurisdiction; many of the crimes, capitally punished, being such as could only be committed against the United States. The laws of this country already deserved the encomium of which the gentleman had spoken, as being milder in punishment than those of any other nation. The gentleman was mistaken in supposing that the list of capital crimes in England had been so far reduced; one hundred and sixty offences were still punished with death by the English law. Nor were there as many pardons as among us. He considered the argument of the gentleman from Louisiana as applicable rather to the manner in which capital punishments are conducted, than to the punishment itself. As to the difficulty of convicting, of which the gentleman had spoken, he did not know that it was any greater in respect to arson, than to the other crimes now capitally punished. Nor was the crime so much more difficult to be proved. The gentleman had said, that the punishment of death, once inflicted, was irremediable. But this was no more than might be said of all punishments. The act of punishment could not be recalled—and the consequences were often such as could not be changed. He had quoted the examinations which took place by order of the House of Commons, from which it appeared that the convicts often exhibited the most brutal insensibility. He thought, for his own part, that the lives of such men were not worth preserving to the State. What hope was there of men who could engage in playing bowls when they knew that they were just about to be executed? With respect to the instance he had quoted as having happened at New Orleans, where six pirates had been condemned on the testimony of a perjured witness, he thought that the proper doctrine to be raised from the case, was not that piracy should not be punished with death, but that perjury should be. The case must certainly have been strong indeed, if the eloquence of that gentleman had failed to save the innocent. He should have thought it sufficient to persuade any tribunal to spare even the most guilty.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, laid it down as a universal rule, that punishment should never be inflicted, when it could as safely be avoided; and when it was inflicted, should never be greater than was indispensably necessary. But when we had gone thus far, Mr. L. observed, we were met by the grand and fundamental principle, that society possesses the right to defend itself. Without this principle, all laws were but in vain, and there could be no such thing as social existence in such a world as this. In exercising this right, enough of severity must be employed to effect the end, viz: the common safety. He had been sorry to hear from the gentleman from Louisiana, arguments which addressed themselves rather to the feelings, than to the understanding—arguments, all of which seemed to be in favor of the culprit, rather than of those who suffered by him. Ought not the gentleman to look at the other side of the picture? Ought he not to think of whole families, leaping in the dead of night from amidst the flames of their own dwelling? Ought he not to have favored the House with this picture, as well as with those which he had described so eloquently? Ought he not to direct his compassion to these innocent sufferers, as much as to the culprit? The gentleman had argued against the settled opinion of the whole world. It was needless to answer him, since he was already met by the arguments of all writers, and the experience of all legislators.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, said he had been instructed and gratified by the observations of the gentleman from Louisiana; but he put it to the candor of that gentleman to say, whether it was expedient to go at large into the discussion of a general principle, and then confine its application to one case. The principle was one on which there would be great diversity of opinion; which, if adopted, must alter many laws, and which could as well, and better, be discussed on a general bill, providing that where death is now prescribed, some other punishment should be substituted in its place, according to the different degrees of criminality involved.

If the general question must now be gone into at large, the measure itself must fail, and a bill so much needed would have to be postponed to another session. He should, therefore, abstain altogether from the general argument, and he hoped that the House would pass the bill, since its provisions did not go further, if so far, as laws already in force.

Mr. KREMER, of Pennsylvania, observed, that nothing but a strong sense of duty would induce him, at this late hour, to trouble the House. He thought that in a question of this kind, all feeling ought to be avoided, and he wished that the gentleman from Louisiana had not addressed the House in so eloquent a manner in behalf of the criminal suffering death. As to the question of policy there could be no doubt. The case was perfectly clear. The experience of every country and every age had declared it, and should we not profit by that experience? The gentleman himself says that there was a time when the capital punishments in other countries were as few as they now are in our own. Why then have they been increased? Because they have been found unavoidable. As to the right of society, it is most clear. The individual makes war against the community, and the country treats him as they would treat any other enemy.

As to the objection from persons sometimes suffering innocently, it might as well be said that you must not have a razor to shave your beard, because, forsooth, you might by chance cut your throat. What does the penitentiary system after all amount to? Experience had demonstrated that it produced a school for crime.

Profligates were collected from every corner of the country, and shut up in one jail, and thus came out greater villains than they went in—they scarcely got home, before they committed new crimes. He quoted the instance of a man in Pennsylvania who had been pardoned out of the State Prison, who exhibited his pardon in triumph all along the road, and, before he reached his home, committed the same crime for which he was put in. He believed the system to be founded in a mistaken feeling of humanity towards the wrong-doer. The gentleman from Louisiana has, indeed, told us that, as the thing is conducted in this country, hanging is quite a frolic, and that the criminal goes off like a saint. This surely was a strong argument for multiplying capital punishments, because we have not too many saints.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and lost; and after a little further conversation between the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the gentleman from Louisiana, The House adjourned.

Rules for Presidential Election in the House of Representatives.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Select Committee appointed to prepare rules to be observed in case the election of President and Vice President shall devolve on this House, made the following report:

The Committee appointed "to prepare and report such rules as, in their opinion, may be proper to be observed by this House, in the choice of the President of the United States, whose term of service is to commence on the fourth day of March next, if, on counting the votes given in the several States, in the manner prescribed in the Constitution of the United States, it shall appear that no person has received a majority of the votes of all the Electors of President and Vice President, appointed in the several States,"

REPORT:

That the following Rules be observed by the House in the choice of a President of the United States, whose term is to commence on the fourth day of March, 1826, if the choice shall constitutionally devolve upon the House:

1st. In the event of its appearing, on opening all the certificates and counting the votes given by the Electors of the several States for President, that no person has a majority of the votes of the whole number of Electors received, and the result shall have been declared, the same shall be entered on the Journals of this House.

2d. The roll of the House shall then be called, and on its appearing that a member or members from two-thirds of the States are present, the House shall immediately proceed, by ballot, to choose a President from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President; and in case neither of those persons shall receive the votes of a majority of all the States on the first ballot, the House shall continue to ballot for a President, without interruption by other business, until a President be chosen.

3d. The doors of the Hall shall be closed during the balloting, except against Members of the Senate, and the Officers of the House; and the galleries shall be cleared on the request of the Delegation of any one State.

4th. From the commencement of the balloting until an election is made, no proposition to adjourn shall be received, unless on the motion of one State, seconded by another State; and the question shall be decided by States. The same rule shall be observed in regard to any motion to change the usual hour for the meeting of the House.

5th. In balloting, the following mode shall be observed, to wit:

The Representatives of each State shall be arranged and seated together, beginning with the seats at the right hand of the Speaker's chair, with the members of the State of Maine, thence proceeding with the members from the States in the order the States are usually named for receiving petitions, around the Hall of the House, until all are seated;

A ballot-box shall be provided for each State;

The Representatives of each State shall, in the first instance, ballot among themselves, in order to ascertain the vote of their State, and they may, if necessary, appoint tellers of their ballots;

After the vote of each State is ascertained, duplicates thereof shall be made out, and, in case any one of the persons from whom the choice is to be made, shall receive a majority of the votes given, on any one balloting, by the Representatives of a State, the name of that person shall be written on each of the duplicates; and, in case the votes so given shall be divided, so that neither of said persons shall have a majority of the whole number of votes, given by such State on any one balloting, then the word "divided" shall be written on each duplicate;

After the delegation from each State shall have ascertained the vote of their State, the Clerk shall name the States in the order they are usually named for receiving petitions; and, as the name of each State is called, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall present to the delegation of each, two ballot-boxes, in each of which shall be deposited, by some representative of the State, one of the duplicates made as aforesaid, of the vote of said State, in the presence, and subject to the examination, of all the members from said State then present; and, where there is more than one Representative from a State, the duplicates shall not both be deposited by the same person;

When the votes of the States are thus all taken in, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall carry one of the said ballot-boxes to one table, and the other to a separate and distinct table;

One person from each State, represented in the balloting, shall be appointed by its Representatives to tell off said ballots, but in case the Representatives fail to appoint a teller, the Speaker shall appoint;

That said tellers shall divide themselves into two sets as nearly equal in number as can be, and one of the said sets of tellers shall proceed to count the votes in one of said boxes, and the other set the votes in the other;

When the votes are counted by the different sets of tellers, the result shall be reported to the House, and if the reports agree, the same shall be accepted as the true votes of the States; but if the reports disagree, the States shall proceed, in the same manner as before, to a new ballot.

6th. All questions arising after the balloting commences, requiring the decisions of the House, which shall be decided by the House voting per capita, to be incidental to the power of choosing a President, shall be decided by States, without debate; and, in case of an equal division of the votes of States, the question shall be lost.

7th. When either of the persons from whom the choice is to be made, shall have received a majority of all the States, the Speaker shall declare the same, and that that person is elected President of the United States.

8th. The result shall be immediately communicated to the Senate by message; and a committee of three persons shall be appointed to inform the President of the United States, and the President elect, of said election.

The report was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Preservation of Indians.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; which was read:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Being deeply impressed with the opinion, that the removal of the Indian tribes from the lands which they now occupy within the limits of the several States and Territories, to the country lying westward and northward thereof, within our acknowledged boundaries, is of very high importance to our Union, and may be accomplished on conditions and in a manner to promote the interest and happiness of those tribes, the attention of the Government has been long drawn, with great solicitude, to the object. For the removal of the tribes within the limits of the State of Georgia, the motive has been peculiarly strong, arising from the compact with that State, whereby the United States are bound to extinguish the Indian title to the lands within it, whenever it may be done peaceably and on reasonable conditions. In the fulfilment of this compact, I have thought that the United States should act with a generous spirit; that they should omit nothing which should comport with a liberal construction of the instrument, and likewise be in accordance with the just rights of those tribes. From the view which I have taken of the subject, I am satisfied that, in the discharge of these important duties, in regard to both the parties alluded to, the United States will have to encounter no conflicting interests with either. On the contrary, that the removal of the tribes from the territory which they now inhabit, to that which was designated in the Message at the commencement of the session, which would accomplish the object for Georgia, under a well-digested plan for their government and civilization, which should be agreeable to themselves, would not only shield them from impending ruin, but promote their welfare and happiness. Experience has clearly demonstrated, that, in their present state, it is impossible to incorporate them in such masses, in any form whatever, into our system. It has also demonstrated, with equal certainty, that without a timely anticipation of, and provision against, the dangers to which they are exposed, under causes which it will be difficult if not impossible to control, their degradation and extermination will be inevitable.

The great object to be accomplished is, the removal of those tribes to the territory designated, on conditions which shall be satisfactory to themselves, and honorable to the United States. This can be done only by conveying to each tribe a good title to an adequate portion of land, to which it may consent to remove, and by providing for it there, a system of internal government, which shall protect their property from invasion, and, by the regular progress of improvement and civilization, prevent that degeneracy which has generally marked the transition from the one to the other state.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, 27th January, 1825.

FRIDAY, January 28.

Road from Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan, to Chicago, in the State of Illinois.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "to authorize the surveying and opening of a road from Detroit to Chicago, in the State of Illinois"—and Mr. CLAY, (Speaker,) having invited the Delegate from Michigan to present a statement of the facts bearing on the bill—

Mr. RICHARD rose, and went into an exposition of the merits of the bill, of which the following is an abstract:

Everybody, said Mr. R., knows that the contemplated road is of the greatest importance, not only to the territory of Michigan, but also to the General Government: and the consequence is, that it ought to be done immediately. This road will connect the east of the Union with the west. The grand canal of New York will be completed next July. When the said canal is finished, we consider Detroit in contact with New York. Last fall, I was on Lake St. Clair on board a vessel built during the preceding winter, with a movable keel, ready and calculated to go down, through Lake Erie and the whole of the canal, to land at the Battery in New York.

In relation to our military operations, the utility of a road across the peninsula of Michigan, from Detroit to Chicago, is obvious. This road will afford a facility to transport munitions of war, provisions, and troops, to Chicago, Green Bay, Prairie du Chien, and St. Peter's River, &c. When our upper lakes are frozen, an easy communication will be constantly kept open, in sleighs, on the snow. Everybody knows, that, during the last war, for want of a proper road across the Black Swamp, our Government incurred an expenditure of ten or twelve millions of dollars, which would have been avoided by having a good road, made in due time. Make this road now, when you have the full sovereignty over the territory of Michigan, before it becomes an independent State, and you may easily anticipate how beneficial this road will be to your finances. There are more than seventeen millions of acres of, generally, good and fertile land, in Michigan proper, (without speaking of the ninety-four millions of acres in the Northwest Territory.) Without a road to go to those lands, they have no value. We are credibly informed, that, on our inland seas, I mean Lakes Erie, St. Clair, Huron, and Michigan, no less than one hundred and fifty vessels are plying up and down, on board of which whole families do come, sometimes, with their wagons, horses, sheep, and milch-cows; land in Detroit, ready to go in search of good land, to settle on it, and having their money ready to give to the Receiver of the Land Office. No road to go into that immense wilderness! What disappointment! During about twelve months, last elapsed, more than one hundred thousand dollars have been actually paid into the hands of the Receivers of Public Money, in the territory of Michigan, for land purchased. How much more would have been paid, if the proposed road had been made! We can learn from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that about ten surveyors have been employed in surveying public lands in the interior of Michigan Territory, between Detroit and Chicago, during last winter. These lands will soon be advertised to be sold. If there is no road to come to them, who will purchase them? But let this road be made; let it be determined by this House that it shall be made; then you will have purchasers enough: they will come as a torrent from the Eastern States. It cannot be questioned that the land along the intended road will sell for two or three hundred per cent. more than it would if there were no such road; and so, in nearly the same proportion, the adjacent lands will be increased in price. If you ask me what will this road cost? I beg leave to answer, it will cost nothing to the Government. I might say it will cost less than nothing. The half of the land along the road only, will, after the road is made, or determined to be made, sell for a great deal more than the whole would, without the road. What an immense profit for your Treasury you can derive from the sale of this immense wilderness, which remains entirely unprofitable, if you have no road to come at it! This road is, therefore, to be beneficial to your finances, and your military operations, and to all parts of the Union, as well as to Michigan itself; as it will afford all kinds of encouragement to the citizens of the Eastern States, who wish to emigrate to the beautiful and fertile lands of the West.

As to the amendment proposed to the 2d section of the bill, by the gentleman from Tennessee, I have no hesitation to state to the House, that the present Executive of the territory of Michigan, has, during a long residence in the said territory, acquired all requisite information and knowledge of the local circumstances; he has traversed this wilderness, on horseback, from Chicago to Detroit; he knows every foot of it. During his long administration, he has given ample proofs of his abilities; he has discharged the duties of his office so as to give general satisfaction to the people; and his attachment to the interest of the General Government is well known to all the officers of Government, and to the honorable members of this House; he is, therefore, the best qualified person to take the direction of the contemplated road. It would be even desirable that he should have the appointment of the Commissioners, and their assistants. He would find on the very spot, men who have often travelled through the said wilderness, and are acquainted with all the Indian trails which intersect it, and who, for one dollar a day, would do the work better than gentlemen appointed by the President, who might be tempted to spin out the time to increase their pay, at three dollars per day. I trust, therefore, that the honorable gentlemen of this House will pass the bill in its present shape, without any other amendment but the following, that is, to fill the blank in the 8d section with the sum of fifteen hundred dollars.

After a short explanation by Mr. HENRY, of Kentucky, to satisfy the House that a proper attention had been paid to the subject by the Committee on Roads and Canals, before they reported the bill at the last session; Mr. COOK, of Illinois, moved to fill the blank with $3,000 instead of $1,500, which was agreed to.

[H. OF R.]

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, an additional section to the bill was added, viz :

"And be it further enacted, That the Governor for the time being, so soon as the lands shall be surveyed, and the road located, under the direction of this act, shall designate the sections which are hereby appropriated, and report the same to the Secretary of the Treasury."

The committee then rose, reported the bill, together with the amendments, and it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, February 1.

Creek Indian Negotiation.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. FORSYTH, calling for the report of the Commissioners appointed to treat with the Creek Indians for a cession of their lands, was taken up.

Mr. FORSYTH said, as he wished to attract the attention of the House and of the public to a subject of very great interest to the State of Georgia, he would state what had been communicated to him respecting it.

The law of the last session, making an appropriation for the extinguishment of the Creek title to lands in Georgia, was founded on a document sent by the President to Congress: a letter from the Commissioners, who had been holding a talk with the Cherokees, which stated, on the authority of the Creek Indian agent, and some of the Creek chiefs, that that was a favorable time for a treaty with the tribe. After the act passed, when he could not tell, orders were given to the agent to collect them at the Broken Arrow. While this act was under the consideration of a committee, the Indian agent was in Washington, and certain Cherokee chiefs, whose treatment by the Executive, and pretensions, would be recollected. They came to protest against all appropriations to purchase lands from them, and to declare they would dispose of no more, either by sale or exchange. Not satisfied with their own success, they were disposed to extend the benefits of their negotiation to the neighboring tribes. Mr. F. understood that one of the chiefs had sent all their correspondence with the Secretary of War, &c., to the Big Warrior, advising that the Creeks should follow their example. However that might be, certain it was, that some of the Creek chiefs had a meeting at Tuckabatchee, in Alabama, near the town of Montgomery, and determined to follow the pattern of the Cherokees. Not satisfied with this, as the meeting called by the agent was to take place in November, another meeting was held by the Creeks, at Pole Cat Spring, in October, and the determination made at Tuckabatchee was confirmed, and ordered to be made public. The two documents were published as a sort of manifesto to the world that no more Creek lands would be sold to the United States. These documents were signed by the Little Prince, his mark, by the King Big Warrior, his mark; the Head Wolf, his mark, &c.; none of the persons signing the first being able to read or write, and but one or two who signed the second. The Commissioners of the United States, on their way to the Broken Arrow, heard for the first time, of these strange papers, the Indian agent not having considered it his duty either to prevent the determinations they announced, or to communicate them to the War Department; the sub-agent, who ate the bread of the United States, was active in promoting these determinations, and was supposed to be the secretary of one, if not both the meetings. The Commissioners found the Creeks, to the number of ten or fifteen thousand, assembled at the Broken Arrow, ready to assist in consuming the fifty thousand dollars appropriated by Congress for the expenses of the treaty. Their chiefs, living in Alabama, determined not to make a treaty; the sub-agent actively employed to defeat the wishes of the Government, and the principal agent acting a part of dignified neutrality, because he had not been instructed by the Secretary of the Department of War to promote the views of Congress, no treaty could be formed, as might have been expected. Notwithstanding the manifesto of the chiefs, the hostility of the sub-agent, and the dignified neutrality of the principal, the Commissioners found twenty-four chiefs, representing all the Indians residing in Georgia, willing to remove to the west, and give up all the land occupied by them—all the Creek Indians claim in the limits of that State. These chiefs represented about ten thousand Indians, and their price, including all the expenses for their removal, was $300,000. Unfortunately, the Commissioners did not conceive themselves authorized to make a contract with them. One of the Commissioners came to this place to ask that authority from the Executive. It was not given. New instructions had been given, and a new meeting was to be held, from which the President seemed to expect a more favorable result. Mr. F. apprehended that the present effort would not be more fortunate than the last.

Mr. F. said he felt great reluctance to state what he had been informed the Executive had directed to be done in this stage of things. He hoped that the documents might show that he was misinformed. For their insolent interference to obstruct the execution of one of the laws of the United States, the wishes of Congress, and the instructions of the Executive, the Cherokee chiefs were to be reproved by the Secretary of War. The principal Creek agent, who was a dignified neutral between his own Government and the Creeks; who thought a law of Congress, and the instructions of the Executive to the Commissioners, not sufficient to make it his duty to act with the Commissioners; he was to be reprimanded by the Secretary of War. The only decisive step, was the removal of the sub-agent. The successor of the sub-agent, no doubt warned by the fate of his predecessor, would take care to avert the conduct of the principal, and be ostensibly neutral, secretly hostile. Such were the circumstances under which Mr. F. had felt it his duty to bring the subject before the House, by his resolution, adopted yesterday, and that now under consideration.

The President, in his late message to Congress, had connected the performance of the obligations of the United States to Georgia, with the great plan of collecting all the Indians in our western territory, for the purpose of civilizing them. Of this plan, it was not now proper to speak. It might be wise, humane, and politic, but Mr. F. protested against connecting the performance of the obligations of the United States, under the act of cession of 1802, with that plan. He should consider a determination to that effect as an indefinite postponement of justice to Georgia. He hoped the Committee on Indian Affairs would consider them separately, and bring the two subjects separately and distinctly before the House, whatever might be their opinions upon them.

The resolution was then agreed to without opposition.

WEDNESDAY, February 2.

Election of President by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the report of the select committee appointed to prepare rules to be observed by the House in choosing a President of the United States.

The report was read through, and then

The rules were read and considered separately. On the first rule some conversation took place between Mr. BASSETT, of Va., and Mr. WRIGHT, the chairman of the select committee. No alteration, however, was made in the rule.

The second rule was then read, and no objections were made to it.

The third rule was read, as follows:

8d. The doors of the Hall shall be closed during the balloting, except against members of the Senate and the officers of the House; and the galleries shall be cleared on the request of the delegation of any one State.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, moved to amend this rule by striking out the last clause, viz: "and the galleries shall be cleared on the request of the delegation of any one State." Mr. I. stated that, as a member of the select committee who had made the present report, he had, when this rule was brought forward in the committee, objected to that part of it which he now moved to strike out; and he had objected then, as he did now, to the clause in question, because he apprehended that there was no good reason for putting it in the power of the delegation of a single State, (consisting, in some instances, of a single individual,) to clear the galleries of this House. He could not conceive that there was any need to go into conclave in order to conduct the approaching election. It was not a measure involving our relations with foreign nations, but a matter of a purely domestic character. Yet this rule enforces secrecy, in regard to the transaction, if required even by a single individual, and that in the most obnoxious form. He had rather have the rule made absolute at once, and say that the galleries, as well as the doors of the House, should be closed, than to give authority to the delegation of one State to have them cleared. He was at a loss to account for such a proposition. He supposed that there must be some special reason for granting such a power, but he could not conceive what it was. Was any distrust entertained of the personal safety of members of this House? Surely, the power of the Speaker over the galleries would be as great on the contemplated occasion, as at the present moment; and the existing rules of the House clothed him with full authority to have the galleries cleared in case of disorder. Believing that no good reason existed for the clause in question, he hoped it would be stricken out.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said that when the honorable member from Pennsylvania rose, he had been about to offer an amendment to the rule, in conformity with the opinion he had expressed, when in committee; and he should now acquiesce in the amendment which that gentleman had offered, provided the principle on which he himself wished to go, was adopted by the House. He was for clearing the galleries altogether, without leaving it to the delegation of any State to require that it should be done. In giving his reasons, in favor of this course, he wished it to be distinctly understood, that any remarks he might make, had no reference, whatever, to the peculiar state of things existing at the present moment. He thought the question ought to be treated as involving an important precedent, and ought to be considered on principles that were to govern on this occasion, and all others; not only now, but hereafter. He felt himself called on by his duty, to state these principles. He felt, very fully, the responsibility of his situation, and wished to assert the rights which he conceived to pertain to the members of this House, at the present moment, while the nation was in a state of calmness and quiet; a time peculiarly favorable for the adoption of rules calculated to provide for a season of great party excitement.

Mr. McL. asked, Why ought the galleries to be open? Why must this balloting be conducted in public? In electing a President, the members of the House were called to act, not as representatives of the people, but as umpires, to do that which the people have tried to do, and have not been able to accomplish. The people have tried to elect a President: they have failed to do so. The House of Representatives are then empowered to choose one for them. This power is not delegated to them by their constituents, but by the constitution: and, in exercising it, they have no peculiar relation to their constituents, and are not responsible to them, further than every honest man is responsible to his conscience and his country for his public acts. He should consider the question now presented as a new one, and should put wholly aside what had at any time been done respecting it. Who, asked Mr. McL., has a right to inspect my decision between conflicting claims to the Presidency? In ordinary cases he granted that the people had a right to look to the acts of their representatives, and exercise a sort of inspection over them. Yet, even this was not always permitted to them by the constitution. It provides that, in certain cases, the public eye shall be excluded, either when the subject of deliberation is of such a nature that an important public measure must be frustrated, if prematurely disclosed, or when, from the excited state of public feeling, an improper influence is apprehended, as endangering the freedom of debate. No such state of feeling existed now, but it not only might exist, and that in an alarming degree, but to such a degree as to become wholly irresistible. If the principle shall once be established, that the representatives of this people, standing on this floor to vote or to debate, are improperly to be controlled, it is in those galleries that the object is to be effected. If ever popular tumult, and a general excitement of national feeling, are to jeopardize the freedom, and endanger the purity, of this body, it is in those galleries that they will show their power.

For his own part, Mr. McL. said, he thought that, in so important an act as the choice of the Chief Magistrate of this nation, it was fit and becoming that members should be left to act from the cool dictates of their judgment, and that they alone were the judges how they ought to act. With them, the constitution had intrusted the duty, and there it might be safely trusted. Mr. McL. said that he had made these remarks from the fullest conviction of their truth. He thought that now, in a time of public tranquillity, a precedent might be set that would prove valuable hereafter. He felt great deference, also, for the precedent that had been already established in this respect. At the election of a President in 1801, this subject had been intrusted to able hands, and, after full deliberation, they had thought it expedient to admit no person as a spectator of the election but members of the Senate and officers of this House, and the election was so conducted.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he rose with diffidence to express his opinion upon this subject. Like his friend from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE,) he disclaimed the intention of making any remark which might have an allusion to the peculiar situation of the members of this House, in regard to the approaching election. He considered the present to be a question of great importance, and that its decision would establish a precedent, which, in future times, might have a powerful influence upon the interests of this country. He was sorry to say he had arrived at a conclusion in direct opposition to that of his friend from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE.) The reasons which had led him to that result, he would state to the House.

The American people, said Mr. B., have a right to be present and inspect all the proceedings of their representatives, unless their own interest forbids it. In relation to our concerns with foreign Governments, it may become necessary to close our galleries. Our designs, in such cases, might be frustrated, if secrecy were not, for a time, preserved. Whenever there shall be disorder in the gallery, we have also a right to clear it, and are not bound to suffer our proceedings to be interrupted. Except in these cases, he at present could recollect none which would justify the House in excluding the people.

In electing a President of the United States, said Mr. B., we are, in my opinion, peculiarly the representatives of the people. On that important occasion we shall, emphatically, represent their majesty. We do not make a President for ourselves only, but also for the whole people of the United States. They have a right to insist that it shall be done in public. He, therefore, protested against going into a secret conclave, when the House should decide this all-important question. He said that the doctrine of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) was altogether new to his mind. That gentleman has alleged that we are called upon to elect a President, not as the representatives of the people, but by virtue of the constitution. Sir, said Mr. B., who created the constitution? Was it not the people of the United States? And did they not, by this very instrument, delegate to us, as representatives, the power of electing a President for them? It is by virtue of this instrument we hold our seats here. And, if there be any case in which we are bound to obey their will, this is peculiarly that one. To them we must be answerable for the proper exercise of this duty.

What are the consequences, said Mr. B., which will result from closing the doors of the gallery? We shall impart to the election an air of mystery. We shall give exercise to the imaginations of the multitude, in conjecturing what scenes are acting within this Hall. Busy rumor, with her hundred tongues, will circulate reports of wicked combinations, and of corruption, which have no existence. Let the people see what we are doing; let them know that it is neither more nor less than putting our ballots into the boxes, and they will soon become satisfied with the spectacle, and retire.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) has urged upon us the precedent which now exists on this subject. Mr. B. said he revered the men of former days, by whom this precedent was established. He had good reason, however, to believe, that the intense excitement which existed at that time among the people, at the seat of Government, was occasioned, in a considerable degree, by their exclusion from the gallery. They came in crowds into the House, but were prohibited from entering the Hall. Currents, and counter-currents of feeling kept them continually agitated. New conjectures of what was doing within, were constantly spreading among them. Mystery always gives birth to suspicion. If those people had been permitted to enter, much of the excitement which then prevailed would never have existed.

It has been said that there might, and probably would, be disorder, if we admitted the people into the gallery. Mr. B. could scarcely believe this possible. He had too high an opinion of the American people to suffer himself to entertain such an apprehension. Should we, however, be mistaken, where is the power of the Speaker? Where that of the House? We can then turn them out, and we shall then have a sufficient apology for doing so. But, to declare, in the first instance, that they shall be excluded, upon the request of any one out of twenty-four States, would be a libel both upon the people of the United States and the members of this House. Mr. B. asked pardon for this expression, if it were considered too harsh.

Mr. B. said he knew well his friend from Delaware was willing that all his conduct, in regard to the Presidential question, should be exhibited before the public, and that it was principle, and principle alone, which had suggested his remarks.

That which gives this subject its chief importance, Mr. B. said, is the precedent. He was anxious that it should be settled on sure foundations. If the rule, in its present form, should be adopted, it may, and probably will, be dangerous in future times. At present, our Republic is in its infancy. At this time, he entertained no fear of corruption. In the approaching election, it can therefore make but little difference, whether the gallery shall be opened or closed. But the days of darkness may, and unless we shall escape the fate of all other republics, will come upon us. Corruption may yet stalk abroad over our happy land. When she aims a blow against the liberties of the people, it will be done in secret. Such deeds always shun the light of day. They can be perpetrated, with a much greater chance of success, in the secrecy of an electoral conclave, than when the proceedings of the House are fully exposed to the public view. Let us then establish a precedent, which will have a strong tendency to prevent corrupt practices hereafter.

Mr. B. concluded by observing that, whether we regard the precedent to be set, the nature of our Government, our own character, or that of the people whom we represent, they all conspire to induce us to adopt the amendment.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, thought there was no necessity for any further rule in relation to the galleries, than that which now existed. Provision was already made to clear the galleries whenever the House thought proper. This was sufficient. Why should a majority of all the members surrender this power to the delegation of a single State? He saw no reason. Why, asked Mr. L., are gentlemen so much alarmed? He was persuaded that no more disorder was to be apprehended from the gallery, in conducting an election of President of the United States, than in choosing a sergeant-at-arms for this House. For himself, he hated all mystery. He considered it a characteristic attendant of tyrannical Governments, and he thought that the proposal to conduct this election in secret, was a proof that we were not yet quite divested of certain old notions, which our ancestors brought with them from the other side of the Atlantic. He hoped that all that would be done, on this occasion, would be done in a plain, manly, simple, republican manner.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, would say a few words on the question, premising, that more importance seemed to be attached to it than he thought belonged to it. He presumed no practical inconvenience would arise, whether the motion prevailed or not; and yet, perhaps, it might be well to consider the subject duly, as, hereafter, possibly, the question might be of consequence. He did not see any particular benefit arising from providing that the galleries should, at all events, be open. There could be no debate when the House was proceeding in the election; and the voting must be by ballot. There was nothing to be done or said, but to give the ballots and count them. Something had been said of the superintendence which the people might exercise on this occasion, if the galleries were open. That was what he did not exactly understand. The people of the United States would hardly be in the gallery. Some hundred or two of the inhabitants of this city, those who should get up earliest, and get seats first, would be accommodated in the gallery, and others could not get in. He believed that he himself, finding some difference of opinion in the committee, upon the former rule, had suggested this modification. He was entirely willing the galleries should be open; and yet he was entirely willing to have them closed, if any State desired it. And, particularly, as it would be very inconvenient to discuss and settle these questions, after the House had begun to act as States, it seemed to him reasonable to make provision, beforehand, for this, as for other cases. He regretted both that the gentleman from Pennsylvania wished to expunge the rule altogether, and that the gentleman from Delaware wished to shut the galleries altogether. He thought the rule would do very well as it stood. It should be considered, that in some cases, very many persons were to express the voice of a State; in other cases, a single individual. Now, if either a numerous delegation, or a single individual representing a State, expressed a wish that spectators should not be admitted to the gallery, he was willing to indulge that request—so much the rule provided, and no more. He repeated, however, that he thought a very unsuitable and disproportionate importance might be given to this question, which he should much regret.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said that, individually, he had no objection to the amendment. If it were required to give publicity to the proceedings of the House, upon this subject, he should certainly favor it, because he was generally of opinion the affairs of the Government should be conducted openly in the face of the world, as he considered the Government as resting on the will and information of the people. But, Mr. W. said, in the discharge of the duties now to be undertaken, we ought to look to a future time, when the country shall be in a state of excitement, that shall reach and affect those in the galleries, and thence operate on the House. It will be recollected that the only time at which this House had heretofore exercised the power of electing a President, it had been solemnly decided the doors should be closed, except as to members of the Senate. That determination was not made without deliberation, but upon solemn debate, and by a vote by yeas and nays. Mr. W. said he felt, in some measure, the influence of that precedent, and had never heard any objection to the *mode of conducting the balloting*s on that occasion.

In reply to those who seemed to suppose it impossible that any disturbance should take place in the galleries, Mr. W. said he had an exalted opinion of the virtue and intelligence of the people; but we need not shut our eyes upon the evidence before us, and we need not go further back than one year for a most glaring instance of excitement and disorder in the gallery of a Legislative Hall of one of the States of this Union, while the Legislature were transacting business relating to the very election, the determination of which is now devolved on us by the constitution; and perhaps, he said, it would not be going too far to say that excitement might be feared now. Gentlemen seemed to suppose that, by closing the doors, an injunction of secrecy was imposed on the members and officers of the House, in regard to the proceedings, and that the whole were to remain secret. That, Mr. W. said, was not the case—the rule proposed no such thing: publicity could easily be given to every thing done. The journals were free for inspection, and it was surely safer to rely on them, than reports from the galleries. It had been well observed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) that all the proceedings relating to the election, were to be without debate; that, besides the ballotings, all were conducted by motion, second, and decision. This being the case, the results were all that could be communicated to the people in the galleries, and they would be as well communicated at the doors of the House. All that those in the galleries could see or hear in addition to the results, would be the mechanical operation of dropping the ballots into the boxes, and lifting them out again. I, said Mr. W., would vote as readily against the imposition of an injunction of secrecy, on the proceedings relating to the election, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGHAM,) or any other gentleman on this floor; but I cannot admit that any such proposition is embraced in this rule as it stands.

Sir, said Mr. W., it is not the people of the United States, the sober, thinking people, that will be found in your galleries on such occasions; no, they are at home, attending to their farms, their merchandise, their various other avocations; they will not assemble in the galleries, or be hereafter affected by the precedent you establish. It will be the artful, intriguing, designing politicians, from various parts of the country, to witness, and if it can be, to exert an improper influence over your proceedings, and these I am not very solicitous to accommodate.

I hope, sir, the amendment will not prevail, and that we shall not, against the wish of any one State, keep the galleries open for the exertion of undue influence, or to place members in a situation where any one can suppose they are unduly operated on.

Mr. ROSS, of Ohio, observed that, according to his understanding of the proposed rule, if it was adopted, the proceedings of the House would remain, at least for a time, completely in the dark. The demand of a single State, not even seconded by another State, was to be of itself enough to compel the House to clear the galleries. Why was this rule to be adopted? The only reasons he had heard advanced were, that the House must go into this conclave from a fear of interruption—interruption, not from themselves, but from the people in the gallery; that the people of the United States were not to be expected to be present here, and that those who attended in the gallery would be such as were not entitled to any consideration. This, according to his understanding, was the sum and substance of the reasons adduced in favor of the rule. But, for himself, he believed that the people of this country understood the rules of decorum as well now as they did when the constitution was formed, and that there was no more danger of disturbance now than then.

Whether gentlemen sat here as umpires or arbitrators, or as the representatives and organs of the people, was a question on which he certainly had an opinion, but which he did not consider it necessary at present to discuss. But, whether acting in one or the other capacity, he could not see why the gallery should be closed. The House had the power already to remove from it disturbers of the peace, and, if gentlemen meant so to conduct as to meet the approbation of their own consciences, they had no reason to fear those who would be in the gallery. And, if they were not afraid to have their conduct judged, why close the doors? All seemed to agree that no dangerous excitement existed at present. Was it, then, to be got up in two or three days, and to such a height as to threaten the safety or independence of the House? For himself, he could wish not only to have the people present, but that the votes of all the members were to be given viva voce. He regretted that there was any ballot at all on the question, and was utterly opposed to all closing of doors.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, observed, that he felt desirous of detaining the committee a few moments in offering a remark or two on the subject before them. It seems to be a well-settled conviction that it is a great public misfortune that the election of a Chief Magistrate should devolve on this House; and he would go further and say that, in so devolving, it was perhaps a still greater misfortune that the choice should be made by secret balloting in the several and separate States, which, by its nature, precluded the public knowledge, which the people ought to have, of the votes of their representatives, on a question so vitally interesting to them, and under sanctions so solemn and imposing. For one, he was free to confess, as the people were precluded by the very form of election, from this species of knowledge, he was disposed to let them in as spectators to whatever might pass in relation to the exercise of this great trust; and in making this remark, he concurred cordially with the gentleman from Ohio, in wishing that, in spreading all our acts and doings before the public eye, during the approaching contest, we could likewise subject each delegate to the direct responsibility of a viva voce suffrage. This being impossible, he was disposed to consider the assembly of such citizens as thought proper to come into our galleries, as curing, in a slight degree, the defect of which he had spoken, in the mode of election. They would have a contemporary opportunity of witnessing the vote of each State, and thus, information, which it was right and proper that the people should have, would be promptly disseminated, in a form, he thought, better to keep the public mind quiet, than those thousand rumors and suspicions which naturally belong to mystery and concealment.

The gentleman from Delaware, however, meets this subject at its threshold, by asking "what right any man has to go into the galleries to see what is doing in regard to the election of a President?" I answer, because that man happens to be one of the people, for whom we are acting, and for whom we are choosing a Chief Magistrate; and because he has precisely as much right to witness the election in question, as any act of ordinary legislation; and according to the theory of this democracy, it is infinitely more expedient that he should witness the one ceremony than the other. Mr. H. said that he thought the popular eye would have a salutary influence in repressing any indecorum and violence, to which, in moments of peculiar agitation, the House, constituted as it was, was perhaps even more liable than the spectators in our galleries. They are fortunately exempt from many of those strong biases of favor and antipathy which may lamentably exert an influence within this bar.

The gentleman from Delaware does not affirm that there is any danger at this time, in admitting our fellow-citizens into the galleries; but he contends that, at a future period, this House might be subject to intimidation from the violence of a mob, who would assemble to witness the scene, to which we are shortly to be summoned. Sir, when that day of profligate violence arrives, the atrocity of which cannot be put down by the force of public opinion—when a corps of such desperadoes are permitted, for an instant, to exercise such an influence, all spirit will have departed from this House, and all purity and moral worth from the people; and the forms we may cherish here, will be but a solemn mockery. When a few hundred persons, scarcely equal to our own numbers, convened in those seats, can successfully exercise acts of intimidation on the representatives of ten or twenty millions of people, to an absolute reversal of their sovereign will, it may be well imagined that the energy of the Government, and public virtue, are buried in a common grave. The argument, if it is worth any thing, could be urged, to show that it is expedient that we should even legislate in the conclave of a Turkish divan. The truth is, that many subjects of ordinary discussion, and common legislation, are better calculated to produce popular excitement, than the election of a President by this House. During the former, popular prejudices, and, I may say, the feelings of public vengeance, may be addressed, by the arts and electricity of popular eloquence. In the latter, our business is confined to one act, that is, in placing for our ourselves, or having it placed for us, a small strip of paper, on which the name of an individual shall be written. The ceremony precludes the possibility of debate, and almost the only motion which can be put, is, one that will have relation to the period when the act of balloting is to be renewed, on the contingency of continued failures to elect. It is impossible to conceive, in the forms of the transaction itself, fewer circumstances calculated to provoke popular violence and commotion. Besides, said Mr. HAMILTON, I think the very habits of our people forbid any apprehensions, either present or future; and, however little consoling it may be to the pride of some, he thought there was as much honesty outside of the walls of our House, as there was within them. He supposed that the individuals who would at present, and in times to come, occupy the seats in our gallery, would, a majority of them, be citizens of this District, whom he believed were as exempt from the character of corrupt intriguers, and noisy brawlers, as the people of any section of our country, although the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WRIGHT) seemed to think that our spectators, whenever we have a President to elect, must consist of the very worst, and most abandoned species of our population. For myself, said Mr. H., satisfied that no precedent we shall now establish will be binding, and that posterity will have the same right that we have, to take care of themselves, and being equally satisfied that the ordinary power possessed by the Speaker, to clear the galleries, in the event of occasional disorder, meets all the exigencies of the present crisis, I hope that every citizen of this land, let him come from where he will, may be allowed to witness an event, in which he has precisely as great an interest as we have ourselves: more particularly, when his presence can, in no degree, impair a sound and efficient exercise of the agency we have to exert.

Mr. H. said he would, before he took his seat, notice one or two remarks which fell from the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE.) This gentleman, in a very manly declaration of the course which he intended to pursue in the approaching election, has thought proper, as furnishing the best illustration of the principles which should govern him in that course, to affirm that he does not feel himself bound, by the wishes, either expressed or implied, of the people whom he represents on this floor, and that he was in no greater degree responsible to them, than to the rest of the country, for the selection which he should make of the person for whom he should vote to fill the Presidency. It is not my business, said Mr. H., to quarrel with the principles or the opinions of the gentleman from Delaware, for whom I have personally great respect, but, nevertheless, I hope I may be pardoned for venturing to express my own. The first obligation which a human being owes, is to his own conscience. If this monitor tells him that a candidate for office is dishonest and unworthy, no human power ought to compel us to vote for him. But, whilst I lay down this primary principle thus broadly, I am as equally satisfied, that, in the present election, which belongs peculiarly to the people, which has come to us on a forlorn and disastrous contingency, that, if we have no moral objections to the person whom, among the candidates, is preferred by the particular people we represent here, we are bound to surrender our mere personal preferences and prejudices, and to endeavor to carry into effect their honest, reasonable wishes. This position harmonizes with the whole theory of our representative democracy; and, to suppose that an agent of the people is absolved from all deference (and he might almost say obedience) to their obvious wishes, by the mere circumstance of our being organized into States for this exclusive purpose, is at once to sap those great foundations of responsibility and control on which our entire system rests. In a word, he thought the true rule was in a very narrow circle, which was, that, after satisfying our own consciences, the next best thing was to gratify the reasonable and honest purposes of those who send us here.

Mr. H. said that the gentleman from Delaware, in urging the House to adopt the rule for the exclusion of spectators from the gallery, during the election, had relied, with no ordinary emphasis, on the precedent which had been established by the Congress of 1801, in the celebrated, he could not say nefarious, contest between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Burr. As this part of the gentleman's argument he puts on the ground of authority, and not reason, he would venture to hint that he (Mr. H.) had some serious misgivings that people would not look to those times as furnishing the instructive examples of public freedom; for, he believed, it would be susceptible of proof, by referring to the journals, that most of those who voted then for the proposed exclusion from the galleries, were those who had most strenuously supported the Alien and Sedition Law. He did not make this allusion for the purpose of throwing a firebrand into the House, but he appealed to it as an historical fact.

In conclusion, Mr. H. said that he really hoped that no groundless apprehensions would induce the House to retain a rule, which, by the mystery which would be incident to its enforcement, would beget a thousand times more excitement than if our galleries were thrown open to the whole world.

Mr. McLANE again rose, not for the purpose of entering at large into the debate, but merely to correct some misapprehensions which appeared to exist, in relation to the remarks which he had at first submitted. It was certainly far from his intention either to stir up old embers, or to brighten any existing flame. Far less was it his intention to advocate any rule which had for its object the concealment of his own course of conduct, in regard to the election of President. He neither had nor could have any concealment on that point. His opinions at all times, and in all circumstances, had been openly known, and he meant that they always should be. If he even desired concealment, he could not effect it—he stood here with no colleagues. The vote he was about to give must be publicly known, and, whenever it was given, it should be given with a single eye to the interests of our common country. Could there, indeed, be any concealment in the matter? Did not every member of this House know how his own colleagues intended to vote? And would he not disclose that knowledge? But to whom? To the persons in the gallery? Could they discover, while the act of balloting was going forward, for whom those ballots were given? Certainly not. He should not, for his part, denounce the arrangement made by the constitution on this subject. Viva voce might be a very good mode of voting for President, but, whether good or bad, was not now the question. It was not the mode which the constitution had prescribed. He again repeated, that his object was not to effect any concealment, for himself or for others. The course which each member would pursue, would be well known to this House, and it would be known to the country in time to correct it, if erroneous.

But his object, Mr. McL. said, was to prevent the exertion of an influence which, at some period hereafter, might operate to warp and swerve members from the conscientious discharge of their duty. It was wholly on the ground of precedent that Mr. McL. was desirous to record his vote in favor of this rule. Surely, no gentleman, who knew any thing of history, could need any arguments to convince him how tremendous such influence as that which he deprecated, might easily become. Nor was it hard to say how it might be got up. A county meeting is held; votes are passed, approving or disapproving the anticipated conduct of a representative in this House, and directing him what course to pursue. And if the affair stopped here, there would be no danger. But it might go further; constituents may be brought to the scene of action, with the intent of intimidating and overawing the members of this House. The time might come when this would happen, though it may not now; and, if the gentleman from South Carolina shall then live, and cast his eyes on such a scene, Mr. McL. was persuaded that he would do justice to himself and to his motives on this occasion. That gentleman says that the people have a right to know what is done in this House. Sir, said Mr. McL., I agree with him that they have. He says further, that he cannot go with me in the doctrine that our constituents have no right to control us in the vote we are about to give for President. But, for myself, I am free to say, that, however I respect the opinions of my constituents in all cases of ordinary legislation, in this case I do not know them; I act as a judge and an umpire. I know perfectly that great respect is due to public opinion, when fairly expressed. But even public opinion, if, in my conscientious belief, it has run wild or gone astray, shall not govern me.

The constitution has imposed it on us as a duty, to choose a President, when the election by the people fails. Now, if my constituents have a right to instruct me, in this respect, the constituents of the gentleman from South Carolina have an equal right to instruct him, and so have the constituents of each member of this House. And, if gentlemen are bound to obey, and the country remains divided, the result will be, that this House cannot choose a President, any more than the people can. The last remedy provided by the constitution fails, and all those evils rush upon the country at once, which are the obvious result of such failure. It is expressly to guard against this, that the constitution provides, in the resort to this House, a tribunal which shall be perfectly independent, and above popular control.

When up before, Mr. McL. said, he had referred to the precedent of 1801, as bearing upon the present case. In answer to the argument drawn from it, the gentleman from South Carolina had denied any weight to the precedent, because it was derived from the administration of the Government by the Federal party. Mr. McL. expressed his regret that any thing should have fallen from that gentleman, which might have a tendency to revive animosities which, for the happiness of the country, ought never to be disturbed. But, he said, if this subject was to be introduced, he was willing to meet the gentleman from South Carolina. The precedent he had referred to, was a precedent set in party times, and of the Federal party. But, said Mr. McL., it does not, because it is a precedent of the Federal party, come to me with less title to respect. Is this the only precedent of that party? It is the precedent of a party, says the gentleman, capable of enacting the alien and sedition laws. True, it is: and it is the precedent of a party which organized this Government, which put it in motion, after building it up, and established the policy, which, wisely cherished, had made this nation, at this day, prosperous at home, and respected abroad. It is the precedent of that administration, to the wisdom of which, time, which tries all things, was fixing its seal. It is a precedent of the same party that established the judiciary, built up the navy, created an army, and laid the foundations of the system of national defence, which has afforded to us security at home and protection abroad. After copying from that party all these measures of national glory and prosperity, why will not the honorable gentleman receive from it also this precedent, which has the same motives, and the same great objects in view? In all other cases, the Federal party consulted the true interests of the country; and their measures were calculated to subserve them, or it has been folly to adopt them. In the case now brought into precedent, they had the same objects in view; and the gentleman will find, if he adopt their policy in this respect also, he will reap the fruits of this, as he has done of other precedents set by them.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said he had no disposition to say much on this subject; but, holding the opinion, which he did, of the most deliberate character, that, not only on this subject, but on all others, there should be no secrecy whatever in the proceedings of the Government, he was not disposed to vote on this question now, without saying a few words. He was not disposed to set a precedent now, to be governed by hereafter in a state of excitement. Is there any excitement now? The opinion of every member of the House, in regard to the Presidential Election, is made up decidedly and distinctly, and can be expressed in open sitting, as well, and no doubt as honestly, as if our doors were closed; and I was sorry to hear the gentleman from Delaware say, that the presence of persons in the galleries could have no effect on his vote: for I am sure there is not a man in the United States who would suppose such a declaration from him necessary.

In reply to the argument that but a few persons, who were industrious enough to get up soon, would be able to obtain admission into the gallery—Mr. F. asked, if so, why should any gentleman wish to close the gallery? Let them indulge their curiosity in this particular—he saw no objection to it. Nor could he agree with the gentleman from Ohio, that intriguers would be always up in the galleries—for that was not the place for them. The gentleman had also reference to a late occasion, not more than a year ago, growing out of this very election, in which there were some symptoms of dissatisfaction in the galleries. [Mr. F. here was going to remark on this illustration, supposing it had reference to the meeting at the Capitol on the night of the 14th February last, but Mr. WRIGHT intimated that that was not the incident to which he referred.] Mr. F. continued. Poor King Caucus having been so much abused and spoken of, sir, I thought the gentleman might have referred to that occasion, where I was myself present—for, sir, I was one of that respectable body, and I am yet proud of it. If, however, he meant not to refer to that case, I will refer to a case, the excitement of which, probably in this House, and in the galleries, and out of the House, never was, and never can be, exceeded. I allude to the Missouri question—during the arduous and protracted discussions of which, no disturbance proceeded from the galleries. I am not, therefore, for setting a precedent now, in anticipation of what has never yet happened. If, sir, the Representatives of the people, in their capacity of individuals, or acting by States, are capable of being operated upon by disorders in the galleries, it is high time for us to go home. But I apprehend no disturbance. In all the trying circumstances of the Missouri question, as respectful conduct, at least, was exhibited by the galleries, as by the House itself. A year or two ago, we were three or four days balloting for a Speaker of this House. Was the election of President more important than the election of a Speaker of this House? For himself, since the amendment of the constitution, he thought the office of Speaker second in the Government. If we can elect a Speaker without any trouble from the galleries, can we not also elect a President? I would not suffer the belief to go abroad among the people from our over-precautions, that we cannot. It had been sometimes said, in reference to the movements of this Government, that the eye of Europe is upon us. Now, Mr. F. said, he would not, in the eye of this people, or of Europe, have this House look like the Conclave of Cardinals, the Council of Ten at Venice, or even the Star Chamber of England. He would have the election of a President as public as possible, and let all the people, and all the world, see all that is done. There would not, perhaps, be much to see; the ballot-box would be placed on the Clerk's table, he presumed, and the States would deposit their votes in it as called over—that was the mode of proceeding in the caucus last winter, and a more respectable and honorable body of men, he must say, he had never known, and he had no objection to the whole world being spectators of the ceremony. It seemed that it was what happened on a late occasion at New York, that the gentleman from Ohio had referred to. Of that State, Mr. F. said—for she was a great State—he would avoid saying any thing; but, if what happened there had happened in Virginia, he should have said as little as possible of it: for the occurrence of the disturbance in the galleries of the legislative body, argued as little in favor of the body which did not suppress and punish the authors of it, as of those who disgraced themselves by making it. As he could not see any reason for secrecy, in conducting the affairs of Government generally, he was not willing to sanction it in this instance. If the Government was, as the gentleman from Delaware had suggested, strong enough for the purpose of security at home, and protection abroad, it had nothing to apprehend from disorder in the galleries of this House, its power being sufficient to enforce due respect to it.

Mr. F. said he was rather sorry, for several reasons, that the gentleman from S. Carolina should have alluded to the old Federal party. He had no doubt that, in every thing the Federal party had done, not involving its construction of the constitution, things were as well done as they are now. The error of that party was in not apportioning its legislation and expenditure to the true condition of the country. As to the elder John Adams and Timothy Pickens, he did not at all approve their constitutional opinions, and no one had been more decidedly opposed to them: but a state of things might occur, and he did not know but it had occurred, in which he believed he would take the old ones in preference to it. If the doctrines of the old Federal party were obnoxious, he did not see that those of the present day were any better. They undertook to do every thing under the clause of the constitution to provide for the general welfare; and so, said Mr. F., do we, at the present day.

One thing, Mr. F. thought his friend from Delaware had overlooked. He had said that the Federal party built a Navy. So they did, said Mr. F.,—and they sold it, too—at least, they provided for the sale of it. The next administration carried the provision into effect, for they were a law-abiding people. I cannot say as much for the present; for I read in the paper of to-day, that there is a seventy-four gun ship, built under an act expressly providing for such vessels, which is pierced to carry a hundred and two guns—the same which the President and a number of other persons have been lately on a trip of some seventy miles, to look at and admire. On another point, also, the gentleman from Delaware was somewhat defective in his statement: the federal administration did raise an army—but they also disbanded it. If that administration was to be reproached for any thing beyond an erroneous construction of the constitution, it was merely for the extent of their expenditure, &c., and in that extent, the latter days of this halcyon administration were as far in advance of the federal administration, as that administration was in advance of public opinion. Mr. F. concluded by saying, that, as he was against secrecy of every description in the affairs of Government, he should vote in favor of this amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON again rose, and said, that he felt it due to himself to make a very brief reply to the gentleman from Delaware, if it was merely for the purpose of assuring him that, in the allusion which he had made to the Alien and Sedition Law, that it was neither his intention nor desire to arouse from their mouldering ashes those embers of party distractions which, he thanked God, had long since passed by. Much less was it his object to fling imputations on a party, (among whom had been embraced some of the most valued and cherished friends he had on earth,) which, on a variety of occasions, had rendered services of signal and inestimable value to the country. But he would put it to the candor of the gentleman himself, to say, when he urged a measure for our adoption, on the mere ground of authority, whether it was not admissible for him to show that the authority, according to the popular understanding of the country, came rather in a questionable shape.

Mr. H. said that he should not deny, (for it would be unjust for him to do so,) that the Federal party (the very party which passed the Alien and Sedition Law) had contributed to the formation of those great and valuable institutions to which the gentleman had referred. But he believed that they were, most of them, the work of joint counsels, and a confederate patriotism, when parties scarcely had a controlling influence on public measures; and whilst he admitted that several distinguished members of the Federal party had left a large debt on our gratitude, he could not be unmindful of what such men as Jefferson, Madison, and Gallatin, had done, in giving efficiency and popularity to the form of our Government, by fixing the principles of a wise, economical, and prudent administration. He thought it, however, not a little caustic and unkind in the gentleman from Delaware, to appropriate all that had been done for the country, as the trophies of his party; if, however, these were consolations furnished after the loss of power, he surely would not deprive his friend of their enjoyment. But, after all, he had risen merely and distinctly to disclaim any intention to wound the feelings of a single gentleman on that floor, by an allusion which he thought had laid fairly in his view.

Mr. MEBBER, of Virginia, then observed, that he was very happy that the gentleman from South Carolina had made the explanation he had just given; and he expressed a hope that all party divisions and party feeling would be banished on the present occasion. He thought that the observations of the gentleman from Delaware, himself, had shown that no great injury was likely to result from the admission of spectators. If it was really true, that the sentiments of members were not concealed from each other, the mere closing of the gallery would not operate to conceal them from the public, or materially prevent any influence from out of doors. Members were not under any injunction of secrecy, and whatever was done within, would almost immediately be known without. There was then no end to be accomplished by the rule, but solely the prevention of disorder; and the only question to be settled was, whether the rule was necessary for this purpose. Mr. M. believed it was not: he could conceive no reason to apprehend the smallest danger of it. He thought that, under the protection which they enjoyed on all other days, the House would be as free from disturbance on this, as on other occasions. As to the precedent which had been referred to, Mr. M. made some remarks, which, from his position in the House, the reporter but imperfectly heard.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was afraid that an observation by the honorable member from Ohio, apparently made in allusion to his remarks, might lead to misapprehension. He had not intimated that the gallery might be filled by persons not entitled to consideration; no such thing. He only spoke of its size, and then only in consequence of the argument that the people of the United States might, from the galleries, superintend the votes of their Representatives. Superintend, he believed was the word. His honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) seemed, in like manner, to have misapprehended him in this particular.

Even if the galleries should be cleared during the proceedings, at the request of a State, there would still be no propriety in speaking of the proceeding as done in conclave, or as kept secret from the people. The journal would be published daily, as usual. There would be no injunction of secrecy. It was a mere question about the orderly and decorous proceeding—the police, as it were—of the House. As to the supposition that any gentleman wished to conceal his vote, or to act secretly, there was no one who supposed such a wish to exist anywhere. He was willing, every member was willing, that his vote should be known to everybody. He had known questions which he thought as important as this. He might again. The occasion, however, might attract a multitude, and the object was to secure order, and freedom from restraint.

The gentleman from Virginia had objected to voting on questions of adjournment, &c., by States. But it would be seen at once, that, as the election was to be made by States, every question fairly and really incident to the choice, ought to be decided also by States. The constitution said the House should immediately elect a President. On the former occasion, the rule was, that the House should proceed, without interruption from other business, and without adjournment, to choose a President. But the latter part of the rule was found impracticable, in fact, and avoided afterwards, by voting on one day, that the next balloting should not take place till the next day. So that all the members were, in fact, quietly sleeping in their beds, while the House, according to the journal and the rule, was all the time sitting. The vote to postpone the balloting, from time to time, was, on that occasion, taken by States. The committee had thought proper, on this occasion, to recommend that the House might adjourn on the vote of a majority of States.

FEBRUARY, 1825.]

Election of President by the House of Representatives.

[H. OF R.]

He again hoped that too much importance might not be attached to this question. He had no fear of any great inconvenience either way. He saw no question of principle in it. It was a question of expediency; and he remained of opinion, that the rule prescribed a fit course, upon the whole, to be followed. He certainly was not likely to request the gallery to be cleared; but if any gentleman, or gentlemen, representing another State, should make such a request, he thought it ought to be granted. And, therefore, he approved the rule, in its present state. He would state again, and would particularly request the House to consider it, that there might be inconvenience and embarrassment, if this question were left to be decided, and should arise, after the House had commenced the proceeding, when it must act by States and without debate. To prevent such possible inconvenience and embarrassment was one object of the rule.

Mr. WRIGHT said, that, before the question was taken, he wished to correct the misapprehension of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) as to the remarks he formerly made in relation to the kind of people that would crowd the galleries on occasions like the one contemplated. If I understood him aright, (said Mr. W.), he supposed me to assert that none but the profligate and worthless people of this district would be found in the galleries, and that I considered none of them worthy a place there. Sir, I am not aware that I said anything of the people of this district or city; and if I did, I never could have uttered sentiments so entirely foreign from my feelings as those imputed. I did say, however, that those who would crowd the galleries on such occasions, would be the unprincipled and profligate politicians of the country, ready for the exertion of any influence, however improper and desperate, to effect their object. In this, sir, the people of this city or district were in no way implicated, and I protest against the gentleman's carrying these declarations into any account against them. Among my acquaintance in the city and district, I am proud to rank many for whom I entertain a respect not surpassed by any felt by the gentleman himself, for them, or any other persons whatever.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) has said, in allusion to what fell from me, that the intriguers will not make the galleries the theatre of their operations. No, sir, not altogether. I concur with the gentleman in part; but when they have exerted their influence out of doors, and accomplished all within their power there, they will then take possession of the galleries, to observe its effect and operation here.

A word, sir, as to the motion. It is to take from the delegation of a State the power to clear the galleries. In ordinary cases, the Speaker, or any member of the House, can do it. When we assemble to ballot for President, we lose our individual character, and proceed as the representatives of States, acting only as States; and I can see no danger in giving to the representatives of one sovereignty the power to clear the galleries. It is but a mark of respect to him, and, in my opinion, it is peculiarly fit and proper that he should have the power to exercise, if the occasion called for it.

Mr. McDUFFIE, of S. C., observed, that as, in the course of the debate, principles had been advanced, against which he must protest, and against which he intended to vote, he was desirous of giving the subject some discussion, which the lateness of the hour would not, at present, admit him to do. He therefore moved that the committee rise.

The question on rising was put accordingly, and carried, ayes 89—noes 71. So the committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 3.

Election of President by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and again took up the report of the committee appointed to prepare rules to be observed, by the House, in the election of a President of the United States. The question recurring, from yesterday, on the motion of Mr. INGHAM, to strike out the last clause of the third rule, which directs that the galleries shall be cleared on the demand of the delegation of any one State—

Mr. McDUFFIE rose, and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: If I could agree with the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) that this is a proposition of inconsiderable importance, I certainly should not ask the committee to bestow any portion of its attention upon any remarks of mine. It is true, that the proposition immediately under consideration, is apparently of but little moment; but when we advert to the principles involved in it, and the consequences which may flow from it, I consider it a subject of very great importance. We have been correctly told by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. MOLLANE,) that this question derives its importance, principally from the consideration, that our decision will constitute a precedent for future times; and we are distinctly called upon to adopt the proposition now, not in reference to existing circumstances—not with a view to obviate any anticipated disturbances in the gallery during the approaching election—but for the disinterested purpose of providing a precedent, for the security of those who are to come after us. A little consideration, I think, will satisfy the committee, that the strongest objection to this measure grows out of the fact, that it will be regarded as a precedent. If, indeed, it be a matter of small importance; if we have no cause to apprehend immediate danger; if no fears are entertained that our proceedings will be disturbed or overawed by any injudicious exhibition of excitement or violence, on the part of those who may behold them from the galleries, why should we adopt the proposition? Whence this extraordinary providence for the security of our successors? Why should we thus gratuitously provide for dangers that may never occur? Will not those who shall occupy our places in future time, be capable of providing for the tranquillity and safety of their own deliberations? If in any future emergency there should be indications that our successors will not be permitted to exercise the most unbiased freedom of deliberation, in performing the important function of electing a President, will the precedent we are called upon to establish be necessary to enable them to guard against the danger? Will they not have the same power then, that we have now? But let us look at the other side of the question. What will be the effect of the adoption of this rule? It is one of those propositions which can only be correctly appreciated, by taking into consideration principles which may seem to be remotely and almost imperceptibly connected with it. What, then, are those principles? Sir, we can be at no loss for an answer to this question. The honorable member from Delaware, with that candor and independence which always characterize his deportment here, comes out boldly and manfully, with a distinct avowal of the principles upon which he rests the defence of the proposition to clear the galleries. We are told by that gentleman, that the people have no right to inspect our conduct here, in regard to this great subject, the election of a President of the United States; that we owe them no responsibility for our conduct in the discharge of that duty, and that they have no right to—

[Mr. McLANE here rose, by leave, to explain. If, said he, I understand the gentleman as referring to any remark made by me, he has certainly misapprehended my argument. I disclaim any intention of withholding from the people of the United States a knowledge of our proceedings here. The people have a right to know, and they shall know them. The argument for which I contended was this: That the immediate constituents of a member of Congress have no right to instruct him in relation to his vote in the election of a President: that he is wholly independent of his constituents in giving that vote, further than the responsibility which a high-minded and conscientious man feels in discharging a solemn duty devolved upon him, and his ultimate responsibility. I freely admitted, that the will of a majority of the people of the United States was entitled to great respect, not to be easily put by, but not of imperative authority, on this question.]

Mr. McD. resumed. I gave way, with great pleasure, to allow the gentleman from Delaware an opportunity of explaining; but I do not perceive that his explanation has materially varied the doctrines I have ascribed to him. It is certain, however, that I have not misrepresented the argument used by that gentleman yesterday, for I have before me his very words, taken down as he uttered them, to which I now call the attention of the committee. "We are called upon," said he, "to act here, in voting for a President, not as the representatives of the people." "We are not responsible to the people," and he asked, "Who has a right to come here, and superintend or inspect our proceedings?" These are the precise words used by the gentleman from Delaware; and, construe them as he may, they convey doctrines against which I feel bound to enter my protest. This rule, supported by these arguments, involves the idea that, in the election of a Chief Magistrate of the nation, we act here wholly independent of the people, and are under no obligation to regard their will, however solemnly expressed and certainly ascertained. What would be the impression carried down to future times, by the adoption of this rule, under the existing circumstances? If the question had been taken without argument, and the rule adopted, various opinions would be hereafter entertained as to its principle and its objects. It might be regarded as a mere matter of police. But, after what has occurred, if it were now to be adopted without some protest against the principles upon which it has been vindicated, what would be the consequence? It would become a precedent for times less pure, perhaps, than the present, and would be expounded by the argument of the gentleman from Delaware. We should thus contribute to consecrate principles, which I am sure this body would never intentionally sanction. Are we not bound, therefore, by the highest considerations, not only to reject the rule, but to set the seal of our solemn reprobation upon the arguments by which we have been urged to adopt it?

But, let us for a moment inquire into the pernicious uses to which this rule may be applied, as a precedent; the only view in which its advocates regard it as of any importance. Whatever confidence I may have in the purity of the present House of Representatives, I cannot close my eyes upon the probability that its members will not always be elevated above the reach of corruption. Suppose, then, that some future House of Representatives should resolve to elect a President from corrupt motives, such as would certainly expose them to the execrations of an indignant people: How would they proceed? Their first step would be to close the galleries, and exclude the public eye from an immediate view of their proceedings. But would they stop here? No, sir; they would have it in their power to cover their conduct with a veil of impenetrable and eternal mystery, by laying upon the House an injunction of secrecy. Nor would the temptation to adopt such a measure, be greater than the facility of its adoption. By the rules reported, the House acts by States on all questions incidental to the election. There are six or seven States represented here, upon an average, by little more than a member each, and thirty or forty members, representing a majority of States, could, by co-operation, decide any question. And thus would you place it in the power of a small and corrupt minority, to screen their conduct forever from the view of those to whom they are responsible. If, as we have been told, we are to establish a precedent for times less pure than the present, let us not put an instrument into the hands of the unprincipled and ambitious, by which they can most effectually consummate their corrupt and nefarious purposes.

Let me now solicit the serious attention of the committee, to the extraordinary doctrine avowed by the gentleman from Delaware. Are we, indeed, independent of the people of the United States, in the exercise of the high trust of electing a President? Do we cease to be their representatives, when we resolve ourselves into an electoral college, to perform that function? Are we to make a selection without reference to their will, however solemnly and constitutionally expressed? Are we to assume the character of independent judges, acting for ourselves, and not for the people? I will attempt to establish the negative of these questions. There are many of our public men, who stand high in the estimation of the country, and who have made a distinguished figure in the service of the republic, who maintain that, even in our legislative capacity, we are bound to yield implicit obedience to the known will of our constituents, however ascertained. A signal instance of the practical recognition of this principle, was exhibited some six or eight years ago, in relation to the celebrated compensation law. That measure, by which the members of Congress provided for the increase of their own pay, produced a degree of popular excitement and dissatisfaction, which no question, of the same apparent magnitude, had ever produced before. And what was the consequence? The same Congress, at the very next session, almost before the members were warm in their seats, took steps to repeal the obnoxious law; and a majority of those who voted for its repeal, avowedly did so, against their own deliberate convictions, because it was the known wish of their constituents. But, sir, there is a plain and striking distinction between the relation we bear to our constituents in discharging the ordinary functions of legislation, and that which we bear to them, in performing the extraordinary electoral function of choosing a President.

My own opinion always has been, (and I should be unworthy the seat I occupy, if, entertaining that opinion, I were now to conceal or suppress it,) that, in matters of general legislation, the representative is not absolutely bound by the will of his constituents, because he is bound by the still higher and paramount obligation of the constitution itself. By that instrument, "all legislative power is vested in Congress." Now, what is legislative power? What does the term "legislation" necessarily involve? Inquiry, investigation, argument, deliberation, are its essential elements. The delegation, therefore, of the power to legislate, is, from the very nature of the function, the delegation of a discretionary power. If we are sent here to inquire, to investigate, to argue, and to deliberate; the laws we pass should, of course, be the result of these mental operations. But what is the nature of the trust which we are about to perform with closed doors, under the idea that we are under no responsibility at all to the people, for the manner in which we may discharge it? Is it a power which, like that of legislation, the constitution supposes the people to be incapable of performing? Precisely the reverse, sir. The Constitution of the United States, both in theory and practice, distinctly involves the idea, that the people of the United States are not capable of making laws, but that they are capable of making a President. That constitution provides that the President shall be elected, if possible, by the people. The primary effort to make a choice is made by the people. This, then, is obviously the favorite mode of the constitution, for the election of the President. As, therefore, the constitution assumes that the people are capable of making this election, and prescribes the mode in which their will shall be expressed; their preference, whatever it may be, and to the extent at least that it is indicated by the electoral vote, reaches us through the regular channel ordained by the constitution,—and is not, as must generally be the case with instructions on matters of legislation, the mere ebullition of popular meetings, roused into action by some temporary excitement. So that the will of the people, on this subject, comes to us, consecrated and enforced by the constitution itself. What, then, is the argument of the advocates of the proposed rule? That we are bound by instructions on matters of legislation, which the constitution supposes the people to be incapable of performing; and yet, in the performance of an act, which the constitution supposes, and justly supposes, the people to be more capable, because more worthy of performing, than ourselves, and which devolves upon us by an unavoidable contingency only, we are under no obligation to regard their opinion, nor subject to any responsibility for the manner in which we treat it!

Never was there a more paradoxical argument advanced, in a grave deliberation. What does it amount to? Neither more nor less, than that the people know how to make laws better than we do; and that we are more worthy of the trust of making a President, than the people. This is palpably inverting the principles of the constitution. Upon what principle is it, that the people of the United States have retained in their own hands the power of electing a President, and have not retained a single vestige of the power of legislation, that acts of legislation cannot, in the nature of things, be performed by a multitude of people, dispersed over a vast territory, like that of the United States. If every citizen were a statesman, still would they be incapable of legislation; because they could not have those preliminary consultations, and that mutual interchange of ideas, which must necessarily precede every intelligent act of general legislation. They have, therefore, delegated that power entirely and exclusively to Congress. But have they the same obstacles to surmount, in electing a President? Are any preliminary consultations and interchanges of ideas, necessary to enable them to perform that act? On the contrary, every citizen gives his suffrage with more coolness, deliberation, and wisdom, in the ballot-box of his own vicinity, than he would if all the people of the United States were collected together. The people, therefore, have retained the power of electing the President, under the idea that they are a safer depository of that power, than any which human wisdom could possibly devise. This, sir, is the principle of the constitution; and it is the principle of eternal truth. All experience has sanctified and confirmed it. The history of every people capable of freedom, demonstrates, that, in selecting officers, even of the highest grade, they are fully competent to form a correct judgment of the peculiar qualifications demanded by any emergency, or required for any office. Look into the history of those republics that have gone before us. Where do you find, illustrating either the civil or military departments of any nation, statesmen or generals of more elevated characters and splendid endowments, than those that were elected, even by the wild democracy of Athens, or the conflicting compound of aristocracy and democracy, that swayed the destinies of Rome? All the distinguished patriots and statesmen, who reflected so much glory upon those ages, and left such noble examples to reanimate the alumbering genius of succeeding generations, were elevated to office by the choice of the people. Sir, if there be any function which, in the organic operations of civil society, the people are peculiarly qualified to perform, it is, by a sort of instinctive perception, which seems almost to rise above reason, the selection of men best calculated to represent them in important political stations. If public men are distinguished by the ascendancy of their talents, the elevation of their characters, or by disinterested devotion to their country, my life upon it, these exalted qualities will neither escape the attention of the people, nor fail to make the appropriate, corresponding impression. They have no selfish purposes, no ambitious aspirations, no secret and sinister designs, to prevent or pervert the free and impartial exercise of their judgments. It is, in the nature of things, impossible that they should have. All their feelings are essentially patriotic. They rejoice only in the glory and prosperity of the republic, and are proud of the opportunity of elevating to power, those who are best qualified to promote these great ends. Sir, the glory and prosperity of the country is their glory and prosperity; and what other possible object can they have, in electing a President? After all, the quality most essential in the election of that great officer, wielding, as he does, the vast patronage of a great and growing country, is an honest purpose. This you will always find with the people; but man is not man, if you always find it anywhere else.

But, sir, there is another ground which distinguishes the election of a President by this House, from an act of legislation; and shows that the obligation which the popular will imposes upon the representative, should be much stronger in the former case than in the latter. In the ordinary case of legislation, we are, in most instances, called upon to act upon emergencies, of sudden and unexpected occurrence. The current of events is in a perpetual fluctuation; circumstances are continually presenting themselves in new combinations, which no one could anticipate, and which must, nevertheless, constitute the basis of legislation. For example, before we came here, none of us knew that we should be called upon to give a vote respecting the Cumberland Road, the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, or the Suppression of Piracy. Topics like these are continually springing up, which we must decide, before they have even been the subject of deliberation among the people. But what is the nature of that question, which we shall be called upon to decide on Wednesday next? And what are the circumstances under which we shall decide it? It is a question which has been distinctly presented to the people, for consideration, by the constitution; and has been, for the last four years, fully and freely discussed before the people, with an immediate view to the exercise of the highest power, and most sacred privilege, they possess—the actual choice of the man who is to preside over their destinies. It is a question, therefore, which, from the very mode of its recurrence, must always be presented to us, after it has undergone the deliberate examination, and, to a certain extent, the decision of the people.

But there is another view of the constitution on this subject, which leads us still more clearly to the conclusion, that, in the selection of a

FEBRUARY, 1825.]

Election of President by the House of Representatives.

[H. OF R.]

President from the candidates presented to us by the people, we are bound to regard their will as the rule of our conduct. I will illustrate it, by putting a case, to which I request the particular attention of the gentleman from Delaware, that he may obviate the inference which I shall deduce from it, if he can. Suppose that one of the candidates should receive one hundred and thirty electoral votes; the majority requisite to a choice being one hundred and thirty-one—is that candidate chosen President? You say, assuredly he is not. Why is he not chosen? Because he has not conclusive evidence that a majority of the people of the United States prefer him to any other candidate. Even the largest plurality, short of a majority, does not complete the election. For what purpose, then, is it sent here? That we may elect a man who unites only a small minority of the people of the United States in his favor? This would be absurd. The reason why the election devolves upon us, demonstrates the object for which it is sent here. It devolves upon us, simply because the constitution will not place the sceptre of power in the hands of any man who is not preferred to any other, by a majority of the people; and, therefore, I infer, as a necessary consequence, that the three highest candidates are sent to us, in order that we may select the one who is preferred by a majority of the people. The doctrine of the gentleman from Delaware, therefore, is in direct violation of the very principle of the constitution, which imposes upon us the duty of electing a President.

There is yet another reason which operates with great force on my mind, in favor of considering the members of this House the mere organs of the popular will, on this question. It is this. If, in the discharge of our legislative duty, we pass a law which is unwise, and in its operation injurious to the country—the remedy is easy and obvious. The people raise their voices against it; they discard the offending representatives, and the obnoxious law is repealed. But if it should happen on this, or any future occasion, that this House should elect a President from selfish and corrupt motives, where is the remedy? There can be none. The deed is done. It is irreclaimable. Even the perpetrators may repent, in sackcloth and ashes, but there is no power that can do away the iniquity. It is evident, therefore, that if we do not recognize the right of the people to control our votes by instructions, we act wholly without responsibility. It is in vain that they have the right to dismiss the unfaithful representatives from their service. Though the example might operate as a terror to future transgressors, yet the work of corruption would still remain, and the administration, though detested and execrated by an indignant people, would maintain its odious and distracted rule, during the whole constitutional period. The very circumstance that the act is in its nature irrevocable, makes the denial of the right of instruction, equivalent to an absolute denial of all responsibility whatever, on the part of the representative.

There is another view of the subject, involving considerations of great delicacy, to which I feel bound, by a sense of duty, to call the attention of the committee. What, sir, is the peculiar nature of the power we are about to exercise, as it respects our own honor and reputation? When I am called upon to give my opinion upon any measure of general policy, or to co-operate in the passage of a law, in which my constituents and myself are equally interested; if I discharge that duty according to my own best ability and judgment, though my conduct should expose me to disapprobation and censure, yet I can elevate my head, not only with a consciousness of my own purity, but with the still prouder consciousness that no man suspects me of dishonor. But what must be the feelings of every high-minded and honorable man, when called upon to perform that duty which will soon (and, I trust in God, for the last time) devolve upon this House? Though his heart might be as pure as the principles of our holy religion, and his conduct as disinterested as patriotism itself, yet, should he act in opposition to the will of his constituents, to what ungenerous imputations must he not unavoidably subject himself? Acting, as he does, in the midst of temptations, which even the most virtuous find it more easy to avoid than to resist, how many will be ready to point at him the finger of scorn, exclaiming, as he passes, "There goes the man who abandoned his constituents, and sold his country!" In vain does his conscience acquit him; in vain does he seek for consolation in the consciousness of his own integrity. To a mind of nice sensibility, there is something both mortifying and degrading in the idea of being the object, even of unmerited suspicion. When called upon to act, under such embarrassing circumstances, should we not, therefore, anxiously adopt, for the regulation of our conduct, a sound and steady principle, upon which our honor may securely repose, free from the breath of suspicion? If we take the will of our constituents as our guide, we shall come to the discharge of the important trust in question, with our powers of attorney in our pockets, and our principles inscribed on our foreheads. No speculations will be then indulged, as to the motives of our preference; and we shall act under the cheering and consolatory conviction, that even malignity cannot insinuate that any secret hope, or latent expectation of reward, has induced us to disregard the will, and sacrifice the interests, of our constituents. Sir, I do solemnly declare, in the presence of my God, that if the election of a President were a duty of frequent recurrence, and I were called upon to discharge it upon principles, or under circumstances, that would expose me to such imputations, I would resign my seat, and abandon public life forever, rather than put it in the power of malice to assail my reputation, by charges so plausible.

I will call the attention of the gentleman from Delaware to a view of this question, which I request him to consider, as (what I know him to be) a judicious, a practical statesman. We have thus far looked at the theory and philosophy of the constitution; let us now advert, for a moment, to the practical operation of the Government.

The gentleman has told us, that we should select the man whom our own judgment—"our independent judgment," shall indicate, as best qualified to fill the Presidential office, without respect to the opinions or wishes of the people. Sir, the first qualification of the Chief Magistrate of a Republic, is the confidence of the people; and no man, who has not that confidence, can be either entitled or qualified to exercise the powers that belong to that exalted station. Suppose we were perfectly certain that the man whom our independent judgment would select, as best qualified, would be opposed by the deliberate will of four-fifths of the people. Would we have a right to elect him? "Oh, yes," says the gentleman, "the constitution gives us the right." I know we have the physical, and, if you will, the constitutional power; but that is not the question. Have we the moral right? Is it consistent with our duty, as representatives of the people? Gentlemen may talk as much as they please about our prerogative, as "independent judges," and utter specious and imposing dissertations upon the rights of conscience; but, if we elect a President in direct contradiction to the known will of the people, what will be the inevitable consequence? You clothe him with the emblems of power, without the substance; you impose upon him the highest of all responsibilities, without the power of fulfilling the obligations growing out of that responsibility. In a word, sir, you put the sceptre into his hand, and, in the very act of placing it there, you paralyze the arm that is to wield it.

Let us look a little more minutely into the nature and operation of public opinion, as connected with this subject.

If the people of the United States had never been called upon to examine this question, and express their will in relation to it; if it were a principle of the constitution that the Chief Magistrate of the Republic should be elevated by lot; and if chance were to cast the office upon a man who was not their choice, and who had not their confidence; I believe they would patiently acquiesce, although their will should be defeated. But, when the constitution has made it their right and their duty to examine the question, and express their will upon it; and when they see that will defeated by human agency, the agency, too, of their own representatives; is it in the nature of things that they should not feel deeply indignant at the authors of so glaring an outrage upon their most sacred rights? Is it to be expected that they would calmly and quietly submit, when their constitutional will has been contemned by their representatives? Are they, indeed, the mere stocks and stones, which such insensibility would imply? Sir, I sincerely hope, as I confidently believe, that they are not. It would be a fearful omen if they were. It would go far to prove, what the arguments of the gentleman from Delaware seem to imply, that they are incapable of exercising this high attribute of self-government. But the supposition is a libel upon the people. If you were to elect a President, upon the principles and under the circumstances I have supposed; you would elevate him only to be a more conspicuous object of public reprobation; a miserable effigy of power; a common target, at which a high-minded people would level their just indignation. Sir, a lofty and generous ambition would disdain to accept power under such circumstances.

I presume I shall not expose myself to the imputation of flattering the people of the United States, (and God knows I have never been a flatterer, either of the people or their rulers,) when I ascribe to them as much virtue and intelligence, as has ever fallen to the lot of any people on earth. Nor shall I be considered as advancing an extraordinary proposition, when I affirm, that our Government is constructed, and ought to be administered, with as much regard to the will of the people, as that of Great Britain—or, to put a clearer case, that of France in the days of the Emperor Napoleon. Yet, in neither of these Governments were the principles of the gentleman from Delaware ever carried into effect. They never were carried into practical operation by any civilized Government, holding jurisdiction over an intelligent population, nor, until the nature of man is changed, will they ever be. As respects Great Britain, where time and experience have adjusted the operation of the political system, certain principles, recognizing the controlling influence of popular opinion, have been so long settled by the practice of the Executive Government, that they are now considered fundamental. No administration ever thinks of retaining power, with a majority of the people against them. How often have we seen the King, in obedience to the voice of the nation, discard from his service ministers in whom he still reposed the most undiminished confidence, and select others, not in conformity with the dictates of his own "independent judgment," but in compliance with the will of the people. Their confidence, and not his, is the point upon which the existence of an administration depends. Sir, there never has been a minister in England, not excepting the late Lord Castlereagh, who would have nerve enough to take the seals of office upon the principles maintained by the gentleman from Delaware. If, then, in a country where the authority of the Executive Government, in addition to its mighty patronage, is invested with the sanctity which naturally results from its hereditary character, it is practically demonstrated by the experience of a century, that no administration can maintain itself against the will of the nation—how desperate would be the experiment of electing a President against the popular will, in this country, where the people are more generally intelligent, the Government more popular in its organization, and the Executive Department destitute of the adventitious influence which belongs to an hereditary monarchy! Even Bonaparte himself, when supported by two hundred thousand bayonets, and wielding the whole military power of France, was compelled at all times to acknowledge the supremacy of the national will. Such was his own declaration, after he had fallen from power, when viewing the retrospect of his eventful life, with the eye rather of a philosopher than a monarch. If this mighty sovereign was compelled to admit the omnipotence of public opinion, what a wretched spectacle of debility and distraction should we have, if it should be disregarded in the election of a Republican President! Sir, a President elected upon such principles, would be an object rather to be despised, than dreaded; for he would soon find, that he had very little power, either for good or for evil. I will now say a few words in answer to an imposing, but, in my opinion, deceptive argument, urged by the gentleman from Delaware. He asks—If we are bound to obey the will of our constituents, how can we ever make an election, since that obligation would constrain the friends of each candidate to adhere to him throughout the contest? Now, there may be many difficulties connected with a doctrine or a duty, which neither destroys the truth of the one, nor absolves from the obligation of the other. If the mere existence of such difficulties would absolve us from any duty, there would be an end to the obligation of almost every duty. I see a very easy and obvious mode of surmounting the difficulty suggested by the gentleman; but, before I state it, I will take the liberty of asking him how he can get over the very same difficulty, upon his own principles? The principle of preference, whatever it is, that induces a member here to vote for a particular candidate, imposes upon him a moral obligation to vote for that candidate. I say we should vote in conformity with the will of our constituents. The gentleman says we should vote in conformity with the dictates of conscience. There is my principle, and here is his. They are of equal obligation. Is it not evident, therefore, that both would equally produce the difficulty under consideration? If we adhere, without departure, to the candidate selected upon either principle, there can be no election. But, sir, the difficulty is imaginary. The plain and practical rule is, to endeavor, if possible, to carry into effect the will of our constituents. We must make this effort honestly, without any skulking behind pretence, or forms. If it be found that their favorite cannot prevail; that the candidate who received their electoral vote unites but a small minority of the people of the United States in his favor, and that the two others are more prominent; we must then choose between them, still conforming to the will of our constituents, in making that choice, if their will be known to us. If we cannot succeed in electing their first choice, we should endeavor to elect the person next in their confidence. By this process, the final control will be found, where it ought to be, in the general voice of the people of the United States.

I find myself called upon, to do what? Not to elect a President, but to complete an election which the people have left in an inchoate state, merely because they cannot meet together to complete it themselves. The framers of the constitution supposed that the popular branch of Congress would be the best means of concentrating the national will, and thereby consummating the work commenced by the people. The principles in which it originated, are not changed by the accidental circumstances which have cast upon us the duty of adding the finishing stroke to it. All agree that it is a misfortune that a majority of the people have not united in favor of one man; and that it was the very end of the constitution, the "consummation most devoutly to be wished," that such majority should have been obtained in the first instance. Why, then, is it not equally desirable now? What is it that has suddenly produced this magical change in the principles which regulate this great national operation, of choosing a President? Sir, these principles are eternal, and circumstances do not affect them. If, as it must be admitted, it was the primary object of the constitution to elevate to the Executive chair, the man who should be the choice of a majority of the people, that does not cease to be the object of the constitution when the election devolves upon this House. The election of a President must be regarded as a continued operation, carried on upon the same principles throughout. It would be a miserable and incongruous piece of patchwork, to commence with one set of principles, and end with another.

But, says the gentleman from Delaware, the power we exercise in electing a President is not conferred upon us by the people, but by the constitution. Were I to take this proposition simply in the terms in which he has expressed it, I should regard it as either absurd, or unintelligible. But I know the gentleman's meaning, and will not affect to misunderstand him. His proposition is, that the election does not devolve upon this House by any act of the people, expressive of their wish that it should come here, but by a mere contingency, for which, as it must unavoidably occur sometimes, the constitution has made provision. But how does this strengthen the gentleman's argument? Are we to be told that, because it is the "necessity and not the will" of the people, that

"consents" to our having any thing to do with this question; we are, therefore, absolved from all responsibility? The very reverse should be the inference.

Mr. MANGUM, of North Carolina, then rose, and said, that he felt great repugnance to obtrude his remarks upon the notice of the House at any time—a repugnance which, upon this occasion, was certainly not diminished by the state of indisposition in which he found himself. That he felt it his duty to make a few remarks in reply to those he had just heard—not so much with the view of affording either interest or instruction to the House, as with the view of publicly avowing those principles which he deemed sound, and by which he had determined that his conduct on the approaching occasion should be regulated.

The question, said Mr. M., immediately under consideration, is intrinsically of but slight and trivial import, but it derives much consequence from other and more important questions that have been drawn into discussion. What, asked Mr. M., is the nature of the question before the House? It is one exclusively of police. But, from the manner in which it had been treated, he should have inferred, but for the gentleman's disclaimer, that his object was not so much to discuss this question, as to issue a sort of manifesto to the people of the United States, to justify those who yield to a strong current, and to damn those who resist it. It is a question not of open galleries or closed galleries. Gentlemen had, therefore, been engaged in combating shadows; and much of what had been said, had been addressed to a motion which no one had made.

The question, as he understood it, was simply this:—Whether the galleries should be thrown open, subject to be closed at the motion of the Speaker, or, whether they should be thrown open, subject to be closed at the request of the delegation from any one State. For his own part, he should have thought that the latter arrangement would have been conceded as a matter of courtesy, to those gentlemen who stand singly and unsustained by colleagues, as representatives from the weaker States. For himself, he had not the remotest idea that those galleries, let them be occupied by whom they might, were about to overawe the House, or exert any improper influence upon it whatever. His reliance was placed upon the deep moral feeling that pervades this nation. On this he relied to sustain gentlemen in the discharge of their duty; and on this he relied more than on all the bayonets and cannon that military despotism ever wielded.

This is a mere question of order. The admission of strangers was an act of courtesy, granted, as such acts are always understood to be, upon an implied obligation of good behavior. It was not to be presumed beforehand, that those who were admitted, would violate the laws of decorum; but if they did, there could be no doubt that the Speaker was competent to exclude them: and as little doubt that he would do it at the suggestion of the delegation from any one State, that a free exercise of their rights required their exclusion.

He would again repeat, that he felt no fears from any attempt to overawe the House; and still less had he fears of the intriguers who had been spoken of, whether posted in the galleries, or operating in this hall. His position was peculiar; it was that of an armed neutrality, he had but little to hope, and nothing to fear.

He knew that he stood upon a narrow isthmus, lashed upon either side by the most angry surges, from which neither numbers nor denunciations should be able to drive him. Calling to his aid the little lights of his understanding, and with a heart bent upon the best interests of his country, he should firmly and fearlessly endeavor to perform his duty.

He should not, however, have troubled the House at this time with a single remark, but for the principles he had heard advanced; and against which he felt it his duty to enter his solemn protest. He had always listened to the gentleman from South Carolina with great pleasure, and he must confess that he had heard him on this occasion with the more pleasure, because he thought he had perceived that his talent, his ingenuity, and his fertility of resource, had proved insufficient to sustain him under the weight of the cause he advocated. Whom, asked Mr. M., are we bound to obey, in giving our votes on the approaching occasion? We, I mean, who are in the minority? If I understand the gentleman, we are bound to obey the will of those whose candidate shall have the highest number of votes. I would be glad to know whether we are bound to do this by a moral obligation, or only by reason of the philosophy of the constitution, to which the gentleman alluded. If by a moral obligation, that obligation addresses itself to every honest mind with the force of a perfect obligation; it must be obeyed, and why then has the constitution been so silly as to allow us a choice between three candidates, when we are morally, and of course perfectly bound to elect the candidate who has the largest number of votes in the electoral colleges?

[Here Mr. M. yielded the floor to Mr. McDURRIS, who wished to explain. He had not said that gentlemen were bound to elect the candidate who had the highest number of votes: on the contrary, he had said distinctly, that a plurality of votes did not make an election.]

Mr. M. resumed. He was then to understand the gentleman, that we are not constitutionally, but only morally bound; or, in other words, that we have no right to disregard the will of the people, as expressed in a plurality of votes by the electoral colleges. But, if so, was not the argument the same?—the conclusion the same? Was not that obligation as binding, as an obligation emanating immediately from the constitution? Must not every honest man regard it in that light? And must not every man who was not base enough to barter away his birthright for a mess of pottage—to sell himself for loaves and fishes—feel its binding power? If the obligation was a moral one, it was a perfect one, and as such, commanded perfect obedience. He must, therefore, most emphatically repeat, that it was extreme folly, if not worse, in the framers of the constitution, to give to this House the power of selection between three candidates, when, at the same time, the hands of members are tied up from the exercise of that power by the strongest obligations. The constitution, then, holds out to us bread, and gives us a stone.

Election of President by the House of Representatives.

[H. OF R.]

But this never was the design of the framers of the constitution. And the very fact that they have given us the power to choose, is enough to prove that the principle, as stated, does not furnish the rule by which we are to be governed.

If, then, we are not bound by the gentleman's moral obligation, to elect that candidate who happens to have a plurality of votes in the electoral colleges, what is the rule by which we are to be governed? Is it by the vote of our respective States? That cannot be the rule: for the constitution has not prescribed any uniform mode for the election of electors, but has left that power in the Legislatures of the States. And it may happen in those States in which they elect electors by districts, that there may be a tie; that the votes for two contending candidates may be equal. How will gentlemen extricate themselves from this dilemma—the dilemma of a tie? Will they resort to their principle? It will fail them—it is not principle—it is, in my humble judgment, absurdity. The gentleman from South Carolina has asked the gentleman from Delaware, with a sort of triumph, to answer the case which he put, to wit: that if 130 votes should be given for one candidate, falling one vote short of the number required for an election, whether that gentleman would dare to resist such a majority? I would answer, that great respect is due to the opinions of the people. That it would be great impolicy, in ordinary cases, to resist so full an expression of the public will. But reasons might exist, which would render it the imperious duty of the representative, as an honest man, to resist it. There is no principle concerned, as, I trust, I have shown. It is mere matter of expediency. But let me suppose a case, predicated upon the alleged principle, that we are bound to give our votes in accordance with the votes of our respective States, and ask the gentleman to answer it. There are twenty-four States and three candidates for the Presidency. Suppose eight States should vote for each candidate; if we are bound to vote as our respective States do, no election can be made. And what will be the result? It is obvious. By adhering to the principle, of which the gentleman speaks, you postpone three candidates, upon whom the people of the United States had fixed their eyes, as fit persons for the Chief Magistracy, and each of whom had received the votes of one-third of the people of the United States for that office. You set aside all these, and let the Vice President into that office: a man who had not received a single vote in the United States for the Presidency. What will the people's men say to this doctrine? and yet it is principle, sacred principle, according to the views of some gentlemen. But, says the gentleman, we are first to try to elect the people's man, and if we cannot effect that object, then, and then only, take up some other candidate. We must yield to the necessity of the case. Mark me, it is moral principle, says the gentleman, by which we are bound. A principle is surely a very bad one, which will not wear longer than one day, and which must be abandoned as soon as it is put into practice. But we must yield to the necessity of the case! I had thought that that which yields to any necessity whatever was not moral principle, for moral obligation admits of no compromise. It is said that, if on trial we cannot succeed in electing a President, to prevent the Vice President's coming into that office, we must give way. But here are eight States in favor of each candidate—who is to give way first? If I give way first, may not my constituents reproach me with an abandonment of principle? If the gentleman gives way first, does he not abandon principle? Sir, such a principle as must be abandoned on one day's trial, is not a principle which I will ever recognize.

If, then, sir, we are under no moral obligation to vote for the candidate who has the highest number of votes, nor to obey the votes of our respective States; what, I again ask, is to be the rule which must govern us? Sir, it appears to me that the whole fallacy, which pervades the arguments of the gentleman whose views I am opposing, consists in this—they are comparing the votes of the people, taken per capita, with the votes of twenty-four distinct and independent sovereigns. They are comparing things which have no points of resemblance, nor have they any assignable relation to each other. The States, as sovereigns, are all equal. The people, who make up those sovereignties, numerically considered, are totally unequal, and, in that respect, bear towards each other various and diversified proportions. Are we then to be bound by the votes of our respective districts? (This is the doctrine of the people's men, and all are people's men nowadays, from the much reprobated caucus men, down to the humblest political professors.) Here, I trust, I may be permitted to say, that I shall, for once in my life, at least, in the honest discharge of my duties, fall in with the doctrines of the people's men—I expect to represent the plurality of my district.

But are we bound by the votes of our districts? I mean, in point of principle? Did the framers of the constitution design that we should be so bound? If they did, wherefore does not the constitution prescribe a uniform mode of electing representatives by districts? And yet the power of prescribing the mode, is left with the legislatures of the respective States. Some States elect their representatives by general ticket, as does Georgia, for example. How will gentlemen ascertain the votes of their districts, under the general ticket system? How will gentlemen extricate themselves from this dilemma? Will they do it by resorting to the statement, that the State, in that case, is each member's district? If so, then each member is bound to represent the vote of his State. This brings the question back to the ground on which I have already considered it; and the doctrine is subject to all the objections to which I have already adverted. It is true, that the gentleman from South Carolina cannot be mistaken as to the vote of the people: for in that State they elect members by districts. Should he recognize the principle of perfect obedience to the voice of his district, then should also every other member. If this is principle, what would be the consequence of adherence to it, in the most of cases—indeed, in the actual posture of affairs at present? It is plain—no President could be made, and the Vice President would come in. If it is principle, we are bound to adhere, but if we may give way, and are not bound to adhere, then it should no longer be dignified with the name of principle, but it is a mere question of expediency. Again, if we are not bound by the votes of our districts, (as is clearly the case in some of the States, for the simple reason, that they have no districts,) but are bound by the votes of our respective States, then this dilemma might arise: A member might be obliged to vote for a candidate, who was opposed by every man in his district. Here he gives up the wishes of all his constituents, the only people upon earth to whom he is politically responsible, and for what? To fall in with the vote of the State—and by adhering to that vote, no President is elected and the Vice President comes in, after all these fearless and patriotic sacrifices.

Again: If our States were all of equal size, that is, equal in point of population, and the people fail to make an election in the electoral colleges, it is clear that no election could ever be made by the House of Representatives, should the members recognize as correct, and adhere to the principle, that they are bound to vote in accordance with the votes of their respective States. In the present unequal size of the States, under any ordinary circumstances of combination, the operation of that principle would defeat an election nine times out of ten; and in no solitary case can an election be made in the House of Representatives by adhering to the principle, except by enforcing the odious doctrine, that the minority shall prevail over the majority—that is, by making thirteen or more of the smaller States, that had voted for one candidate in the electoral colleges, without effect, come into the House and do the same, with complete effect. What they were unable to do, by reason of inequality of population, they are made to effect by the equality of their sovereignty. Sir, if these are people's principles, I, for one, beg to be delivered from them.

It is said that, in matters of legislation, it is a vexed question, whether the representative is not bound to obey the will of his constituents, and that many great and wise men have held the affirmative. Sir, I would not give a button for the doctrine, either the one way or the other, so far as regards its practical utility. As to the mere theory, I concede it to gentlemen—they may delight themselves with whatever theories they please, whether ingeniously or inartificially constructed. But, though the question, as to legislation, may be vexed, gentlemen tell us, that, in the business of electing a President by the House of Representatives, there can be no doubt—the case is a plain one. Sir, I argue directly the reverse. In the business of legislation, the people, in primary assemblies, cannot act—it is constitutionally, it is physically impossible. There is, therefore, a propriety, in a representative Government like ours, that the legislative body should respond to the voice of the people; that, as a reflector, it should give back the true image of the people's wishes. But, in the election of the chief magistrate, the people can act in primary assemblies. Those assemblies present the proper and the best mode in which the election can be made. But the people, having attempted an election in this mode, and having failed of success, the constitution brings the election to this House: this House is the umpire, the judge on whom devolves the settlement of that momentous question, which the people have been unable to settle themselves, for want of greater unanimity.

Sir, I hope I have now succeeded in showing the fallacy of the gentleman's—pardon me—the people's doctrines, of instruction. What, then, is our duty, in the present crisis, and on the approaching occasion? Is it to fall into the ranks of the candidate who may happen to be the strongest? (A very comfortable doctrine, indeed, particularly to those who happen to be in the minority; our understandings and conscience approving, we should like to be wafted with you gentlemen, on the strong currents.) Is it to obey the voice of our States? or, is it to obey the voice of our districts? It is, in my judgment, neither more nor less than this—To do what is right, according to the best dictates of our own understandings, and leave the consequences to God, and to our country.

It has been asked, how can we hold up our heads when we return home, if we have gone against the will of our constituents? Sir, we can hold our heads as erect as an angel. The man who has honestly done, what he understood, after deep and anxious reflection, to be his duty, may meet the eyes of his constituents, aye, the eyes of the world, and neither blench nor quail, though none should smile upon him. It has, also, been said, (and the remark, though it can have none here, may be calculated to have an effect abroad,) that, whenever a man has done deeds of renown, the people delight to honor him, and will, with great certainty, elevate him to the highest offices. Sir, this is a mere truism; everybody here knows that this is true. It is what the people will always do; it is what they have done in a thousand instances; but, sir, it is exactly what, in the present case, they have not done. Else, why does the election come to this House? Sir, a majority of the people have distinctly told you, that not even the most favored candidate is the man of their wishes. Neither is elected, though all may have been honored. It is we who must elect.

[H. OF R.]

We have also been told, that upon grounds of expediency, the sceptre ought not to be placed in the hands of any man who has not a majority of the votes of his countrymen; and that, if we do place it in the hands of such a one, we only place it there to lop off his arm. Sir, this but ill agrees with what is a fundamental principle in the system of the people's men. What, sir! are the intelligent and enlightened people of these States, who are so much flattered in one breath, to be represented in the next as ferocious as tigers? Are they to rise in their wrath, and hurl the full weight of their indignant vengeance at an individual who has done no harm? Who has done no one act to excite their displeasure? Suppose three candidates should come before us with an unequal number of votes, I admit we should very properly feel inclined to elect him "ceteris paribus," who had the largest number, (for I would not willingly deprive gentlemen of the smallest comfort.) But, suppose the candidate who had the smallest number should, in the result, be chosen President, is it maintained that the people of the United States would rise in vengeance against that man? Surely, sir, whatever phials of wrath might be exhausted on the heads of their guilty representatives, the people would pour out none upon the innocent head of a man who had done no one offensive deed, and whose only crime had been to be constitutionally presented for choice, and constitutionally chosen. We have heard, further, and much to my astonishment, that the doctrine of the gentleman from Delaware would not flourish in old England—nay, that it is too strong even for the military despotism of Napoleon. I scorn to flatter any man, and am sure that, on this occasion, I shall be exempt from the imputation of such design, when I say I was an attentive listener to the gentleman from Delaware, and did think, and still think, that sounder doctrines, or doctrines delivered with more pellucid clearness, never fell from the lips of any man, than from those of that distinguished member; and I did consider the demonstration by which they were maintained, precluded reply; and I am happy to find my own opinion bolstered and corroborated by an opinion that comes to me with so much weight and authority.

I have not heard why his doctrines would not flourish in old England; the gentleman from South Carolina did not condescend to favor us with any thing more on that point than mere assertion. As to what was said in regard to the iron reign of Napoleon, and the declarations that he made, it is indeed true, that that despotic ruler professed to be governed by the will of the people, (Bonaparte, it seems, too, was also a "people's man.") But, sir, while he professed this, he was supported by 250,000 bayonets; and, in such circumstances, what was the "people's will?" It was the will of their tyrant.

Here Mr. M., not having concluded his remarks, gave way for a motion for the committee to rise.

MONDAY, February 7.

Election of President by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WHEAT, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the rules (reported by a committee) to be observed by the House in conducting the election of the President.

And, the question being on striking out the last clause of the third rule, which provides that the galleries may be cleared at the request of the delegation of any one State—

Mr. MANGUM said, that, when the committee rose the other day, as he presumed for his personal accommodation, he had well nigh concluded the remarks which it was his intention to submit on this subject. He felt deeply sensible of the polite attention of the committee, and the best return in his power to make for their kindness was to refrain from trespassing again too far on their patience.

This subject having already occupied a disproportionate space of the time of this House, he should not again take up the argument, but only submit a few general observations, which he had designed to offer on the former occasion. He knew full well the immense advantages which gentlemen have when they address themselves not to the understanding and the judgment, but make ardent appeals to the prejudices and passions of the people. The people's rights, and the sovereignty of the people!—the very finest and most popular themes for declamation! He felt the great difficulty of being heard, coolly and dispassionately, at the bar of reason, at the moment when the passions are stimulated into tumult, and worked up to a pitch of frenzy.

In this country, as we have seen from the foundation of the Government, whenever a new party was about to organize itself, or a new faction to spring into existence, its very first breath was breathed in a holy and fervent love for the people; its ardor and its devotion to the public weal, transcended only by the purity and disinterestedness of motives. I confess, sir, that I have lived long enough to distrust these ardors. When I see the frosts of age dissolving under the warm glowings incident to youth, and the patriot of sixty entering the lists with the very flower and chivalry of the land, endeavoring to outstrip them in demonstrations of love and devotion to the people, I begin to look about me; for I fear mischief, or suspect treachery. I need not refer you only to our own history, but the history of other countries, and other ages, discloses the fact, that many of the bloodiest tyrants that ever disgraced humanity, began their career by fawning on the people, and sedulously and assiduously courting their favor.

It has been remarked by the gentleman from South Carolina, that all sovereign power resides in the people, and that every agent in authority must act in obedience to that will. The abstract proposition is evidently true; but the difficulty arises in the application of it to the case in hand. How is the will of the people to be ascertained? Is it to be derived from the county meetings, town meetings, publications, and rumors? Are we to resort to these loose, unsatisfactory, and contrary indications of the public will? Or, shall we resort to the constitutional indication—to that expression which has been made through legitimate organs? If the latter, it is apparent that a large majority have voted against either of the candidates. What, then, is our duty? I would again answer, to select according to the best dictates of our understandings. And yet, says the gentleman, this doctrine is too strong for Revolutionary France, it would have been repudiated under the reign of Napoleon. Mr. M. said it was a little curious to remark the striking coincidence between the early professions of Bonaparte, and those with which we are now daily saluted. He could hope that a coincidence should never be made to exist in this country, in any other respect. For what was the sequel in the case of Napoleon? Though his first love was the love of the people, and though he bowed with the profoundest respect to their will, yet he flattered, he coaxed, and he courted them, until he placed his foot upon their necks, and crushed their liberties with the most frightful military despotism that the world ever saw.

This is the natural order of things in a free Government, to begin a Jacobin and end a tyrant. We are told we must bow to the will of the people. I grant it. But I shall look for the indications of that will to a source which is unerring—to the constitutional indication of it. It is curious to remark how defective this poor, tattered constitution of ours is, according to gentlemen's notions of responsibility. They say we must vote with the people, (what people?) and yet the constitution guarantees to us the mode of voting by ballot, in the exercise of which, the vote of each delegation may be profoundly locked up in their own bosoms, and no human eye, not even the Argus eye of jealousy itself, can detect for whom that delegation voted. There are four States in the Union, represented in this House, each, by one member. Those gentlemen, according to the rules established on a former occasion, and according to the rules reported on this, may hide their secret from all the world, if they choose. They have nothing to do but to make duplicate ballots, and drop one into each box, among twenty-three other votes, and how are their ballots to be known, to be identified? How does this comport with gentlemen's notions! How defective is the constitution according to their views! Instead of requiring members to vote in a manner to prevent the practice of fraud and deceit, that same constitution becomes "particeps criminis," by throwing the mantle over deeds of darkness and crime, by shielding them from exposure to the vengeance of disappointed ambition, or the scorn and hatred of a betrayed country.

There have been some politicians silly enough to imagine that the framers of the constitution looked afar off, and either dreamed or believed that occasions might arise when this provision would be found most salutary, that the safety of the republic might depend upon the ignorance of the tyrant where to direct his blows.

For myself, however, I hope, said Mr. M., that I may be permitted to say, that I hate mystery—I hate all concealments in the discharge of a public duty; and shall be one of the last to shrink from the severest scrutiny into the manner in which I may have discharged it. I would scorn the use of the mantle.

I advert to these considerations with a view of showing with how many difficulties this subject is beset, and how arduous would be the task of framing a theory, according to gentlemen's views, that would harmonize in its practical operations with constitutional provisions on the subject.

Sir, it seems to me that the true conception of the framers of the constitution is this: that the Representatives in this House would come immediately from the people—they are part of the people—presumed to be men of some character, connected with the community from which they emanate by a thousand ties; character, respect, family, children, a common interest, a common destiny. In a word, identified with that community in habits, feelings, sentiments, &c.; and, that when the result, so much to be deprecated, of the Presidential election being cast upon this House, shall happen, that all these ties and considerations form a sufficient guarantee that a wise, honest, and judicious selection will be made. This view, I think, said Mr. M., is conformable with the theory of the constitution.

What are the cotemporaneous expositions of the constitution on this subject? In the work entitled the Federalist—a work written by some of the ablest men who were in the convention, and which is resorted to by the ablest constitutional lawyers, as high and grave authority, I find the following opinion:

FEBRUARY, 1825.]

Election of President by the House of Representatives.

[H. OF R.]

"But as a majority of votes might not always happen to centre in one man, and as it might be unsafe to permit less than a majority to be conclusive, it is provided, that in such case, the House of Representatives shall select out of the candidates, who shall have the five (now changed to "three") highest number of votes, the man who, in their opinions, may be best qualified."

And yet, it is said, that these doctrines would be odious in revolutionary France—they are too strong for the reign of Napoleon.

Such are some of the difficulties into which gentlemen are deluded and bewildered by an overweening attachment to their new-born theories—theories that have sprung into life from a brain highly excited by political contests—theories that are cherished with all the love that the mother bestows on her rickety bantling.

But, sir, if these theories may not be deduced from the letter of the constitution, may they not result from the philosophy of the constitution of which we have heard in this debate? Yes, sir, the philosophy of the constitution! That philosophy which, I fear, is to arm this great Government with that stupendous power which is to sink our State sovereignties into mere corporations—that power which has prostrated some of these barriers that the wise men of both the old parties recognized—that power which is incessantly, most fearfully, and alarmingly increasing. Yes, sir, the philosophy of the constitution! That philosophy which was reserved for the ingenuity and astuteness of modern times to discover; and of which that great and wise man, Patrick Henry—and a wise man he was—in all his awful vaticinations never dreamed of. Yes, sir, it is by courting these sovereign people sedulously and ardently, that all jacobins begin their career.

The people are sovereigns—but they are sovereigns in minority: they never have, nor will they ever come to the crowns, whatever some of their flatterers may do—and yet they have in full enjoyment one of the brightest and most undoubted attributes of sovereignty—the flattery of their courtiers.

I trust I may say, and truly too, that I have as profound respect for the will of the people, fairly expressed, as any man; and would preserve those interests committed to my charge as I would the apple of my eye. I would not look to the shouts of the multitude for the opinions of the people, but I look to their opinion as fairly and constitutionally expressed. To this I respond, to this I am obedient.

I regret that I have detained the committee so long on this subject. As regards the question immediately under discussion, I would not turn upon my heel for a decision of it, either one way or the other.

Mr. J. S. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said, that a sense of duty made it necessary for him to offer to the committee a few remarks; and in doing so, he should but express an entire concurrence in opinion with the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MANGUM,) that a new zeal had infused itself into our deliberations, resulting from the excitement at this moment pervading both this House and the country. He trusted that the fervor of this excitement would not warp the judgment of the committee, or divert it from the duty of calm inquiry, so imperatively enjoined on it. The first question presented to us I take to be this: Is it right to indulge the intense anxiety now felt by the public, in permitting an inspection of the proceedings of this House when constitutionally employed in selecting a Chief Magistrate? The history of that country whose precedents have supplied most of the forms of our deliberations, discloses to us the existence of controversies between the parliament and the people, on questions of giving publicity to the transactions of the former. It was deemed, and accordingly punished, as a breach of privilege, to publish the speeches or votes of members, and that, too, on the ground that those proceedings were matter of which the public had no right to be conversant. At the period of forming our constitution, these demands from the people, and their denial by the parliament of England, had made an appropriate impression in this country. To secure this right beyond the reach of cavil, and to supply the people with this safeguard for the responsibility of their representatives, claimed the attention of the wise framers of our political fabric. To secure this right, it is provided that the people have a just claim to know what Congress is doing, and that a journal of their proceedings shall, from time to time, be published, together with the Yeas and Nays, upon the demand of one-fifth of the members present. The usage of Congress supplies us with the best commentary upon this constitutional text. Its deliberations have been open to public inspection, with the exception of proceedings where high national considerations forbade immediate disclosure, and the precedent of 1801, which I think has been clearly demonstrated to merit but little attention. Is there any thing, then, in the duty now cast upon the House by the happening of the contingency provided for in the constitution, to distinguish it from ordinary acts of legislation, and to demand an unusual measure of safety or precaution. Can gentlemen imagine, for a moment, that our deliberations will be overawed? or, that any intimidation, whatever, will influence members in discharging this high function? It is a suspicion fraught with injustice to ourselves, as well as to the people. Throw over your acts the veil of mystery, and what is the result? All within is pure, and the members are engaged in the fearless fulfilment of the trust reposed in them. Will it be so, sir, without? I apprehend not. Distrust will fill the public mind, and jealousy will fire its passions; and when these overtake us, it will be in vain for us to rely upon the conscious rectitude of our actions, and the dignity of silent deliberation, to shield us from disrespect, or the suspicion of ignoble conduct and unworthy motives. But I understand, from the argument of the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE,) that, in making the selection, we act independently of the people, and, as a necessary deduction, that they have no right to witness it. I can never yield my assent to such a proposition. It has been successfully combated, I think, by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE.) With his opinions in relation to the rights of the people over our ordinary legislation, I must also express my dissent. He informs us that the constitution has vested the legislative powers of the United States in Congress—and asks, "What are the ingredients of legislation? Argument, inquiry, and deliberation." Sir, when the gentleman presented so forcible an argument in another branch of this question, upon the influence of popular will, could he not suppose that this, too, would necessarily enter into our acts of legislation? If tyrants, as he clearly showed, armed with power, are constrained to regard the will of the people, how much more forcibly should that argument apply to national legislation in a Government whose very basis is public sentiment? The will of the people is in this country, most especially, the mainspring of all political institution. This, alone, can with us give impulse to permanent legislation.

I cannot agree with the gentleman from North Carolina, that the wise men who gave form to the constitution, are against me. The journals of that day reveal a singular incident relating to this question, which may seem to array against me a most distinguished authority. When the constitution was in progress, amid the jealousies of its enemies, and the anxieties of its friends, numerous amendments were proposed by the several State conventions. Among these, Virginia sought to ingraft upon it a provision that would secure, at all times, the right to instruct Representatives. In the first Congress that subsequently assembled, an illustrious man, then representing that State, and who has since thrown a lustre over our character in the various acts of his public life, proposed this amendment, with an omission of so much as claimed this right of instruction. I am not prepared to receive this as evidence of his own enlightened view of the subject. The constitution, with all its amendments, is the offspring of a spirit of compromise. This alteration (by his proposition) of the expressed wishes of a convention in whose deliberations he was himself a clear and steady light, owes its birth, in all rational probability, to the same parent. A plain refutation may readily be given, (in my humble judgment,) of all doubts that cluster round this question.

In whose hands is the sovereignty of this Union reposit? The constitution supplies the answer: In those of the people. And what is the legislative power? It is but a seminal principle which fructifies in those enactments, denominated law. Sir, the writers upon jurisprudence inform us, that Law is a rule of action emanating from a sovereign power, commanding what is right, and forbidding what is wrong. If, then, the people who make the constituent body, are admitted to be sovereign, and each representative expresses the sense of his constituents upon every vote he may give, in the passage of any law, do you not obtain a rule of action emanating from the sovereign power of the United States, and filling up the measure of the definition I have just recited?

The gentleman from South Carolina asserts for the people a controlling influence, in performing the duty required of this House, when the contingency presents itself, in which a selection is to be made here of the Chief Magistrate, because the constitution recognizes in the people the power and the capacity to make the election. There is a vice in this argument which I think is but apparent, or which may be easily resolved into our difference in the application of terms. The constitution contemplated an election by the people. But, that it was dangerous to give a power of such magnitude, to less than a majority of the whole who voted. And what is the remedy provided for a failure so to choose? The people are scattered over a vast extent of country; to assemble them together is impossible. The theory of the constitution then requires, as the most practicable mode, if a popular majority cannot be obtained, that a federative majority shall determine, combining with it the popular influence, by requiring a selection from the highest on the people's list. This is not the only security provided by the system, to give effect to public will. Had it designed to make your President a federative officer, the choice, in the second instance, might have been given to the States in their corporate capacities. Not so, sir. The choice is to be made by the House of Representatives, the direct and immediate dependents of the people, but that, in selecting, they shall vote by States. It was always intended that he should be the President of the people, not of the States, nor the creature of this House, and all the securities which the constitution could furnish to assure this end, seem, in my view, to point that way. It is true, they may be inadequate to the purpose, but that it was designed, cannot admit of doubt. This House, in its several State delegations, cannot be considered as the depository of the sovereignty of the States, but as the representatives of the people, not responsible to the States, but to the districts which they severally represent. Would it not then be a departure from all the checks and principles of the constitution, designed to secure the responsibility of public agents, to look upon members here as representing the States, in this contingency, to whom they owe no obligation, and as not representing the people to whom all accountability is secured by the forms of the constitution. If this conclusion be a just derivative from the view taken, what is the pending obligation in making the choice? A sense of political duty will give the immediate reply. The President is designed to be the Chief Magistrate of the nation; the appointing body is chosen by the people, and the public will points to the path of safety when it points to the path of duty.

It is your duty, because you are chosen by those who have the inceptive right of making the election, and this course justifies and responds to the high trust confided. Safety results from it, because the magistrate so appointed reflects the wishes of the whole mass of the people, and will be the faithful guardian of their rights, their honor, and their independence. Elect upon these principles, and you constitute a President who unites public confidence and respect. He is clothed with a shield for your protection at home, and armed with the sword of retributive justice to punish foreign aggression. Choose him upon the other principle, he is the creature of the legislature, and not the servant of the people; dependent upon you, and responsible to you, what security is left for the preservation of our popular system? Can he combine the affections of the people, when his appointment is in pursuance, not of their will, but in manifest contravention of it? You may, indeed, have given him shape and form, and encircled him with the trappings of power and office, but he is not touched with the vital element which alone can give him being. Is he surrounded with the affections of a grateful and confiding people, which makes him the servant "of the people for the people's sake?" No, sir; he is pursued by their fears, and trammelled with their jealousy. The wishes of the nation driven contemptuously before him, while all the calamities of misrule follow in the rear.

Nor does the evil stop here. Whoever the individual may be, he can be but man. Filled with the frailties that belong to his condition, will he not seek to convert his pillow of thorns into a bed of roses, and meliorate his condition by seeking to ensure a reappointment? All the purposes of corruption will be essayed. The creature of this House, deriving being from it, amenable by impeachment to the Senate, who, with him, hold the appointing power of the Government, throughout the extended sphere of patronage, what, in some coming age, may not occur, when corruption, which grows with our years, shall have sapped the foundation on which all our purity rests! The purse of the nation in the hands of this House, may be made to act upon the Senate, and they, in return, to distribute among the representatives or their instruments, all the offices, lucrative or honorable. What is the responsibility of such a President? Not in the impeaching power of the Senate—for this House, in which it must originate, and there, where he is to be tried, are his co-partners in guilt. Sir, to use the language of an eloquent gentleman on this floor, it was contemplated some years past, "to set up a pageant under color of law," in the chair of our Chief Magistrate. He would have been the President of the legislature, not of the people. And does any man believe, for a moment, that such a thing could have administered the Government? He would either have fallen a victim to the popular rage, which such an act would have lifted into tempest, or, had he weight enough to sustain himself, the liberties of his country would have been crushed, under his influence. And yet the gentleman from North Carolina considers such principles as these, jacobinical doctrines.

[Mr. MANGUM here observed, in explanation, that he had never said that these were the doctrines of jacobins. What he had said was this—that all jacobins began their course with very ardent professions of love to the people.]

How does the explanation of the gentleman affect the principle. These doctrines were professed by jacobins, and with them Bonaparte became the despot of France. Are such principles the less just among our sober reflecting people, because jacobins and Napoleon professed them? We are told that "hypocrisy is the homage which vice pays to virtue," and it is as true in politics as in morals. If others have lost their freedom by being duped with such a deceptive avowal of just opinions, shall we abandon them, when they have already proved the sheet anchor of our safety? It would be easy to retort, by saying, that, if jacobins have professed these principles, the doctrines of the gentleman are those upon which despotism has acted. If you view this body as one in which is a lodgment, a trust, of the powers of ten millions of people, it is an august Representative Assembly. If a body exercising such high prerogatives independent on the people, they are either so many members clothed with arbitrary power, or they dwindle into individuality. By such results, it may happen that the public passions are kindled; the forms of the constitution unable to restrain the turbulence of faction, jacobins spring up, and tyranny follows. It was not these doctrines that gave a Bonaparte to France, but an abandonment of all rational love of liberty. Her revolution burst out as a volcano—its crater was the birth-place of Napoleon—its lava the food of his ambition. He was mistakenly hailed as the champion of freedom, until his bloody banners floated in triumph over the fairest portions of continental Europe. When his followers awoke from the delusions into which he had lulled them, the iron power of despotism had fixed its dark dominion. Both he and his precursive jacobin horde are alike swept from the earth, and I ask, is the condition of humanity meliorated by the change?

Whenever, Mr. Chairman, a struggle shall arise between this country and this House for the choice of President, we may shudder for the continued existence of our political institutions. Either the representative body will sink in public estimation, or, if they triumph, it is a victory which subverts the basement of our free institutions.

The wise and jealous men who gave being to our form of Government, were deeply read in the history of past times, and they scanned, with prophetic eye, the coming events of futurity. The mournful lot of all the Governments instituted for the professed purpose of ensuring the liberty and happiness of man, filled them with apprehensions of danger to our new experiment. The opinion was received, that a republican form of Government was suited only to a small extent of country; and in the examples of past times, they found that intrigue, faction, and corruption, were the most deadly enemies of democracy. Against their assaults they sought to plant round the pillars of this new and experimental system, every possible guard. They contended that, when the popular will was to be gathered from a widely extended territory, faction and intrigue, always limited in their theatre of action, would not be able to expand their scope over this vast confederacy. Corruption, usually secret in its operations, could not show itself in the face of day, and spread its influence over the same expanse.

In securing the power of electing a Chief Magistrate to the great body of the people, scattered over so vast a territory, it was believed that such only would be chosen who possessed those commanding talents, and those sublime virtues, that are the subjects of universal admiration. By adopting the principle of the gentleman from Delaware, and vesting in this body an irresponsible power of selection, you banish this great safeguard of the constitution. You force the election into that small space upon which full scope is furnished for the operation of these baneful enemies of our free institutions. Upon the theory I have sought to advocate, in which members are the mere organs through which public sentiment is disclosed upon this floor, this great conservative principle is maintained in all its purity. The honorable gentleman from North Carolina says that, by this course, no election could possibly be made. I think differently. If each representative shall here speak the sense of his constituents, and that should not disclose on the ballot a majority of the whole, I take it that his duty would require of him by all exertions to give effect to their will. Should this be unattainable, and the last ray of expectation be extinguished in the gloom of despair, he should cast from him the expired hope, and yielding to the greater principle, which makes the safety of the nation the supreme law, he should make a President of one who, upon the best evidence before him, operating upon his honest judgment, appeared to combine the largest share of public affection and national support. The predilections of a part must, in the end, yield to the wishes of the whole. The gentleman from North Carolina tells you that, according to the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, you would fail to make a Chief Magistrate; and yet, in the course he speaks of pursuing himself, he would be conducted to the same result. He tells you that, for himself, he stands on an isthmus where the waves may lash in vain; unawed by fear, and unflattered by hope, he will not depart from his ground. What is to be the consequence, but the same catastrophe which he humbly thought was ascribed to the principles of the gentleman from South Carolina.

We are further asked, how are we to ascertain the will of the people? The forms of the constitution, framed in the wisdom of departed patriots, must be taken as the surest indications. If these are wrong, then is the constitution; resting on a vicious principle. It is somewhat difficult, in this country, amid both the freedom and the licentiousness of the press, to mistake the signs of the times. He would not seek to propagate theoretical principles, to which he would not in practice conform. Those who sent him here knew that he would have preferred two other candidates to the one who is their choice. He had no time to hesitate, with his limited intelligence. He could not presume to put his judgment in resistance to the mass of intelligence in the forty thousand electing him. It had been in vain for him to tell them of his predilections and high estimate of others. They presented him their candidate, of whom they said, his genius was his fortune, and his virtues his arts, his past service a pledge for the future, and by their sense required him to give that candidate his support. Their will was to him a law. Not a cold and dubious support should follow it, but one that would falter with the last hope.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, rose, and said, that he had been the unintentional cause of a debate, which he regretted now to be obliged further to prolong. If he could have foreseen the range the debate would have taken, when he briefly stated the grounds which would influence his course, he would have contented himself with a silent vote; but, unprofitable as the discussion was likely to be, he felt bound to make some reply to the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFRIE.) That gentleman had seized upon one or two general positions, which he, (Mr. McLANE) had originally advanced, to deliver, with his usual talent and adroitness, a popular harangue upon the Presidential question, which, though certainly eloquent, was any thing but an answer to the argument which Mr. McLANE had submitted. Mr. McLANE said he felt under no obligation to follow the gentleman through all the topics to which he had adverted, and he could but remark, that the observations of the gentleman would have been much more pertinent, if he had been making a new constitution, than in interpreting the present. Mr. McLANE said it was no part of his business to inquire, whether better and more expedient provisions might have been made, or whether the will of the people could be more readily attained. It was enough for him to consider his own rights and duties under the constitution as it exists at present.

The points between the gentleman from South Carolina and myself, said Mr. McL., are few, and confined to a small compass. I contend that the immediate constituents of a member of the House of Representatives have no right to instruct him in his vote for a President, and that, though the opinion of the people of this Union, when fairly ascertained, would be entitled to great weight, it would not be absolutely imperative, but that the representative should, in all cases, exercise a sound and honest judgment, acknowledging only his ulterior responsibility. This is denied by the gentleman from South Carolina, who asserts the right of instruction, in this instance, to the fullest extent. To these points, Mr. McL. said he should confine his argument, leaving the mass of the gentleman's remarks to produce an effect wheresoever they might.

I distinguish our duty, said Mr. McL., in the election of a President from that in cases of ordinary legislation, though not admitting the right of instruction in either, because, in the former, our duties are not legislative but rather judicial, or a part of the electoral franchise, which, in its very character, implies freedom of thought and action.

The gentleman also distinguishes these duties, but reaches the opposite conclusion. He denies the right of instruction in matters of ordinary legislation, yet contends for it in our electoral duties! His theory is, to my mind, fallacious and unsatisfactory. He says the people have no right to make, are incapable of making laws, and therefore delegate that power to us, and cannot control us; but the people have a right to elect a President, and therefore can instruct us in our choice! If the premises were sound, a precisely opposite conclusion would clearly follow; for, in the first instance, not being able to make laws, the people might well be supposed to constitute us their agents to act for them, and therefore, to a certain extent, retaining the right to exercise a reasonable influence over our conduct; but, in the other case, having the right to make a President for themselves, and failing to do so, they could not claim to direct us, who are not acting for them, but for ourselves and the nation at large. The argument, however, is not well founded.

The theory of our Government, it is true, is, that all power is in the people, and derived from the people—but they never act themselves, excepting in their electoral franchise. They act through the different organs and functionaries of the Government, appointed by the constitution and the laws, and they have no proper right to act in any other way. These functionaries are always responsible for a wise and faithful discharge of their various duties, but cannot be instructed in their exercise. The Congress are authorized to pass laws; and the judicial power to execute them—the people give the power to both, but they cannot properly instruct either.

But, said Mr. McL., the gentleman from South Carolina further argued, that the will of the people is the paramount law, according to what he was pleased to term the philosophy of the constitution—to this the representative is bound to yield his judgment and conscience; and shame, and disgrace, and infamy, are denounced as the portion of him who shall venture to obey his own sense of right in opposition to this will! Before he could recognize a power so absolute, Mr. McL. said, he was disposed to examine its source and character. He would make no lofty professions of regard for the will of the people, according to the phrase of the day. Nothing was more easy, however—nothing more common—it was the ordinary theme of all political declamation. It is the common price of power, and paid most liberally by those who most covet it. We scarcely read of a tyrant, the first page in whose history is not filled with hallelujahs to the people's will. Sir, said he, ambition seeks not to be governed, but to govern; to govern the people; and it flatters the people to put more power over them. But, it is the wild tumultuous will that is thus courted; that which springs from sudden excitements, irregular ebullitions, stirred up by practical causes, and confined to particular districts. Of this false image of the people's will he was no worshipper: while, for the real will of the people, he sincerely felt a profound reverence. I mean, said he, the will of a majority of the people, constitutionally expressed, in the mode prescribed by the laws. It is this will which is the great moral and political power on which the Government reposes. It is this will which comes in the panoply of the constitution, and should be a law to all. He would recognize no other will of the people, than that so made manifest; every thing else was but its counterfeit. For this constitutional will, we manifest our respect, by cherishing and sustaining the institutions of its creation. And of his respect, he said, he would give a practical proof, by yielding a generous support to the man on whom the constitutional manifestation of this will should rest, supporting him when right, and opposing him when wrong.

The gentleman from South Carolina says, the election of the President by the people, is the best mode which human wisdom can devise. I may admit the position, but what follows? The constitution supposes it the best, and, therefore, resorts to it in the first instance; but it also supposes it may fail in its object. It requires a majority of the people in favor of some one candidate, to make an election; it supposes this majority unattainable, and, in such an event, which has now happened, directs a new mode of election, and by a different power. I ask gentlemen to look into the constitution, and see what restrictions are imposed upon the exercise of this power. There is none but the number to which the choice is limited. Within this number it is in vain to shackle our discretion.

The constitution meant, and for wise purposes, that the direct agency of the people, in this election, should cease after the result of the electoral votes, and that, in the new and further election, the federative principle of the Government should operate—rejecting all influence from numbers and the weight of population. It became absolutely necessary to resort to such a principle, to promote and ensure an election, by disregarding the causes which had prevented it in the electoral colleges. It designed to remove us from that very influence which had defeated the will of the majority. By giving each State a vote, without regard to its population, the electoral combinations or disagreements are broken up, and a new principle established. But the doctrine contended for, by the gentleman from South Carolina, brings the force of the population, in the worst and most irregular form, to operate on the election here, and disappoint the great object of the change.

Sir, said Mr. MOLLANE, it is plain, that, if the constitution had deemed the further agency of the people essential, or even proper, it would not have devolved the election upon us, where the largest and smallest State is upon an equality, but would have sent it back to the people for a new effort. It would have remitted the choice to them with the same restriction as to the number of candidates, or it would have sent the election to us, to be made in proportion to the numbers of each State on this floor.

If it were deemed inexpedient to send the choice back to the people, for a constitutional expression of their preference, it cannot be wise to control it here by a loose manifestation, or by vague and speculative conjectures.

The gentleman from South Carolina, said Mr. MOLL., has spoken of an "inchoate election." He says the people have commenced the choice, and that we are only to complete what they have begun. He did not, he said, entirely comprehend the force of these remarks. If they were designed to argue that we should begin where the people had left off, pushing the highest by preference to the others, he could not assent to the proposition. Such an idea was as impracticable as it would be to add States to individual votes. But the act of the people, he contended, was complete, and their power at an end. Their act was to ballot for a choice—if any one received a majority, the election was complete. If such a majority did not appear, the failure was as complete. He contended that the people were done with the matter; it was no longer in their hands; it had passed into ours, accompanied with a deep responsibility, which we could not otherwise discharge, than by an honest, conscientious performance of our duty, according to our own honest judgment.

What then, said Mr. MOLLANE, are our rights and duties in this matter? The constitution, by which they are prescribed, provides, that if no person shall have a majority, then, from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, the House of Representatives shall choose, immediately, by ballot, the President. The time of making this choice, does, of itself, exclude the idea of any interference of the people by instructions. The House are to proceed immediately to the performance of their duty, making it impossible to procure any concerted or regular movement by the people to express their wish. Any other than such, would be worse than folly—it would be delusive and dangerous.

But the House of Representatives are to choose a President. This is both a right and a duty. The right of choosing, implies the right of selection—it implies, also, discretion; the exercise of an unbiased judgment, the duty of considering the fitness and qualifications of the respective candidates, their comparative merits, their capacity to sustain the institutions of the country, to promote the safety and happiness of the people at home, and the honor and glory of the nation abroad; in short, sir, it necessarily implies the right of considering every thing which fairly appertains to the preference to be ultimately declared. It is our duty to examine and deliberate upon every thing connected with the subject, in reference to the object to be attained. Are gentlemen willing to have this great duty resolved into a simple inquiry into personal popularity? of which of the three our particular constituents might prefer? or which would be most popular in a given district or State? Such an inquiry would divert us entirely from the merits of the candidates, and lead us into a field where everything is doubt and conjecture. What, said he, are the powers of the people, when they are making the election, and by what motives are they to be supposed to be influenced in their choice? There are no limits to their power; they may even indulge in whim and caprice; but a wise, and virtuous, and intelligent, and patriotic people, must be presumed to be guided in their choice by the character and fitness of the candidate. They look for a Chief Magistrate capable of presiding with safety and honor over the destinies of the country, and less power than they possess over the subject, would be inadequate to the object—would impair their elective franchise! Have we not the same duties to perform, the same objects to attain, and are we clothed with less power and fewer means for their attainment? Could it have been the design of this constitution to commit this high trust to our hands, and leave us dependent upon the will or caprice of others for its execution? It is our duty, and our right to "choose;" but, if we are liable to be instructed, nay, commanded in our choice, the choice is not ours, but theirs who instruct us; it is not a free and independent selection, but obedience to the commands of a superior.

This doctrine of the plurality preference and

[H. OF R.]

of instruction, would naturally lead to the most dangerous consequences, and defeat one great object of confiding the choice to us. It holds all our information and experience for naught, and deprives the people of all advantage from the very qualities for which they have selected us for this duty. It can rarely happen that the people of these States can have a full knowledge of the character and principles of men who may be presented for their suffrages. They judge from the representations of others, or from some single glaring or striking act,

The preference is no doubt founded upon his supposed fitness and capacity. They believe him to be a wise, enlightened, and virtuous statesman, sound and practical in his views, and deserving their confidence. But, is it not possible for all these calculations to prove unfounded? Let me suppose, sir, said he, that we, who may be better acquainted with the individual, when we came to inspect his character and test his fitness, find that he is in reality distinguished for no one virtue, for which the people preferred him; that, in our consciences, we should be persuaded he was wholly incapable of administering the Government—what would the gentleman from S. C. do in such a case? Would he surrender his judgment and conscience to the mistaken preference of his constituents, or fearlessly consult his higher duty to his country?

It was no stretch of the imagination, said Mr. McLANE, for him to suppose further, that some one candidate, returned to the House of Representatives, should be discovered in the use of improper means to promote his elevation: the patronage of his office may have been held out in anticipation, and indications of a policy and administration injurious to the great interests of the nation. In such a case, who could hesitate between the mandate of his instruction, and his duty to the nation?

Sir, said Mr. McLANE, the only true and safe course, is to treat this body as an independent tribunal, bound to elect the man best qualified, in their judgment, to administer the affairs of the nation.

If we are bound by instructions, who have the right to instruct us? It has been already shown, that the election here is federative, and not by numbers; the votes are by States and not by the People. We are called to perform this duty for the whole nation, not for any part of it; for all the States, and not for any one in particular. When we enter upon this duty, we lose our relation to our immediate constituents, and are charged with a duty for the whole Union. We become the judges and umpires of the whole; we are to act for the interests of the whole.

It is in this way only, that the equality of the votes of States here, can be reconciled with the general theory of the Government. If I act here under the instruction and dominion of Delaware, the population of that State controls tenfold its numbers elsewhere. But, if I act here, under no more particular responsibility to my immediate constituents in Delaware, than to the rest of the Union, and consulting the interests of the whole, this disparity, which has been so much complained of, disappears.

If in this election I preserve my ordinary relation to the people of Delaware, then to them only am I responsible, and upon their instructions only, are obligatory. What then becomes of the plurality vote, if their instructions command me to disregard and disobey it.

According to the theory for which he contended, said Mr. McLANE, the duty of a member of this House is that of a great moral agent, looking, with a single eye, to the welfare of a common country, and guided by considerations of a similar kind. He acts fearlessly and independently to the attainment of that end: if he fail, from weakness of character, or through corrupt means, and give just offence, or produce injury to the people, the remedy is found in the elective power of the people. It is the ultimate remedy for all evils and abuses in the Government, and will never prove inefficacious as long as each public functionary shall be kept within its appropriate sphere. There is force enough in it to secure an honest discharge of our duty—it is terrible only to evil-doers. If it be rashly or vindictively applied, it deprives us of the honor of a seat here; but it leaves us in possession of that which is of far more value, and well calculated to alleviate the loss of place. I do not say that the honor of a seat in this House is to be lightly esteemed, or that he who could not surrender it without regret, would be unworthy of its occupation; but I will say, that it is not likely to be honored by him who would be incapable of performing its duties with an honest independence. Mr. McLANE said he was not ambitious of figuring in an opposition to the popular clamor, nor was he at all disposed to court responsibility; but he would not shrink from it, when it came upon him, and he could imagine it to be sometimes a virtue to oppose even the wildest tumult. It behooved every man placed in such a station to meet the crisis with calmness and fortitude; to throw his eyes abroad over the whole scene, and do the best for the safety and happiness of the whole. It would ill become us, he said, in such a crisis, to be found timid and wavering, infirm of purpose, bending to the storm, or yielding our judgments to the commands of others.

Our great duty, upon such an occasion as the present, was to compose difficulties, not to heighten them with others, or to be agitated by them ourselves. The supposition is, when the election of a President devolves upon this House, that the public voice has been distrusted and distracted by serious and unavoidable difficulties: by the number of candidates, personal predilections, and hostility; local views and sectional jealousy; party feelings and factional excitement. By these and other causes, the public mind may have been thrown into the most bitter and violent commotion, alarming to both social and public tranquillity. The constitution erects this House into a high and sacred tribunal, to compose and quiet these angry elements—to allow time for their fury to subside—to bring order out of confusion. We should be false to ourselves and to the country, if, instead of doing so, we should launch forth upon this wild ocean, and fret and vex it afresh. It is not for me to say how surely this would be done by bringing public excitement to operate upon our deliberations in such an election.

Then, sir, said Mr. McLANE, if I be correct in the views I have taken of the rights and duties of the House of Representatives in this election, does it not follow, that all attempts to control, or sway, or intimidate the free exercise of our sober, independent judgment, are indecorous and improper? He would not now detain the House, after the time he had already consumed, in detailing the various means which might be employed, and the different kinds of influence which might be brought to control the independence of members. It was unnecessary for him, he said, to describe the effects of all those popular engines which a state of high public excitement always puts in motion, and which, from the seeds sown in county meetings, to the fruits appearing in the persons of self-constituted committees, which may daily surround this Hall, were constantly operating. We guard the election by the people, said he, from all tumult and disorder, and carefully banish all illegitimate influence at a distance. Why are we fearful of surrounding our own liberties with equal security? The character of all these influences is progressive; and the most fearful apprehensions entertained, by able commentators upon our constitution, of an election by the House of Representatives, have been from the effect of these extraneous influences, both civil and military, which may easily be put in motion. Mr. McL. said he had no apprehension of such evils at the present day; but he repeated, that now, when every thing was comparatively tranquil and secure, was the most suitable time to make provision for the day, when the tempers of gentlemen would be less calculated for cool deliberation. If the people had no power to interfere with our conduct, they could claim no right to superintend our deliberations. He had as little at stake as others, however, and should submit, with as good a grace, to the decision of the House.

Mr. WEBSTER then rose, and said, that the precise question before the committee, as he understood it, was on expunging that part of the third rule to be observed in conducting the approaching election, which prescribes that the galleries of this House, which at first are to be open to the public, may be cleared at any time pending the election, at the request of the delegation of any one State. If the motion obtains, the standing rule of the House on this subject will then be in order, which is, that the Speaker, as a matter of duty, and a matter of course, may cause the galleries to be cleared whenever any disorder, on the part of those who attend there, shall, in his opinion, render it expedient and proper. So that, in fact, the question before the committee, which has been, he would not say, the subject, but which has been the occasion of such an extended discussion, is simply this, whether the power of clearing the galleries, in case of disorder, shall rest with the Speaker of the House, or with the delegation from a State. This is the precise question, which the committee have to decide. A very broad discussion had been gone into, as to the effect of those various considerations which ought to influence a member of this House in giving his vote. As constituting, either in whole or in part, the delegation of a State, he would not say that the arguments which had been brought forward had not any relation to each other. But he must say, that their relation to the question before the committee, was but slight. The question had been treated with a view to national considerations, but it must be extremely evident, that the House could not prescribe how much relative consideration ought to be given to one, and how much to another of these considerations. And in such a case each member must judge for himself, what degree of respect is due to this or that mode of expressing public opinion. Whether he shall have regard to public opinion as it now is, or as it will soon be; on every question of this kind, each man must decide for himself. A course of remark has been gone into, historical allusions had been made, and not very slight denunciations had been uttered, in relation to a former precedent, to all which it might be expected that he should make some reply; and he certainly felt, as was natural in his circumstances, a strong desire to do so; but he was restrained from indulging this desire, by what he considered to be his duty to the House. It must be, by this time, perfectly evident, that no valuable result could be obtained by the most protracted discussion; and he would submit to the candor of gentlemen the propriety of making some disposition of the subject before them, without further delay. He hoped that the motion he was about to make would be received in the spirit in which it was made. The House was on the eve of a great and interesting duty. It was indispensable that some rules of proceeding should previously be adopted. With respect to the particular rule now in discussion, he considered it as very unimportant in itself. If important at all, it had only been made so by the discussion of which it had been made the subject. Rather than spend ten minutes more of the time of the House, he would, for himself, willingly consent, that the power in question should remain with the Speaker, or should be given to the delegation of a State. He, therefore, moved that the committee do now rise, and that the residue of the rules should be determined on in the House.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee then rose, reported progress, and were refused leave to sit again: and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

On motion of Mr. COOKE, the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, were discharged from the further consideration of the rules referred to; and they were laid on the table. They were then taken up and read in order. The first rule is in the following words:

"1st. In the event of its appearing, on opening all the certificates, and counting the votes given by the electors of the several States for President, that no person has a majority of the votes of the whole number of the electors appointed, and the result shall have been declared, the same shall be entered on the journals of this House."

This rule, having been read, was agreed to.

The second rule, on motion of Mr. BASSETT, was amended, by inserting, after the word "called," the words "by States;" and thus amended, it read as follows:

"2d. The roll of the House shall then be called, by States, and, on its appearing that a member or members from two-thirds of the States are present, the House shall immediately proceed, by ballot, to choose a President from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President; and in case neither of those persons shall receive the votes of a majority of all the States on the first ballot, the House shall continue to ballot for a President, without interruption by other business, until a President be chosen."

And, thus amended, it was agreed to.

The third rule having been read, a motion was made to strike out the last clause, which orders the galleries to be cleared at the request of the delegation of any one State.

On this question, Mr. McDUFFIE rose, and observed, that he left it to the House to determine on whom the responsibility rested, of giving to the present discussion the extensive range which it had taken. For himself, he had adopted as a constant rule, not to consume the time of the House by any remarks which had not a direct reference to the subject before it, or which were not drawn out by topics brought into the discussion by other gentlemen. As to the present discussion, he had considered the gentleman from Delaware as assuming, at the commencement of it, as the ground on which he thought it wise policy to clear the galleries, that members of this House, when engaged in electing a President, did not act as the delegates of the people, and were not responsible to them. The reply which he himself had made, was directed only to this principle. It went no further. In replying to his remark, the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Delaware, had extended the discussion still further, and had made a theoretical discussion of the powers of the House to bear on the question immediately before it. And now, at the close of one of the most eloquent and imposing arguments ever delivered in this House, a member rises in his place and suggests the impolicy of continuing the argument. He felt very great respect for that member, but he considered the matter to be discussed as of the greatest importance. The principle laid down had a very wide and extensive bearing, and he felt it his duty to submit to the dictates of his own judgment, and give the principle that discussion which he considered it entitled to receive. The responsibility rested upon him, and he well knew the impatience of the House, and was aware of the lateness of the hour; but he was compelled, notwithstanding these disadvantages, to go into the argument, and to reply both to the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Delaware.

Both of those gentlemen had put cases, urged with a great deal of ingenuity, to show that the doctrine for which he contended, viz: that, in electing a President, the people have a right to instruct their delegates, would operate, in practice, to defeat the election. Sir, said Mr. McD., if that consequence can be shown to be fairly deducible from the principle I advocate, I will abandon it. But I think, that, so far from this being the case, the danger exists only in the imagination of the gentlemen who urge it. What is the case supposed by the gentleman from North Carolina? That there are three candidates; and that eight States vote for each of them. Well, take that case. The gentlemen say, if the people have a right to instruct their delegates, then, instructions once given, cannot be resisted, and so the delegate must go on voting to the end, for the candidate designated by his own State, and thus the election will be prevented altogether. But this statement arises from an entire misapprehension of the ground I take. I did not contend that the delegate must go on voting to the end as he began, and so defeat the election. I only contended that the popular will of the State is as binding on me, as they say the dictate of conscience is binding on them.

I will, therefore, turn the gentlemen's case upon themselves. Suppose there are three candidates, and the members from eight States hold themselves bound in conscience to vote each of them, can there be an election in this case? No, sir. They say, that if the popular will is to bind me, I must continue to submit to it. Well, sir, if conscience is to bind them, they must continue to submit to it. I do not say that the people have a legal right to instruct their delegates, but—

[Here, Mr. WEBSTER observed, that he rose with great pain. He hoped the gentleman from South Carolina would do him the justice to believe, that nothing but an imperious conviction of duty induced him to interrupt an argument which he knew it would give him pleasure to hear, but he submitted whether it was in order to go into an argument in the House in reply to an argument urged in Committee of the Whole, any more than if it had been urged in a select committee.]

The SPEAKER decided that the observations of Mr. McDUFFIE were not in order, on the ground stated, and that they were not in order for another reason, viz: that the whole scope of the debate was irrelevant to the question actually before the House.

Mr. McDUFFIE, upon the latter ground, submitted to the decision of the Chair.

The question was then put on the amendment, and carried.

Mr. WRIGHT moved further to amend the rule, by inserting, after the words "Senators," the words "Stenographers;" which was carried.

And the rule, as amended, was adopted, and read as follows:

"8d. The doors of the Hall shall be closed during the balloting, except against members of the Senate, stenographers, and the officers of the House."

The fourth rule was then read, and adopted as follows:

"4th. From the commencement of the balloting, until an election is made, no proposition to adjourn shall be received, unless on the motion of one State, seconded by another State; and the question shall be decided by States. The same rule shall be observed in regard to any motion to change the usual hour for the meeting of the House."

The fifth rule was then read, in the words following:

"5th. In balloting, the following mode shall be observed, to wit:

The Representatives of each State shall be arranged and seated together, beginning with the seat at the right hand of the Speaker's chair, with the members from the State of Maine; thence proceeding with the members from the States in the order the States are usually named for receiving petitions, around the hall of the House, until all are seated.

A ballot-box shall be provided for each State.

The Representatives of each State shall, in the first instance, ballot among themselves, in order to ascertain the vote of their State, and they may, if necessary, appoint tellers of their ballots.

After the vote of each State is ascertained, duplicates thereof shall be made out, and, in case any one of the persons from whom the choice is to be made, shall receive a majority of the votes given, on any one balloting, by the Representatives of a State, the name of that person shall be written on each of the duplicates; and, in case the votes so given shall be divided, so that neither of said persons shall have a majority of the whole number of votes given by such State on any one balloting, then the word "divided," shall be written on each duplicate.

After the delegation from each State shall have ascertained the vote of their State, the Clerk shall name the States in the order they are usually named for receiving petitions; and as the name of each is called, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall present to the delegation of each two ballot-boxes, in each of which shall be deposited, by some Representative of the State, one of the duplicates made as aforesaid, of the vote of said State, in the presence, and subject to the examination of all the members from said State then present; and, where there is more than one Representative from a State, the duplicates shall not both be deposited by the same person.

When the votes of the States are thus all taken in, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall carry one of the said ballot-boxes to one table, and the other to a separate and distinct table.

One person from each State, represented in the balloting, shall be appointed by its Representative to tell off said ballots; but, in case the Representatives fail to appoint a teller, the Speaker shall appoint.

The said tellers shall divide themselves into two sets, as nearly equal in number as can be, and one of the said sets of tellers shall proceed to count the votes in one of said boxes, and the other set the votes in the other box.

When the votes are counted by the different sets of tellers, the result shall be reported to the House, and if the reports agree, the same shall be accepted as the true votes of the States; but, if the reports disagree, the States shall proceed, in the same manner as before, to a new ballot."

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, then moved to amend this rule, by striking out what follows the words, "a ballot-box shall be provided for each State," and inserting the following:

"Labelled, with the name of the State, placed in front of the Speaker's chair, on the Clerk's table—placed in the order of the States. The Clerk shall then proceed to call each delegation in the order in which petitions are called, and the member of each delegation shall place his ballot in the box labelled with the name of the State. After all the States have thus voted, then the members of each delegation shall nominate a member of their delegation to act as teller, who shall proceed, with the rest of the tellers appointed by the several delegations, to count the votes of each State, commencing in the order in which they are called; at the close of which count, the separate vote of each State shall be declared by the senior member of the Committee of tellers, as well as the result of the aggregate ballot. Should the delegation of any State fail to appoint a teller, then the Speaker shall nominate one, and where there is but one member of a State, he shall act as teller. These rules shall be observed in each successive ballot, until a choice is produced, in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. HAMILTON rose, and observed that, in offering this amendment, he disclaimed any intention to provoke a debate on a subject which might be susceptible of extended and various considerations. My object (said Mr. H.) is to endeavor to adopt, within the provisions of the constitution, some mode by which the vote of each State (not the members of the several States) may be ascertained. To the members composing the delegations I know that the privilege of a secret ballot is secured. This I do not propose to violate; but I do propose that some mode should be adopted, by which the vote of the State, when given, should be put on record on the journals of this House, and the people be enabled, in an authentic form, to know how their Representatives have given the vote of the States which they represent.

Now, by the mode reported by the committee, there are to be twenty-four distinct and secret colleges, each State acting under its own discretion, and the strange result might occur, that, in one delegation, blank votes would be counted, and, in another, rejected, and by this clashing it might, in effect, arise that an election should be produced, which was not the result of a majority of the States.

The amendment he had submitted, provided that the vote of each State should be in a separate ballot-box, and be thus told and declared. He felt satisfied that, although it seemed in its operation to disclose the vote of a member, when that person represented alone a whole State, yet this was an accident either of good fortune or bad, according to the pride and regret with which such gentlemen might view their situation. Besides, he did not suppose that any gentleman on that floor would desire to have any result, produced by his acts, attributed to another, which, in the portentous darkness which was about to veil their proceedings, in relation to the mode of balloting, might occur.

In conclusion, he would say, that we were bound, as far as it was admissible, within the secret ballot, according to each member, to allow the people to understand, at least in our condescension, how the vote of their different States have been given, in a shape more authentic than rumor, or even a newspaper report. He defied any man, in the odious contest of 1801, to determine how the States had voted, from the journals of this House; and he thought such a mysterious mode of choice suited rather the muffled secrecy of a Venetian Senate, than an assembly representing a free people. Let us have no approach, even in appearance, in our transactions on this eventful occasion, to that terrible image of jealousy, secrecy, and prostration of public freedom, exhibited by the brazen lion of Venice, which, with his gaping mouth, receives a vote which comes whence nobody knows, and for which nobody is responsible.

Mr. WEBSTER requested leave to make a single remark, which might save further discussion. The rule, as proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, would be in direct violation of the constitution. The constitution says, that the States shall vote by ballot. But the proposed amendment would defeat that intention. Some of the States are represented only by a single delegate; and, if the proposed amendment prevailed, each of these gentlemen is compelled to declare in what way he has voted.

The question was then put on Mr. HAMILTON's amendment, and decided in the negative. Ayes 52—Noes 115.

And the rule, as above stated, was agreed to.

The remaining rules were then successively read, and adopted, as follows:

6th. All questions arising after the balloting commences, requiring the decision of the House, which shall be decided by the House voting per capita, to be incidental to the power of choosing a President, shall be decided by States without debate; and in case of an equal division of the votes of States, the question shall be lost.

7th. When either of the persons from whom the choice is to be made, shall have received a majority of all the States, the Speaker shall declare the same, and that that person is elected President of the United States.

8th. The result shall be immediately communicated to the Senate by message; and a committee of three persons shall be appointed to inform the President of the United States, and the President elect, of said election."

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 8.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Joint Committee, appointed to consider the mode of counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, made a report, in part; which was read.

[The report is the same as that stated in the Senate proceedings.]

The House agreed to the resolutions reported, and Mr. P. P. BARBOUR and Mr. TAYLOR were appointed Tellers according thereto.

WEDNESDAY, February 9.

Election of President by the House of Representatives.

At twelve o'clock, precisely, the members of the SENATE entered the Hall, preceded by their Sergeant-at-Arms, and having the PRESIDENT of the Senate at their head, who was invited to a seat on the right hand of the SPEAKER of the House.

Seats were then assigned the Senators, who took their seats together, in front of the Speaker's chair, and toward the right hand of the entrance.

The President of the Senate (Mr. GAILLARD) then rose, and stated that the certificates, forwarded by the Electors from each State, would be delivered to the Tellers.

Mr. TAZEWELL, of the Senate, and Messrs. JOHN W. TAYLOR and PHILIP P. BARBOUR, on the part of the House, took their places, as Tellers, at the Clerk's table. The President of the Senate then opened two packets, one received by messenger, and the other by mail, containing the certificates of the votes of the State of New Hampshire. One of these was then read by Mr. TAZEWELL, while the other was compared with it by Messrs. TAYLOR and BARBOUR. The whole having been read, and the votes of New Hampshire declared, they were set down by the Clerks of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, seated at different tables. Thus the certificates from all the States were gone through with.

The Tellers then left the Clerk's table, and presenting themselves in front of the Speaker, Mr. TAZEWELL delivered their report of the votes given; which was then handed to the President of the Senate, who again read it to the two Houses, as follows:

The President of the Senate then rose, and declared that no person had received a majority of the votes given for President of the United States; that ANDREW JACKSON, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, and WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, were the three persons who had received the highest number of votes, and that the remaining duties in the choice of a President now devolved on the House of Representatives. He further declared, that JOHN C. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, having received 182 votes, was duly elected VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to serve for four years from the 4th day of March next.

The members of the Senate then retired.

The SPEAKER directed the roll of the House to be called by States, and the members of the respective delegations to take their seats in the order in which the States should be called, beginning at the right hand of the Speaker.

The roll was called accordingly, when it appeared that every member of the House was present, with the exception of Mr. GARNETT, of Virginia, who was known to be indisposed at his lodgings, in this city.

The delegations took their places accordingly, ballot-boxes were distributed to each delegation, by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Speaker directed that the balloting should proceed.

The ballots having all been deposited in the boxes, the following Tellers were named by the respective delegations, being one from each State in the Union:

Mr. Cushman,
Livermore,

Mr. Hooks,
Campbell,

Mr. Webster,
Eddy,
Tomlinson,
Buck,
Taylor,
Condict,
Ingham,
McLane,
Kent,
Randolph,

Mr. Forsyth,
Trimble,
Allen, of Tenn.,
Sloane,
Livingston,
Rankin,
Jennings,
Cook,
Owen,
Scott.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, was appointed by those Tellers who sat at one table, and Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, by those at the other, to announce the result of the balloting. After the ballots were counted out, Mr. WEBSTER rose, and said—

“Mr. Speaker: The Tellers of the votes at this table have proceeded to count the ballots contained in the box set before them. The result they find to be, that there are—

For JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, of Massachusetts, 13 votes.

For ANDREW JACKSON, of Tennessee, 7 votes.

For WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, of Georgia, 4 votes.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the other table, made a statement corresponding with that of Mr. WEBSTER, in the facts, but varying in the phraseology, so as to say that Mr. Adams, Mr. Jackson, and Mr. Crawford, had received the votes of so many States, instead of so many votes.

The SPEAKER then stated this result to the House, and announced that JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, having a majority of the votes of these United States, was duly elected President of the same, for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March next.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, a committee was ordered to be appointed, to notify the President of the United States, and the President elect, of the result of the ballot.

And then the House adjourned.

[When the fact of Mr. Adams having 13 votes was announced by the Tellers, some clapping and exultation took place in the galleries, and some slight hissing followed. The House suspended its proceedings until the galleries were cleared.]

THURSDAY, February 10.

Mr. JENNINGS, of Indiana, submitted the following:

“Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of releasing, by law, all claim which the United States have upon Maston S. Clarke, of the State of Indiana, as one of the securities of the late Collector of the Internal Revenue of the late Territory of Indiana.”

In offering this resolve, Mr. J. said that the individual referred to in the resolution he had presented, was allied to one of the most numerous and useful families in the Western country. That he had been one of the early pioneers of the western frontier, participated in most of the conflicts produced by the wars with the Indians, and had acted a conspicuous part in the battle of Tippecanoe, as well as on other similar occasions; and who, by his perseverance and enterprise, had possessed himself of a comfortable competency for his numerous and rising family. This, said Mr. J., was his situation when he became one of the securities of a late Collector of the Internal Revenue of the Territory of Indiana, who has since, by a decision of the District Court, been found a delinquent to a considerable amount—the result of which has been, that Col. Clarke has been, by the operation of law, stripped of all his property, both real and personal, not leaving to him so much as the sword he had honored, or his tomahawk and scalping-knife, which had been his constant companions as a private soldier. He hoped the resolution would be adopted.

The resolve was agreed to.

Letter from the President Elect.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the committee appointed for the purpose, yesterday, reported that the committee had waited on JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, of Massachusetts, and had notified him, that, in the recent election of a President of the United States, no person having received a majority of the votes of all the electors appointed, and the choice having consequently devolved upon the House of Representatives, that House, proceeding in the manner prescribed in the constitution, did yesterday choose him to be President of the United States, for four years, commencing on the fourth day of March next. And that the committee had received a written answer, which he presented to the House. The committee also, in further performance of its duty, had given information of this election to the President.

Gentlemen: In receiving this testimonial from the Representatives of the people, and States of this Union, I am deeply sensible to the circumstances under which it has been given. All my predecessors in the high station to which the favor of the House now calls me, have been honored with majorities of the electoral voices in their primary colleges. It has been my fortune to be placed by the divisions of sentiment prevailing among our countrymen on this occasion, in competition, friendly and honorable, with three of my fellow-citizens, all justly enjoying, in eminent degrees, the public favor; and of whose worth, talents, and services, no one entertains a higher and more respectful sense than myself. The names of two of them were, in the fulfilment of the provisions of the constitution, presented to the selection of the House, in concurrence with my own; names closely associated with the glory of the nation, and one of them, further recommended by a larger minority of the primary electoral suffrages than mine.

In this state of things, could my refusal to accept the trust thus delegated to me, give an immediate opportunity to the people to form and to express with a nearer approach to unanimity, the object of their preference, I should not hesitate to decline the acceptance of this eminent charge, and to submit the decision of this momentous question again to their determination. But the constitution itself, has not so disposed of the contingency which would arise in the event of my refusal; I shall, therefore, repair to the post assigned me by the call of my country, signified through her constitutional organs; oppressed with the magnitude of the task before me, but cheered with the hope of that generous support from my fellow-citizens, which, in the vicissitudes of a life devoted to the service, has never failed to sustain me—confident in the trust, that the wisdom of the Legislative Councils will guide and direct me in the path of my official duty, and relying, above all, upon the superintending providence of that Being “in whose hand our breath is, and whose are all our ways.”

Gentlemen: I pray you to make acceptable to the House, the assurance of my profound gratitude for their confidence, and to accept yourselves my thanks for the friendly terms in which you have communicated to me their decision.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Road from Pensacola to St. Augustine.

On motion of Mr. CALL, of Florida, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TOMLINSON in the chair, on the bill to provide additional appropriations to complete the public road from Pensacola to St. Augustine, in Florida; and also on the bill to authorize the surveying and laying out of a road from St. Mary's River to Tampa Bay, in the Territory of Florida. Mr. C. moved to fill the blank for the sum appropriated by the first of these bills, with $8,000; which was carried. He then moved to fill the blank in the second bill with $12,000.

On this motion, Mr. McCOR inquired of the delegate from Florida, with respect to the necessity for the road, its proposed length, and whether the present sum would be sufficient to complete it.

Mr. CALL, in reply, requested the reading of a letter at the Clerk's table. He then rose in his place, and stated, that, at last session, a road had been authorized to be made from Cape Sable, the southern extremity of Florida, to the Bay of Tampa, which is on its western coast, and also the marking out a road from St. Augustine to Pensacola. It was now proposed to complete the latter road, which had been marked out, and also to extend the road now running from Cape Sable to Tampa Bay, northwardly, from Tampa Bay to St. Mary's River, where it would meet a road now existing in Georgia. Its length would be about two hundred miles, the whole of which distance it would pass through the public lands, and would thereby greatly enhance their value. He adverted to the difficulty of suppressing piracy in the Gulf of Mexico, Tampa Bay, (which was the best harbor in the south of Florida,) being a notorious rendezvous for pirates, as well as for fugitive slaves from Georgia, the Government had found it necessary to establish a military post there. The post, which is to be a permanent one, was now completely isolated. Neither road nor trace led to it, and it had no means of communicating with the Government itself, except by a long and dangerous sea voyage, which would cost more in a single year, than the whole sum now asked for this road. Another consideration was that of passing along the coast; it ran near to numerous inlets, now the haunts of pirates and slaves. The presence of this road would be an effectual, and the only effectual means, of breaking up their resort to these places. In a state of war, the Bay of Tampa would be a very important post. As such, the Government had selected it; and it was manifest, that, unless a road was formed, by which troops could march for its relief, it must fall an easy prey as soon as it should be invested by a maritime enemy. The country through which it is to pass, is one of the most fertile regions of the South. Nothing was wanted but a highway, to ensure its rapid settlement. He hoped, therefore, that, whether the road was considered as providing for the defence of a distant and vulnerable frontier, or as calculated to increase the value of the public lands, the sum necessary for its construction would readily be granted by the House. He added, in conclusion, that the plan had been examined by the Committee on Roads and Canals, and received its unanimous approbation.

The blank was then filled accordingly.

The committee then rose, and reported both bills, and they were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

MONDAY, February 14.

Georgia Militia Claims.

On motion of Mr. TATNALL, of Georgia, the House then took up the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, adverse to the Georgia Militia Claims; and the question being on recommitting it to that committee with the following instructions:

"To report a bill making an appropriation for the payment of the Georgia Militia Claims for the services rendered in the years 1792, 1793, and 1794; the appropriation to be conformed to the report of the Secretary of War, made to this House upon the subject of these claims in the year 1808, and to embrace each class of claims respectively, as described by that report."

Mr. TATNALL, of Georgia, observed, that, although the grounds of the claim, now under consideration, had been already fully presented to the view of the House by one of his colleagues, during the present session, yet, as some weeks had since elapsed, it was perhaps necessary again to recapitulate them. He should, therefore, in as brief a manner as possible, proceed to do so.

From the documents which have been furnished, it appears that the facts connected with this case are, that, in the years 1792, '3, and '4, the militia of Georgia were called out for the defence of the frontier against the hostilities of the Indians; that these militia were called out, in some instances, under the exercise of discretionary power by the Executive of that State; that the Federal Executive, at some moments, gave his express sanction to the exercise of such power; but, at other moments, seemed inclined to limit the extent of the force to be employed in defence; that, hence, some doubts arose as to the liability of the General Government to pay for all services to the extent to which they were rendered; that, subsequently, when the original liability of the General Government seemed to be conceded, it was contended that a stipulation contained in the "Articles of agreement and cession," entered into between the United States and Georgia, in 1802, was intended to embrace this claim, and that, therefore, the General Government is at this time fully discharged from its previous obligation. This, sir, will be deemed to be a fair and frank statement of the facts of the case.

To determine the question of liability on the part of the General Government, we are naturally led to inquire, first, whether the Governor of Georgia, was, under the circumstances, acting under the express, or necessarily implied sanction of the General Government; for, if so, the liability, originally, of the General Government to pay for the services rendered, will be conceded. But, if this is found not to have been the case, we are, secondly, to inquire whether the circumstances were, of themselves, such as to authorize the Governor, under the Constitution of the United States, to act as his discretion might point out. If both, or either of these positions be settled in the affirmative, it only then will remain to inquire whether the clause in the instrument just alluded to, was intended to embrace this particular case, and thereby to free the General Government from a liability, previously existing, to pay for the militia services rendered by Georgia.

First, then, did the General Government afford its sanction in a manner which would authorize the calling out of the militia by the Governor of Georgia? Now, this is to be determined only by a reference to the documents before us, but I have no hesitation in saying that such sanction was given.

In the letter from the Secretary of War, dated October 27, 1792, the hostile disposition of the savages is spoken of, and in it is this passage: "If the information which you may receive, shall substantiate clearly any hostile designs of the Creeks against the frontiers of Georgia, you will be pleased to take the most effectual measures for the defence thereof, as may be in your power, and which the occasion may require." In the letter from the same individual, dated 30th May, 1793, the Governor is restricted (from considerations of foreign policy) to defensive operations, but is authorized to increase the force. The following is an extract from it:—"From considerations of policy, at this critical period, relative to foreign powers, and the pending treaty with the Northern Indians, it is deemed advisable to avoid, for the present, effective expeditions into the Creek country. But, from

Georgia Militia Claims.

[H. OF R.]

the circumstances of the late depredations on the frontier of Georgia, it is thought expedient to increase the force in that quarter for defensive purposes." In the letter of the 10th June, 1793, from the same individual, there is this remarkable passage:—"The State of Georgia being invaded, or in imminent danger thereof, the measures taken by your Excellency may be considered as indispensable. You are the judge of the degree of danger and of its duration, and will undoubtedly proportion the defence to the exigencies. The President, however, expresses his confidence, that, as soon as the danger which has induced you to call out so large a body of troops shall have subsided, you will reduce the troops to the existing state of things, provided the safety of the frontier will admit the measure." And so threatening did the Secretary of War seem to regard the danger, that he even supposed the militia of Georgia might not be competent to the defence of the State, and therefore authorized the Governor to apply to the Executive of South Carolina for aid. He, at the same time, addresses a communication to the Governor of South Carolina, of which the following is an extract: "The President of the United States has received authentic information from Georgia, of the unprovoked and cruel outrages of parties of Creeks upon the frontiers of that State; and, as it is at present uncertain to what degree the evils complained of may be extended, the President has directed me to request your Excellency, that, in case the frontiers of Georgia should be seriously invaded by large bodies of hostile Indians, you would, upon the request of the Governor of said State, direct such parties of the militia of South Carolina to march to the assistance of Georgia as the case may require, for the expenses of which the United States will be responsible."

Surely, sir, this ought to convince every one that the General Government considered the situation of Georgia as seriously alarming, and that it was inclined to repose every degree of confidence in the discretion of the Governor of that State. The Governor of South Carolina is requested to comply with his requisition—and here, sir, I would put it to the candor of my honorable friend from South Carolina, the Chairman of the Military Committee, to say if such requisition had been made, and if the Governor of South Carolina had complied with it, could he have felt himself authorized to refuse to pay the troops for their services? This is, perhaps, sir, very much of an argumentum ad hominem, but my friend must excuse me here for it. The case is a simple one; the Federal Government authorize the troops to be called out if necessary—prescribe that necessity to be judged of by the Governor of Georgia—the Governor of Georgia makes the requisition upon the Governor of South Carolina, and the requisition is obeyed. Could he, could any one here, refuse to pay for the services of these troops? and, if not, in the name of conscience, how can we refuse to pay for the services of the troops of Georgia? Does the mere fact of their being Georgians make so material a difference? If the Governor of Georgia could call out, at his own discretion, and without being dependent at all upon the discretion of the General Government at a distance, the troops of another State, surely, a fortiori, he must have had a similar and co-efficient power over those of his own State.

In a letter, dated 18th February, 1794, from Governor Matthews to the Secretary of War, he protests against the orders restricting him to operations of a character strictly defensive. He urges most strongly the necessity of his being permitted to pursue the savages into their own country—to follow them, like wild beasts, to their dens, as the only possible means of completely effecting the security of the frontier. He also proposes a plan of defence, by erecting block-houses along the whole extended frontier line. Now, sir, this complaint proves that Governor Matthews considered himself as acting under the orders of the General Government, and the adoption of a part of his proposed plan of defence, (as appears in the Secretary of War's letters to him of the 25th March, and 14th May, 1794,) shows that the Executive of the United States continued to lend his sanction to the services of the militia. These documents, without going further, clearly show that the Governor of Georgia was vested with discretionary power, adapted to the exigency. This power he exercised; and that it was correctly exercised, may be inferred from the readiness with which the agent furnished rations. These were paid for by the General Government, and that, too, without any expression of censure upon him, for affording them. Is not this a conclusive fact, that the militia were properly called out and held in service? They were supplied with arms by the Federal Government—they were regularly mustered into service, and were furnished (as I have said) with rations. These facts appear palpably in the documents before us, and it is unnecessary for me to weary the attention of the House by reading them in detail.

It appears, then, that the General Government did authorize the Governor of Georgia to order out troops at his discretion; and, although in one instance, the General Government seemed inclined to withhold its sanction in future, yet, upon the remonstrance of the Governor, he is again assured that he is considered the competent judge of the extent of the danger. Subsequently, indeed, i. e. in 1794, the number of troops is limited by an order from the General Government, and the disbandment of those whose services were not deemed requisite, was (as Captain Freeman, the agent of the War Department, acknowledges) effected as soon as possible. The situation of the frontier had, however, unquestionably then become changed. All active hostility on the part of the Indians had ceased, and even a disposition to hostility was scarcely manifested. The peace, too, which soon after took place between France and Spain, and which must have been anticipated by our Government, removed one great exciting cause of Indian hostility. But, it is worthy of observations, that as late as 1795, one twelvemonth after the militia (the pay for whose services is now claimed) are disbanded, the Governor of Georgia is notified by the Secretary of War, that 200 regulars are about to be sent to the St. Mary's River, for the purpose of keeping the Creeks in order. So large a force being deemed necessary at one single point, at a time of comparative peace, would seem to prove that, if the Governor of Georgia had erred at all, it was in not having ordered out a much larger force. Sir, this was the opinion expressed in Georgia, as appears by Col. Freeman's correspondence.

But, even taking it for granted, that no express or necessarily implied sanction of the General Government, was afforded, still the second point which I have made will fix a liability to pay for these services, upon the General Government: for, secondly, the circumstances were, of themselves, such as to fully authorize the Governor (under the Constitution of the United States) to act as his own discretion might point out. And here, sir, I would remark that this clause in our constitution, which recognizes the exercise, by a State authority, of a discretionary power, in times of imminent danger, is merely affirmative, or declaratory of a right which the God of Nature has given to every man, and which necessarily belongs to every community—which no law can take away, and which might have been exercised in the particular case before us, under the supposed state of things, even if the General Government had expressly forbid its exercise. I would also add, that, ex natura rerum, the individual threatened with imminent danger, must be the judge of the force which it is necessary for him to use, and the manner in which it is to be applied to secure safety to himself. Those who are present are alone able to determine the nature and extent of the danger. An individual at a distance, or a government at a distance, cannot be a competent judge. This in fact is frankly and readily conceded by the General Government; for the Federal Executive, in a letter addressed to the Governor of Georgia says:—"You are the judge of the degree of danger, and of its duration, and will undoubtedly proportion the defence to the exigencies." And, in another letter addressed to the Governor of South Carolina, that officer is expressly referred to the Governor of Georgia, as the proper person to determine when any auxiliary force should be ordered out from South Carolina. The reason is clear: he is on the spot, and is, therefore, alone competent to determine so important a matter.

Of the existence of imminent danger on the frontiers of Georgia, we can easily convince ourselves, by casting only a hasty glance upon the communications of Governors Telfair and Matthews, and, also, of Col. Freeman, the agent of the War Department, and of other individuals, also, in that quarter, many of them United States military officers. I will briefly refer to parts of these. And here, sir, I will remark, that the situation of Georgia can easily be conceived. With a frontier of near 400 miles, lined with numerous savages of the most warlike and furious character, and with a sparse population, her defenceless and exposed situation can easily be imagined.

The letter from the Governor of Georgia to the Secretary of War, dated 22d of May, 1792, gives intimation of the hostilities of the Creeks and Cherokees, and urges "exertions towards a general defence." To show, however, that these apprehensions were also entertained by the United States military officers, I will cite the letter of Maj. McCall, dated 15th of June, 1792, in which he not only acknowledges the danger, but also says, he has found it necessary to call out a portion of the militia in his vicinity. A letter, also, from Andrew Pickens, dated 12th September, 1792, states, that a general war was expected; and a letter from Captain R. B. Roberts, also of the army, expresses great anxiety, and the necessity of the militia being called out "immediately and in force." Maj. Gaither, commanding the United States troops in Georgia, informs the Governor that he, also, has found it necessary to call out the militia to his aid. With such sanction as this—with the countenance of every United States officer in the State, the Governor would have been wanting in diligence and in fidelity, could he have hesitated a moment. Our frontier was streaming with the blood of women and children—our outer settlements were abandoned in dismay by the inhabitants, and the Governor could not hesitate how to act.

The force to be employed, in defence, was not merely to be measured by the numbers of the enemy, (and these were not few, for they were composed of the two powerful tribes, the Creeks and Cherokees,) but, also, by the difficulty of guarding an extensive and naked frontier. The whole force called out, never, at any one period, amounted to more than from ten to twelve hundred men, and it is absurd to suppose that this could have been disproportioned to the magnitude and pressure of the danger. When it is recollected, what forces were deemed necessary to subdue a part only of these very tribes, within a very few years past—when it is recollected that large armies from Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, aided by several regiments of regular infantry, were required, at this late period, to bring but a portion of these tribes, impaired as has been their population, into submission, it may well be conceived what difficulties and what dangers the young and thinly populated State of Georgia had to contend with. With but a handful of United States troops to aid them, the militia of Georgia, at that early day, were required, by the General Government, to defend her whole frontier. The imminence of the danger is apparent from the many letters upon your files—the extent of it no man can doubt, who has read the history of our late war in that quarter. There are other communications on this subject, among the documents, but which I think it unnecessary to allude to. The General Government, indeed, seems to have had but little doubt upon the subject, for it never hesitated to furnish arms, ammunition, and supplies, of every description. In regard to the pay alone was there any hesitation. This hesitation was, evidently, partly produced by the want of regular muster-rolls, and of the Governor's certificate of service—both of which were subsequently furnished; and, in fact, this House would not now have been troubled with the consideration of this subject, had not the mind of the War Department (according to the account of its own agent) been employed at that moment so much by more weighty matters as to prevent any attention to this. I will read an extract from Colonel Freeman's report, which has an important bearing upon this question. He, it will be remembered, was present in Georgia, was acting there as the agent of the War Department, and must have been privy to every fact or occurrence of consequence. [Here Mr. T. read an extract from Colonel Freeman's report to the Secretary of War, stating, in substance, that the Governor was required to give a certificate before the troops could be paid; that they were, in conformity with the orders of the Government, employed merely in defensive operations; that the War Department was about admitting and paying these claims, &c.]

In regard to these claims, Mr. Pickering, then Secretary of War, writes, August, 1796, to the agent of the War Department, in Georgia, as follows: "The large estimate for services, about which my predecessor doubted, I have looked into, and will immediately further examine. From the complexion of these claims, connected with the Governor's certificate, which I received enclosed in your letter of the 23d of June, I am inclined to think they must be generally admitted." Here, then, this officer, after having examined the nature of these claims, and their extent, says, "they must be generally admitted," to use his own words. And again, in a subsequent communication to the same officer, he goes further, and says, "Money for paying the Georgia militia is preparing to be forwarded. No delay will take place that is avoidable," &c.

Mr. Pickering's standing is well known, and his opinion, thus expressed, will, I am confident, have weight. I think, sir, from the hasty view which I have presented, my second position may be deemed fairly established, viz: that the circumstances were such as fully, of themselves, to authorize the Governor to order out the militia, even without the express sanction of the President. The immense extent of the frontier, the sparse state of the population, the number and ferocity of the savages, the horrid murders of the inhabitants, the frequent depredations upon our settlements, are matters spread perfectly before our view in the documents upon our tables. That man must be a skeptic indeed, who can doubt of the necessity for the steps taken by the Governor for defence!

To sum up my views upon this subject in a few words. I would observe, in conclusion, that the General Government gave its sanction, the documents fully prove; that the Governor could have acted without this sanction, is evident from the situation of the Georgia frontier; that the force ordered out by him was not disproportioned to the magnitude of the danger, is apparent, when we look at the extent of the frontier to be defended, and when we have the General Government's own estimate of the danger, which supposed it not unlikely that the militia of Georgia might be inadequate to the defence, and that it might become necessary to look to South Carolina for aid; and when it is recollected that the whole force (never exceeding from 1,000 to 1,200 men) employed at any time, must have been far, very far indeed below the disposable force of Georgia alone, and that it was certainly a mere petty detachment, when compared with the immense regular and militia forces employed in the Creek nation alone during the late war. That the "Articles of Agreement and Cession" had nothing to do with their claims for services, is manifest from the phraseology of the instrument, even independently of the positive assertions to that effect, of the Georgia commissioners, and that, consequently, the General Government has no plea for refusing to discharge them. Sir, I repose with confidence, in the justice of this House, and I trust that the time has at length come, when the State of Georgia is no longer to be found knocking at your doors for the humble pittance due to her citizens for services rendered to the General Government.

Mr. FOSYTH wished distinctly to understand the ground on which the claim had been resisted by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMILTON (chairman of that committee) in reply, called for the reading of the report of the Military Committee in 1802, of the Committee of Claims, and also of the Military Committee of the last session.

[These reports were read accordingly.]

Mr. H. then, in a few words, stated the views of the committee in rejecting the claims.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, observed, that this subject had been before Congress in different forms, since he became a member. From the anxiety with which it was urged, on the part of its friends, and the constant indecision of the House, he was induced to give it a particular examination, so as to be prepared to act decisively upon it. He would endeavor to be as concise as possible in the views he should present to the House.

It is alleged by the claimants, that they were called into the military service of the United States during the years 1792, 1793, and 1794, to defend the western frontiers of Georgia, against invasion by the Indian tribes. It is admitted on all sides, that the service was performed in the most energetic and patriotic manner. That there now remains due about one hundred and forty thousand dollars. More than thirty years have elapsed since the Georgia soldiers were entitled to remuneration. Their rights have been evaded so long, that they have almost lost the power of exciting any interest in their favor. But it is not too late to perform an act of justice to those who may survive, or the descendants of the defenders of the State.

It seems to be clear, said Mr. M., that the General Government authorized the call for the militia and the continuance of their services; that the State of Georgia is under no obligation to remunerate them, and it would be unjust to require it; that the claims were never embraced in the articles of cession, nor were they intended to be by the contracting parties; that, had the attempt been made to compel the militia to depend for their pay on Georgia, without their approbation, it would have been a direct violation of their rights and of the constitution; that it is due to the honor and good faith of the nation that the General Government should make a prompt provision for the payment of the claims.

Mr. FOSYTH then said, it is now too late to deny a liability to pay what was demanded in 1798. But a new ground of opposition to these claims was discovered in 1808. A committee of this House fancied that these claims were adjusted in the contract between the United States and Georgia for the cession of the territory comprising at this day the States of Mississippi and Alabama. The United States stipulate, as part consideration of that cession, to pay $1,250,000 out of the net proceeds of the land ceded, "in consideration of expenses incurred by the said State in relation to the said territory." These magical words, in the judgment of the committee of 1808, as in that of the military committee of this Congress, paid off these militia claims, or at least shifted the responsibility upon the State of Georgia. In support of this opinion, as the words themselves bear no such construction, resort was had to Mr. Levi Lincoln, the Attorney-General, who was one of the commissioners who formed the contract of 1802. This letter of Mr. Lincoln is a mere opinion, founded not upon the instrument, but upon his vague recollections of some conversations with the Georgia commissioners. As a matter of evidence, it weighs not a feather, as it is expressly contradicted by the positive declarations of two gentlemen, in every respect his equals. They speak from perfect knowledge of this subject. These gentlemen state that these claims were not included, because the State of Georgia never acknowledged herself liable for them. That the commissioners had no authority to stipulate about them, and did not stipulate for their payment or assumption by Georgia. It is not possible for any unprejudiced man to read the letter of the Georgia commissioners, and believe that these militia claims were intended to be included in the words quoted from the act of cession. It is admitted, however, that, in drawing up articles of any compact, between States or individuals, the intention and the act are not always the same. The parties intend to do one thing, and sometimes do a very different thing. This may arise from the superior adroitness of one of them in the use of language, or from carelessness in the choice of words. In the present instance, neither can be supposed; all the persons engaged in forming the compact of 1802, were gentlemen of astute understandings and pure characters. There was no design to entrap—there was no want of care. The words used expressed fairly the intention of the parties. Can they, by any construction, be made to cover these militia claims? Georgia did not owe them. This was admitted. The documents show that she did not. Where does she assume to pay them? No promise to pay them is in the instrument. Nothing is contained in the compact which imposes any obligation upon Georgia which did not then exist. These claims were then charges on the General Government. They remain so still.

Were it even admitted that there was an obligation on the State of Georgia to pay these claims in 1794, it is yet necessary to show that these expenses had a "relation to the territory ceded," before they can be considered included in the cession of 1802. In what does this relation consist? The services were for the defence of the frontiers, and had no more relation to this territory than services performed in New Hampshire or Massachusetts, in defence of their frontiers.

It is a great error to suppose that the magical words "in consideration of expenses incurred by the State," and on which so much stress is laid, express the real consideration for which the $1,250,000 was to be paid. The consideration was a territory sufficiently extensive for two European kingdoms. From the sale of the lands, Government has received four millions of dollars; more than six millions is due, and the remaining lands will yield fifty millions, if sold at the minimum price of public lands. It may be asked, Why were these words introduced into the compact? and what are the expenses to which they refer? The last question has been answered by my colleagues. The first I shall now answer, and I trust, satisfactorily. When the commissioners of the United States were called upon by those of Georgia, to stipulate a payment of a large sum, out of the proceeds of the lands ceded, if they did their duty, they demanded of the Georgia commissioners, on what principle Georgia demanded a payment for lands ceded, for the general benefit, when New York, and Massachusetts, and Connecticut, and Virginia, and North Carolina, had ceded territory without any equivalent? To this appeal to the magnanimity of one of the parties, the answer was simple and conclusive. New York and Massachusetts had conflicting claims, and, to avoid dispute, ceded the disputed territory. Connecticut gave up her jurisdiction, but retained her right to the soil. Virginia and North Carolina gave up their territory, but saddled it with the payment of a variety of the existing claims, indefinite in extent, and not yet satisfied. Georgia ceding territory, asks only what has been demanded and granted to Virginia and North Carolina. She asks in money, and they received lands. Georgia owes to her State troops two millions of acres of land. This debt is to be discharged out of the Western lands, about which we are treating, by the terms on which the troops enlisted. It is not a Revolutionary claim, but a claim arising prior to the adoption of the constitution. It is due for defence of the State, and forms a fair and reasonable claim upon the confederation. It has not been allowed, and we must take care that it shall be paid, especially as we are about to convey away the fund on which it was secured. The nature of this claim has been already explained. A brief recapitulation may not, however, be useless. In 1787, during an Indian war, it was deemed necessary to raise 3,000 men. As an inducement to enlistments, 640 acres of land were offered to each private; and to the officers, a larger quantity—the greatest amount promised being 1,200 acres to a colonel. The statute of Georgia lies on my table, for the inspection of any gentleman who wishes to know, accurately, its provisions. It is enough for my purpose to state the substance of it. The enlistments were made, and warrants for the bounties were given to the officers and men. According to the promises of the statute, these bounty warrants were to be located in the Western territory. A part of the troops were to be raised in what was then called Franklin, a part of what is now the State of Tennessee. To these recruits a promise was given of 50 acres on every 100 of bounty, in lieu of rations, which Georgia did not propose to furnish them, and this quantity was to be surveyed in the Bend of Tennessee. In demanding payment for these bounty warrants, Georgia followed the example of Virginia and North Carolina. In consenting to pay, the United States did only what was done for those States. The difference between the cases is this: the claims of Virginia and North Carolina were revolutionary. The claims of Georgia prior to the constitution, but after the revolution.

Virginia and North Carolina made the land subject to their claims. Georgia asked the amount in money, and paid it over to her citizens and those claiming under them. The commissioners of Georgia and of the United States acted wisely in making this arrangement, both for the interests of the individuals claiming and for the convenience of the United States in the consequent survey and sale of the territory ceded. The ceded territory has been regularly surveyed by the United States. There are no conflicting claims in Alabama and Mississippi. The ground has not been "shingled with warrants" as in Kentucky and Tennessee. The claimants, under the statute of Georgia, have all been paid, while some of those claiming under Virginia and North Carolina are yet unsatisfied. Whoever will consider the disputes and difficulties which have attended the arrangement of these claims of Virginia and North Carolina, will applaud the conduct of Georgia.

This explanation accounts for the apparent contradiction between Mr. Lincoln and the Georgia commissioners, and completely reconciles their statements. Mr. Lincoln heard the commissioners say something about militia claims due by that State, and he has confounded the claims for services in 1787, with the claims for the services rendered in 1792, '3, and '4. This claim of two millions of acres is that referred to in the cession, and not the trifling sum of $142,000. This latter is a debt incurred, not by Georgia, but by the United States; and is as wholly unconnected with the former as the militia claims of Massachusetts are. In construing this instrument, then, it is for this House to choose whether they will make its language refer to claims equal in amount to the sum stipulated, and having a direct relation to the land ceded, or to this little militia claim, so far short of the sum stipulated, having no relation to the land ceded, and in which the State never meddled, except through its Governor. I will now show, in conclusion, that the military committee have erred on this subject, and on the same ground as the Secretary erred in 1794. They express great regret that the documents were burnt in the War Office. Sir, it is true that the documents were burnt, but the records of the State of Georgia have been applied to, and from those records the whole correspondence on both sides has been obtained. The committee suppose that those documents, if they had not been burnt, would show why these claims have been rejected. And they suppose, as the Secretary did, that they were rejected because the operations against the Creeks and Cherokees had taken a direction which was offensive to the Government. But this was never the fact. It is true, indeed, that expeditions were undertaken against the Indians, in opposition to the will of the Government; but these were expeditions, not of the militia, but of volunteers, acting on their own mere motion, in revenge for injuries previously inflicted by the Indians.

It is immaterial whether the Governor of Georgia acted right or acted wrong. He was authorized, by the General Government, to raise those troops: in doing so, he was the agent of the General Government, and the Government is bound to pay the soldiers he raised.

Were it, however, necessary, I could show that, instead of doing too much, he did too little. The documents show that the people of the State did not consider the frontiers sufficiently protected. The legislature passed sundry resolutions, calling upon the General Government for further aid—aid which would have been indispensable, but for the voluntary expeditions undertaken by the citizens of Georgia against the Indians. To show the danger to which the State was exposed, I ask the attention of the House to a single document, a letter from the Spanish Governor of Louisiana to the Spanish commissioners, Jaudenes and Viar, [Mr. F. read from Waite's State Papers extracts from the letter, which stated that 600 Cherokees were asking supplies of ammunition to invade Georgia; that partial supplies had been given; that four bodies of Creeks were ready to invade Georgia, but were restrained by the Governor until it was ascertained what was to be done by Spain and the United States.] Such was the effect produced by this letter, that the administration of Gen. Washington expected a war with Spain as the ally of the Creeks and Cherokees. The letter of Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Carmichael, communicating this document, shows the apprehension of the Government that such was to be the consequence of the disturbances to the South. To the Western gentlemen, a full justification of the conduct of the Governor would be found in the fact that, notwithstanding the force called into service, the incursions of the Indians were so frequent, that the frontier settlements were broken up the whole extent of the Indian boundary. All this is aside from the question. It was immaterial whether the Governor was justified or criminal in employing the force called out. The troops were called out by him as the agent of the United States; the United States are bound to pay. The United States have paid the contractor who supplied them all the expenses incident to the service; have paid troops from Tennessee, employed under similar circumstances, and have not been absolved from their liability to the Georgia militia by the compact of 1802.

Mr. HAMILTON rose in reply, but gave way to a motion for adjournment, which was carried.

TUESDAY, February 15.

Georgia Militia Claims.

The House then passed to the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the motion of Mr. TATNALL, to recommit the report of the Military Committee on the Georgia Militia Claims, with instructions to report a bill for the payment of them.

Mr. HAMILTON said that he would not detain the House long in the very few remarks which he had to make in vindication of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, in reply to the objections which the gentleman from Georgia had urged in opposition to that report.

He said that, whilst he admitted that no claim before Congress ought unhesitatingly to be discarded by the circumstance of its having been, time after time, rejected by the committees to which it may have been referred; nevertheless, the fact of reiterated rejection was calculated to produce a well-founded distrust of the justice of a claim so circumstanced, and must produce a disposition, on the part of the House, not to reverse previous decisions, except on the discovery of some new matters of fact, which may have escaped a previous investigation.

As it respects the claims under consideration, they have been before Congress, in various shapes, from 1797 to the present period, and have been uniformly rejected by the committees of this House, with the exception of a favorable report of a select committee, to whose consideration they were once confided. In 1808, the Committee on Claims made an able report, which may be said to have formed the basis on which the Georgia Militia Claims have ever since been rejected, on the ground that their complete payment was consummated under the treaty of cession between the United States and Georgia, executed the 24th of April, 1802. Before, Mr. H. said, he came to consider the stipulation of this treaty, which it is supposed had relation to these claims, he would remark, which it was important for the House distinctly to understand, that the validity or justice of the claims independently of this stipulation, had never been fully admitted by the Government of the United States, that the largest portion of them were reported, by the agent of the War Department, as unauthorized; and, with such a designation, they yet stand on the records of the House, and on the files of the War Office. In a word, of the claims which, by the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, the Committee on Military Affairs are instructed to report a bill to provide payment, only $18,159 60 are called authorized, out of $142,585 29. The remaining sum of $129,875 66, being for services, which, in the language of the special agent, employed by the War Department, Colonel Constant Freeman, "were not considered, either by the Executive or himself, as fully authorized."

This discrimination resulted from the following circumstances: In 1792, the frontiers of Georgia were seriously menaced by Indian incursions. The then Secretary of War, Gen. Knox, authorized the Governor of that State, "to take such measures, for the defence of the same, as might be indispensable," and, very shortly after, communicated to the Governor the views of the President, as to the amount of the militia force which might be necessary for the security of the frontiers of Georgia, in addition to the regular troops which were, at that time, in that quarter, under the command of Major Gaither. The additional force, thus suggested as sufficient, were one hundred horse and one hundred foot. The "case of the serious invasion of Georgia by large bodies of Indians," the Secretary remarked, at the conclusion of his order, "must be left to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States." The authorized claims, amounting to $18,159 68, may, therefore, be considered as founded on the services of the one hundred horse and one hundred foot, ordered by the Secretary; and the unauthorized claims, amounting to $123,375 66, are those which grew out of the discretion which the Executive of Georgia exercised under the presumed instructions of the Secretary of War, or the provisions of the constitution.

Georgia Militia Claims.

[H. OF R.]

As the ground assumed by the committee, in their report, is the one so often taken, that these claims have been finally settled under the treaty of cession, Mr. H. said he would not go into a minute recapitulation of the correspondence, to show that the unauthorized claims were always considered as liable to objection, in consequence of a belief, on the part of the General Government, that the Governor of Georgia had not exercised a proper discretion in calling out troops, the levies of which were, at times, unjustifiably large and frequent, and, consequently, entailing unnecessary expense on the United States. If any proof were wanting of this fact, it is to be found in the letter of the 22d February, 1794, in which the Secretary of War informs the Governor of Georgia "that a body of militia had been kept up, on the frontiers of Georgia, during a greater part of the last year, greatly exceeding the number, which, according to the information received at the War Office, would seem to have been required by the state of things in that quarter." This number was represented from 1,000 to 1,200; and, in this communication, the secretary employs the caution of reverting again to the force which the President considered adequate to the defence of Georgia, which he was willing to consider as raised and continued in the service by his authority, viz: 100 horse and 100 foot.

But this was not the only exception which was probably taken to the claims. The correspondence between the Federal and State authorities, as well as the report of Col. Freeman, discloses the fact that, notwithstanding the peremptory instructions of the Government of the United States, that the Indian territory was not to be invaded, that incursions did take place, which induced the Secretary of War, in his letter to Col. Freeman, of the 5th of September, 1798, to order him "not to concur in any measures, at the expense of the United States, for invading the Creeks." And, in relation to the facts in connection with this branch of the subject, Col. Freeman says, in his report on the unauthorized claims made to the War Department, on the 25th of October, 1802, "the periods in which these unauthorized claims are made, are particularly marked in the history of that State, for misunderstandings between the Creeks and the frontier settlers. There were faults on both sides. The Indians were continually stealing horses, murdering, and doing other injuries to the inhabitants, who, in retaliation, made incursions into their country. Such were the Oakmulgee expedition under General Twiggs, in June, 1798, which consisted of about 750 horse and foot; the destruction of the Oakfuskee village, by Col. Melter, in September, who had under his command about eighty-eight officers and men; the detachment of 125 men, who marched under the orders of Major Brenton, against the Little Chehaw village, on Flint River; and several others of less note, which were made by volunteer parties of militia. It has been supposed that these expeditions have operated as objections to admitting the militia claims. Although they might have been irregular, it is certain that some of the detachments who were then in service, afforded great security to the peaceable inhabitants on the frontiers."

If a portion of these unauthorized claims comprised expeditions involved in these excursions into the enemy's territory, contrary to the express orders of the President, it may well be supposed, said Mr. H., that very serious difficulty would have been made by the Government as to their admission. But these circumstances form not the only objections which were entertained as to the validity of the claims in question. Both from Col. Freeman's report, and the correspondence between the Governor and Col. Gaither, who commanded the Federal troops, it appears that the militia were sometimes embodied without that attention to the forms of service which were required, which led to some unpleasant conflicts of authority between Col. Gaither and the State functionaries. It is evident, from the letters of this officer, that he did not conceive that any serious invasion of the Indians was threatened, but merely predatory incursions, and, in November, 1792, he thinks even a less force than that designated by the Secretary of War, would be sufficient for the protection of the frontiers; that is, two troops of cavalry, instead of 100 horse and 100 foot. That the militia of Georgia were assembled with irregularity, is highly probable, from another fact which appears in the correspondence between Col. Freeman and Major Gaither, in their respective letters of the 17th and 19th October, 1798. The former makes an application to the latter, "to appoint some fit and proper person to muster and inspect the militia," to which Major Gaither replies: "Yours of the 17th inst. I have received, and declare to you, if there are any militia in arms under the authority of the United States, in Georgia, I am ignorant thereof. When I received your instructions from the Secretary of War, I wrote immediately for information, which I daily expect to receive, and for that reason wish to postpone the mustering the militia of Georgia, until I am properly informed. As there are difficulties which may arise in this business, it is highly necessary it should be delayed."

Mr. H. said that he had thus, as compendiously as possible, endeavored to show, that these unauthorized claims had probably been suspended for other reasons than any disposition on the part of the General Government to do Georgia injustice. He then remarked, that it was much to be lamented the conflagration of the War Office had probably destroyed many documents illustrating the views and objections of the Government on this subject, from the earliest period at which their payment had been pressed. But, as he had before remarked, if the House came to the same conclusion with the committee, that these claims, "authorized," as well as "unauthorized," were provided for and paid under the treaty of cession of 1802, it was not very material to inquire whether the inferences which he had deduced were sound or not.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, in reply to Mr. HAMILTON, said, the gentleman who had just taken his seat had committed several mistakes as to the facts of the case before the House, which it would be best to correct while the remembrance of his argument was fresh in the minds of the members. He stated that there had been no favorable decision from a standing committee; that all the favorable reports were from select committees. A bill was reported at the last Congress by a standing committee of the Senate. The bill passed the Senate, but was not acted upon finally here. [Mr. HAMILTON explained, that his remark was confined to committees of the House of Representatives.] Mr. F. was not prepared to dispute the fact, that unfavorable reports had been made by standing committees, and favorable by select committees. He did not perceive that this ought to prejudice the claimants. Reports were not considered as authority: their value depended upon the matter contained in them, and they were confirmed or rejected according to the judgment of the House, after careful examination of their contents. The two reports against the claim, were, 1st, that of the Committee of Claims of 1803; 2d, that of the Military Committee of the last session. Both committees occupy the same ground, that the claims were due by Georgia in 1794, and that the responsibility of the United States was removed by the compact of 1802. Both committees, in my judgment, erred, from the want of due consideration of the documents. The gentleman from South Carolina has satisfied me by his argument of to-day, that the Military Committee have in this case relied too much upon the previous reports, and have therefore failed to examine accurately the original papers. He says, with regret, that two letters of the Governor of Georgia are not to be had. This is a mistake. Both those letters are in a pamphlet now in my hand, printed at the present session of Congress. He states, also, that this business originated in an application from the Governor of Georgia for aid from the General Government in 1792. This was not so. The origin of this claim is a letter from the Secretary of War to the Governor, warning him of impending danger, and urging him to take preparatory measures. The letter to which the gentleman alludes, is the answer to the Secretary of War. The measures preparatory to meet the danger, were taken, and notice given to the War Department. A discretionary power was then given. Troops were called out; a dispute arose about the number called out; an explanation was given, and the General Government was satisfied. The concluding part of the letter of the Secretary of War expresses a hope that the large force will be dismissed when the danger is passed, provided the safety of the frontier will admit of it. The Governor at this time received also authority to call out the militia of South Carolina, if necessary, through the Governor of that State, who was officially informed, from the Department of War, that the expense incurred would be paid by the General Government. The Military Committee, with the Committee of Claims of 1803, both consider the Governor of Georgia as defending the State, under the constitution and laws of the United States, in his character of Governor. He acted as the special agent of the War Department under a written authority. He addressed himself as such to the Department. He gave notice as such of his movements. The United States knew the number of troops; never objected to the number until there was an apprehension that they were to be used for invading the Indian territory. This the Department wished to prevent, lest we should be involved in a war with Spain.

The Governor had contemplated an invasion, and was making preparations for it. It was prevented by orders from the War Department. But, sir, if the Governor had invaded the Indian territory, and desolated the whole region to the banks of the Mississippi, this act could not have impaired the right of the militia to their daily pay. I pray the recollection of the House of the letter of the Governor of Georgia, written on the application of the War Department, in 1794, after the Indian war had ended. This letter has also escaped the notice of the Military Committee. The Governor says the militia were used only defensively, or in pursuit of invading Indians; that their services were indispensable to the safety of the frontier.

All difficulty is solved by the compact of 1802. This cuts the Gordian knot for all the committees, and releases the United States from all liability. What are the arguments in support of this opinion, now offered by the gentleman, or heretofore used by others?

The gentleman applies to this contract for a sale of territory between Georgia and the United States, the rule of international law, that when nations have a treaty for the settlement of pecuniary claims, all those existing previously to the contract, are taken to be embraced by it. Without inquiry into the correctness of the rule, which might be disputed with safety, I have to say that this compact was not for the settlement of pecuniary claims. The United States wanted to have a cession of territory, and Georgia was willing to make it. All that the State desired was, that the territory itself should pay all the debts due by Georgia, and for which that territory had been pledged by that State.

But, the gentleman insists that these militia services were the consideration for which the one million and a quarter was paid. Sir, this is a mockery of Georgia. You pay her a sum of money out of the proceeds of the property she gave you, and then gravely say this settles all disputes. You must pay all our obligations to your militia. I have already endeavored to show that the words in the compact were introduced to show the motive which justified Georgia in demanding any payment for the lands ceded for the general benefit. The State troop bounties, the gentleman says, cannot be referred to, because the United States were not answerable for those debts. But, was not Georgia answerable; had she not bound herself to pay them out of this fund. If this were the case, could the Commissioners of the United States refuse to provide the means of paying them out of the fund?

The United States were, however, answerable on every principle of equity. Georgia was a member of the confederation. That confederation was bound to pay for the common defence, and these expenses were incurred for the common defence. But, sir, the gentleman urges not upon the compact, but on Mr. LINCOLN's vague recollections of the conversations of the commissioners who framed that compact. Look to the instrument, and there is no difficulty. The example of Virginia and North Carolina was followed, to the benefit of the Georgia claimants, and to that of the States formed out of the ceded territory. I will not repeat what has been already urged on this point.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would remark, that this claim is presented on the ground that the Governor of Georgia was acting, not as the Executive of the State, but as the agent of the United States. Considering him as fulfilling his duties under the constitution, according to the rules established during the late war, the United States are bound to pay the amount. By the rule established, as we are told by the Military Committee, militia in service, in case of invasion, or imminent danger thereof, during the late war, whether called out by the Governor of a State or not; whether called out by an officer of the General Government or not; were paid as a matter of course out of the public Treasury by the Department of War.

What is to deprive the militia of Georgia of the benefit of this rule? Is there any difference between a British and an Indian war, in the rules for the settlement of accounts? Is the spontaneous gathering of the militia in time of danger in 1818 and '14, to charge the public Treasury directly, when the call of a Governor, acting under an authority vested by the General Government, is deemed insufficient, in 1792, '3, and '4, to fix any thing but a remote responsibility upon that General Government? But, Mr. Speaker, I have done; it remains for the House to decide the proposition before it. I should have the strongest confidence that a favorable decision would be made, if I was satisfied that the members had attentively read the documentary evidence printed by their order.

Mr. McCOR observed, that much of the debate on this question might have been spared. We had not now to discuss the merits of the claim, but whether it had been paid or not. It was easy now, after the lapse of thirty years, when the persons and circumstances at first concerned, were nearly forgotten, to draw constructions either for or against the claim. For his own part, he should have no objection to pay, if he were not fully satisfied that this demand had been paid already. There was a report from the Committee of Claims, in the year 1803, one year after the treaty of cession, in which the committee say that a question had arisen at the previous session of Congress, whether or not this claim was embraced in that treaty. How did the House get this notion in 1802? The Attorney-General furnishes the clue to this question. The subject, it seems, had been talked of between the commissioners, and his understanding, from that conversation, was, that these claims were included. This officer, it will be observed, was called upon while his recollection of the transaction was still fresh, and he does declare, unequivocally, that the joint commissioners insisted that they had a claim for an amount which the United States unreasonably withheld. If they had such a claim while the treaty was in agitation, what was more reasonable, or what could be more natural, than to conclude that this claim would, of course, be embraced in the treaty? In the act of cession, on the part of Virginia, there is a clause similar to that in the treaty with Georgia, except that lands are stipulated instead of money. The expenses in relation to the lands now included in the State of Tennessee, and which were then stipulated for, were expenses of a military kind. The gentleman from Georgia is certainly mistaken in supposing that the General Government held itself bound for the expenses of these Georgia militia. On the contrary, they objected to the payment, and disputed the claim, because the operations on the Georgia frontier were of an offensive character. The Government did not pay the $18,000 referred to, because provision was made for it in the treaty.

The question was then taken on Mr. TATTNALL's motion for recommitment, and decided in the negative, and

The report of the Committee on Military Affairs, adverse to the present claim, was agreed to.

Public Lands in Ohio.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, the House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair, on the bill to provide for the relinquishment of certain claims for lands sold, by the United States, in the State of Ohio.

Mr. RANKIN (Chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands) explained the circumstances of the case, on which the bill is founded.

In 1784, Virginia ceded to the United States the North-western territory, out of which the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, have since been formed. Previous to this cession, Virginia had promised to her continental soldiery a certain rate of land as bounty. In order to fulfil their promise, that State set apart a certain tract of land in Kentucky, and in the act of cession above referred to, it was made a condition that, if this tract in Kentucky proved insufficient to satisfy all the bounty warrants issued by Virginia, Congress should set apart another tract north of the Ohio, and between the Scioto and Miami Rivers, (in what is now the State of Ohio.) Soon after the cession, about the year 1788, many unauthorized locations were made between those rivers, before the tract was set apart by Congress. These locations, Congress declared to be invalid. In 1790, Congress having evidence on the part of Virginia, that the tract in Kentucky was insufficient, set apart this tract between the Miami and the Scioto, according to the stipulation in the act of cession. No difficulty occurred in fixing its boundaries on three of the sides, because these consisted of the rivers Ohio, Scioto, and Miami; but some difficulty did occur in fixing the remaining boundary line from the source of the Scioto, to the source of the Miami, both which points then lay in the Indian country. In 1804, Mr. Ludlow, the United States surveyor for that district, ran what he supposed to be the true line. All the lands east of this were subject to the Virginia warrants. All the lands west of it were held to belong to the United States, and were sold accordingly; but the accuracy of this line being disputed, commissioners were appointed on the part of Virginia and the United States, by whose direction a second line was run by another surveyor, called Roberts, which started from the same point, viz: the source of the Scioto, but ran towards a different point, now found to be the true source of the Miami. Thus there occurred a gore between Ludlow's line and Roberts' line. Upon a suit to try the question, the District Court of the United States decided, that the land in this gore was subject to the Virginia warrants—but the land had already been sold by the United States to actual settlers. To those persons now deprived of their settlements, compensation was to be made, and the Committee on the Public Lands had come to the conclusion, that the rate of this compensation ought to be regulated by the valuation of these lands, made in obedience to an act of Congress, at the last session. The gore contained 14,000 acres, and the valuation of the land, exclusive of improvements, amounts to $80,000. The present bill provides that this sum should be put into the hands of the President of the United States, for the purpose of quieting all location claims prior to the year 1812.

The bill was then reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THURSDAY, February 17.

Illinois Canal.

Mr. COOK moved to take up the bill granting a certain quantity of land to the State of Illinois for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of the river Illinois, with those of Lake Michigan.

The motion was carried—ayes 65, noes 63.

The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONDICT in the chair, on that bill;

Which was amended by the insertion, at the end of the third section, of a proviso, that no titles to the lands granted should be valid against the United States until the canal should have been completed. A fourth section was added, which applies the residue of the proceeds of these lands, after the whole expense of the canal should have been defrayed, to the promotion of learning within the State of Illinois.

TUESDAY, February 22.

Massachusetts Militia Claims.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Everett, (of which a copy appears in the proceedings of the Senate of this date.)

Mr. CROWNINGSHIELD moved that the message be referred to the Military Committee.

Mr. WEBSTER said he did not rise to oppose the reference which his honorable colleague had proposed. He did not know that that might not be a proper disposition to be made of the communication. He was sorry—most truly sorry, however, to be obliged to say that this measure did not seem to advance the claim—even that part of it which was admitted to be just—a single step nearer payment than it was before. He did think it a little extraordinary, that it should be thought necessary to apply to Congress at all, for the payment of that part of the claim which seemed to be admitted to be free from any well-founded objection. He, for one, could not acknowledge himself satisfied with the course which had been adopted, or to so much of this claim as was acknowledged to be just. Why, if just, has it not been paid, like other claims? As far as he was concerned, as a member from the State, he should only ask for justice. He wished for nothing else, neither now nor hereafter. He hoped the present motion was made, under an expectation that the committee would report a bill for the immediate payment of whatever was found justly due. He thought the State had a right to expect this; and if it could not be obtained, without the aid of a law, he did hope, most earnestly, that a proper bill would be at once reported. It was time, he thought high time, that justice should be done to the States concerned, somewhere. And if a law were necessary, he hoped it would pass without further delay, so far at least as to provide for paying what seemed admitted to be due.

The motion to refer the message prevailed.

THURSDAY, February 24.

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

Mr. MERCEK moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of the bill "to confirm the acts incorporating the Ohio and Chesapeake Canal Company;" which was carried.

The House accordingly took up the bill.

The following amendment, formerly offered by Mr. McKIM, to the second section of the bill, was read and agreed to:

Strike out from the word thereof, in the twentieth line, second section, and insert "for their decision thereon; and if Congress should be of opinion that the said canal may be cut in the manner proposed as aforesaid, without impeding or injuring the navigation of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, the same shall be conclusive thereon."

Mr. MERCEK moved to insert, in the 17th line, the words, "over the District of Columbia;" (which confines the sanction given by Government, to that part of the canal which lies within the District.)

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANKIN moved to amend the first section of the bill, by striking out all after the enacting words, and inserting the following:

"That the act of the Legislature of Virginia, entitled 'An act incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company,' be and the same is hereby ratified, and confirmed, so far as may be necessary for the purpose of enabling any company, that may hereafter be formed by the authority of said act of incorporation, to carry into effect the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and no farther."

Mr. MERCEK opposed the amendment, and asserted that the language employed by the United States, in granting the incorporation, should correspond to that used by Virginia and Maryland for the same purpose. He combated the idea of any danger arising from the terms employed in the bill, and gave reasons to show that the concerns of the company required its provisions.

Mr. SHARPE thought, that, as the bill was now so different from what it was when reported by the Committee on Roads and Canals, he was at a loss clearly to understand it; it had better go back to the committee. He doubted whether the route contemplated by the company was as good as that by the Susquehanna. In order to give more time for examining the subject, he moved to lay the bill on the table; but withdrew the motion at the request of
